On May 8, 1958, Clyde Summers, professor at the Yale University Law School, and formerly chairman of a special committee appointed by Governor Harriman of New York to investigate misconduct in labor unions, testified before the Labor Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. Professor Summers testified at considerable length on the issue of democracy in unions. Earlier in the year, Professor Summers had written an article which was published in the Social-Democratic magazine, The New Leader, of February 10, 1958, and in it he had something significant to say about the doctrine of mutually; we quote:

"The lack of union democracy is sometimes excused by pointing to the lack of democracy in corporations. Why should we criticize union officers for acting without consulting their members when corporation officers act without consulting stockholders? This tends to hide vital distinctions behind an appeal to verbal equality. The man who works in a shop works under the jurisdiction of the union, which makes contracts legally binding on him despite his dissent. The core of his working life, the very source of his livelihood, is governed by the contract which the union makes. It tells him when he shall work, what he shall do, and how he shall work. It defines maternity benefits and retirement rights—from the cradle to the grave. Contrast this with a man who owns a share of stock. The corporation determines only whether he shall receive 4 percent or 6 percent on his investment. If a worker does not like his union, it is said, he can quit and seek other work. But the teamster cannot escape Hoffa unless he stops driving, the operating engineer cannot escape Maloney unless he abandons his bulldozer, and the carpenter cannot escape Hutcheson unless he discards his saw. The corporate shareholder who disagrees with the directors can, for the most part, sell his stock and buy another on the open market. Few corporate monopolies exist in which any person is not free to join as stockholder, and without inquiry as to race, sex, or political beliefs. Nor do corporations have power to expel those who cause trouble. The same is not true of unions. In short, the union has an all-encompassing compulsory power over vital elements of the existence of every person for whom they bargain. To compare union membership to stock shareholding is to be blind to industrial realities."

It is plain that the disinterested experts in the field of labor and labor-management relations regard it as absurd to insist that every regulation imposed upon labor is discriminatory unless it is also imposed upon management. Thus Prof. Archibald Cox of the Harvard Law School in his statement before the Senate Labor Subcommittee on May 6, 1958, stated, and I quote:

"I submit that it is a shortsighted mistake to argue that every law must apply in the same fashion to both employers and labor unions. Business organizations and trade organizations have different characteristics; they serve different functions in society; and they face different problems. Labor unions pay no tax upon most of their income. This is sound legislative policy, but if the false notion of exactly parallel treatment were followed, they would be subject to tax. Labor unions are not subject to the antitrust laws in the same manner as business firms. Again the diverse treatment is based upon sound policy, although parallelism would require us to abolish the exemption."

And again,

"Trade unions have a special status under the National Labor Relations Act. As a result their officials have great power over the lives and welfare not only of their members but of all employees for whom they act as bargaining representative—much more power than corporations hold over their stockholders."

On May 21, 1958, Professor of Economics Richard Lester, of Princeton University, appeared before the Labor Subcommittee and in the course of his testimony made the following statement:

"I personally have been very skeptical of too many of these analogies and too many notions that everything that management does, unions should do; or union does, management should do. Because I think there is a significant difference between management and unions. For that reason I have not, for example, approved putting unions under the antitrust laws in the way that some people have proposed; and therefore I do not think that you have got to be careful that you do not try to—just because you think something is appropriate for unions or something is appropriate for management, it should not automatically be true it should be imposed on the other."

Prof. Archibald Cox not only adopts the same view, but as we have seen, emphasizes the special statutory privileges enjoyed by labor unions. In his testimony before the subcommittee previously referred to, he asserts that the Federal Government has the responsibility to take reasonable measures to enforce the fiduciary duties of union officials and to insure internal union democracy:

"The Government has this duty because labor unions enjoy their present power by virtue of Federal statutes, chiefly the National Labor Relations Act. Other voluntary associations are different in two respects: (1) They lack the statutory power of a union designated as a bargaining representative; (2) no other voluntary association has as much power over an individual's livelihood and opportunities or over the rules governing his daily life. The union bulks much larger in the life of a worker than a corporation in the affairs of a stockholder."

Thus it seems apparent that the principle of applying parallel limitations upon management whenever such limitations are imposed on labor unions is completely without justification. As a matter of fact an examination of existing legislation demonstrates conclusively that the degree of regulation, restriction, and limitation imposed by the Federal Government on business enterprises is far in excess of that which is imposed on labor unions. In contrast, labor unions are more or less unregulated by the Federal Government and enjoy privileges and immunities which business enterprise does not enjoy.

Thus both management and labor unions are regulated in their labor relations under the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 (Taft-Hartley Act) and the Railway Labor Act. On the other hand, business enterprise, in its various aspects, is regulated by the Department of Justice under the antitrust laws, by the Federal Trade Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Federal Communications Commission, the Federal Power Commission, the Civil Aeronautics Administration, and the Civil Aeronautics Board. The Department of Labor regulates business enterprise under the Fair Labor Standards Act with respect to minimum wages, overtime, and child labor, as well as under the Davis-Bacon Act, the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act, the Copeland Antikickback Act, and the 8-hour laws. With respect to all of this regulation of business, there is no equivalent or similar regulation of labor unions. To the contrary, the statutes administered by the Department of Labor, which I have just enumerated, not only regulate business but do so on behalf of labor.

The Federal Government regulates business activity in many of its other aspects. For example, maritime affairs, meat and poultry inspection, food and drug inspection, mining operations, banking, insurance, veterans' affairs, foreign operations, and so forth. The Government Contract Committee prohibits employers who are parties to Government contracts from engaging in discrimination against employees or applicants for employment because of race, creed, sex, or national origin, but there is no similar requirement with respect to admission to membership in the labor unions which bargain collectively with these Government contractors.

There are two statutes regulating labor unions, the Lea (Anti-Petrillo) Act and the Hobbs (Antiracketeering) Act. On the other hand, employers are regulated by the Byrnes (Antistrikebreaker) Act.

When it comes to immunities, business enterprises enjoy none while labor unions enjoy many. The latter are immune from the Federal income tax and similar taxes in a number of the States. Only employers pay the unemployment compensation tax, the railroad unemployment insurance tax, and the payments required under workmen's compensation laws by both Federal and State Governments. Unions are not subject to the Federal antitrust laws and have substantial immunity from the granting of injunctions against them by the Federal courts under the Norris-LaGuardia Act and in some States which have little Norris-LaGuardia Acts.

Among the additional privileges and immunities enjoyed by labor unions are the following:

1. The Federal Government in the Taft-Hartley Act specifically guarantees them against interference with their internal affairs, nor are they required to be incorporated under either State or Federal law. Corporations on the other hand owe their existence to State corporation law and their activities are limited to the provisions of their corporate charters which are required to be in conformity with State law.

2. Labor unions have immunity against the misconduct of their members who are engaged in union activity as, for example, strikes and picketing. This kind of immunity is not possessed by other types of unincorporated associations.

3. Labor unions enjoy the right to bargain exclusively for all the employees in the unit, including those employees who are not members and even those who are strongly opposed to the union. This can mean, as it often does, that a union selected as the bargaining agent by a few as 25 percent of the employees in the unit becomes the bargaining spokesman for all the employees.

4. Labor unions are not subject to anything smaller or equivalent to suits by minority corporate stockholders against their corporations.

5. Through collective bargaining contracts labor unions may require union membership as a condition of continued employment although employers are forbidden by law to require nonmembership in a union as a condition of employment.

6. Unions enjoy a right to strike without either the union or its members being penalized therefor. If the strike results from the employer's unfair labor practice, the strikers cannot be replaced. The employer does not have any equivalent right to engage in a lockout, except in two types of situations, both extremely rare and both of minor significance. All other types of lockout are illegal under the Taft-Hartley Act.

7. The prohibition imposed on unions by the Taft-Hartley Act against restraint and coercion of employees is limited to physical violence, direct economic coercion or to threats of either of these two types of conduct. On the other hand, the prohibition imposed on employers under the act is against interference as well as restraint and coercion, and goes far beyond the violence and direct economic coercion which is forbidden to unions.

8. When management discriminates against an employee in violation of the Taft-Hartley Act, the Board may issue not only a cease-and-desist order but may require the employer to reinstate such employee and to pay him backpay as well. These remedies are in substance sufficient to take care of most of the unfair labor practices committed by employers and to restore employees to the status they would have enjoyed if the unfair labor practice had not been committed. Unions, on the other hand, even though they may engage in illegal conduct which results in loss of pay for employees, are not required to compensate employees for such loss, except where the union itself was responsible for causing an employer to discriminate. Thus an illegal mass picket line where picketing denies access to the plant to employees who wish to continue to work and which as a result causes such employees to lose pay is not the type of misconduct which the NLRB has required the offending union to remedy by compensating the employees for loss of such pay, but an employer must compensate for loss of pay suffered by locked-out employees.

9. Unions have the right under certain circumstances to examine an employer's books and records in the course of collective bargaining. The employer has no equivalent right.

10. Labor unions in many situations have a legal right of access to the employer's property, the right to compel the employer to make his property available for use by the union, and the right to invade the privacy of employees who are not union members and sometimes even against their wishes. Employers enjoy no equivalent or similar rights.

TRIBUTE TO BARROW LYONS

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, the death of Barrow Lyons will leave a vacuum in the ranks of those persons with strong convictions who strive for conservation and wise use of our natural resources. During the innumerable controversies over resource policies, Barrow Lyons could always be found on the side of the people.

His dedication to the public interest was reflected in his authoritative book, "Tomorrow's Birthright," which was published in 1955. I had an opportunity to review Barrow Lyons' book for the magazine, The New Leader, and I was moved to comment on the thoroughness of his research and his insight into sound policies needed to assure the use of our Nation's resources for future generations.

Barrow Lyons will also be remembered for the talent and energy he contributed in the struggle over construction of a high dam at Hells Canyon by the Federal Government. At a time when there was generally little understanding of the issues at stake, Mr. Lyons worked tirelessly to explain the reasons why the dam should be built by the Federal Government in articles and news stories. Although he crusaded for many causes involved in bitter debate, Mr. Lyons never let himself become involved in personal invective or acrimony. Facts were his basic weapon. Those who have worked alongside the late Barrow Lyons will long cherish his fine human qualities.

I ask unanimous consent to include with my remarks an obituary from the New York Times of April 6, 1959, describing the career of Barrow Lyons.

There being no objection, the obituary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BARROW LYONS, 69, LED NEWS SERVICE—INDEPENDENT FEATURES HEAD IN CAPITAL DIES—EX-AIDE OF RECLAMATION BUREAU

WASHINGTON, April 6—Barrow Lyons, a newspaperman and former Government press officer, died of a heart attack yesterday in his home here. He was 69 years old.

For the last 2 years Mr. Lyons had been manager of his own syndicate, The Independent features service, distributing Washington news analyses to magazines and weekly newspapers throughout the country.

Mr. Lyons, a native of New York, graduated from Dartmouth College. He had been a reporter and copy editor on the New York Times, the New York Post, the Baltimore Sun and the Christian Science Monitor. Before coming here in 1938, he had been financial news editor of Newsweek magazine.

In Washington, Mr. Lyons did research on small business for the Temporary National Economic Committee and later became an information specialist on war finance with the War Production Board. During most of the war period, he wrote a column for the Western Newspaper Union, which serves about 1,000 weekly newspapers.

Mr. Lyons had been press officer of the Reclamation Bureau of the Interior Department from 1944 to 1952. He wrote the book, "Tomorrow's Birthright," a study of conservation.

He leaves his wife, Ruth; two daughters, Mrs. Robert W. Hedges and Mrs. Jean Lenauer, both of New York; a brother, Dr. L. V. Lyons, also of New York, and three grandchildren.

PROPOSED OREGON DUNES NATIONAL SEASHORE

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, in view of the widespread interest in the bill for an Oregon Dunes National Seashore, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Take It Easy," published in the Eugene, Oreg., Register-Guard of April 8, 1959, and an editorial entitled "Water, Park Need Thought," published in the Coos Bay World of April 1, 1959.

The editorials from these two influential Oregon newspapers are thoughtful, restrained, and fair and moderate in their approach. The writers of the editorials obviously realize that it is my intention, in sponsoring the national seashore bill, to augment the magnificent Oregon seacoast as a tourist attraction and not to detract from any industrial or economic possibilities.

I subscribe to the words of caution in the editorial from the Register-Guard, which warn residents of the seacoast area not to be misled by those who would exploit selfishly priceless scenic resources which should be protected for future generations of Americans to see and enjoy.

After all, every great national park has usually been opposed by a few shortsighted local interests. Yet, the national park, once established, has generally been a bonanza in the thousands of tourists and sightseers it always has attracted.

Also, I ask consent to have printed in the RECORD an informative article written by Mr. Malcolm Bauer, of the Oregonian, which reports on a public meeting held in Reedsport on April 12 for a discussion of the seashore recreation area proposal. Mr. Bauer is associate editor of the Oregonian.

There being no objection, the editorials and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Coos Bay World, Apr. 1, 1959]

WATER, PARK NEED THOUGHT

U.S. Senator DICK NEUBERGER'S proposal for a national park in the sand dunes areas of Douglas and Lane Counties, and at the fabulous Sea Lion Caves of Lane County, is great—with the single exception of doubts about future industrial use of the dunes' potential water reservoirs.

Existence of a national park would do much to promote further tourist travel along the Coast Highway. Acquiring the touring dollar, no one needs to be told, is becoming one of Oregon's major industries. This is particularly true along our coast. It is an exceptionally clean dollar, too, being founded on fun, enjoyment, and recreation.

One must hope, however, that Senator NEUBERGER and other backers of the park idea will lend a serious ear to those who are lukewarm about a national park because of possible hindrance of industrial development.

One hopes that park legislation, if such comes to pass, will take into account the possibility of developing water resources for industry. Industry is, after all, another crying need for this whole State, and especially for this section of the State.

An example of what we mean is found in the sand dunes area across Coos Bay from North Bend. This is not part of the area which Mr. NEUBERGER proposes for the park, but it is in many ways similar scenically and geologically to the Douglas and Lane stretches of beach and dunes which would be in the park.

Pacific Power & Light Co. has spent over 2 years developing deep wells in the dunes, proving out the possibility of an industrial water supply suitable for use in making pulp. P.P. & L. hasn't said anything officially yet about its findings, but if it is supposed to be secret, it is a very poorly kept secret that there is bountiful water for one or more large pulp mills here on the bay, and having proved existence of water, the power company is now in the process of selling a pulp mill here to three separate corporations, one of which will buy the idea in a short time.

To the north, the people have noticed this development.

Many businessmen and industrialists realize water found in the Coos County dunes may also be present in dunes near them. The water-starved Oregon coast may have a partial answer here to its industrial water problem.

The proposed park has quite naturally thrown some fear into industry on this score. It is a fear which park proponents can overcome by protecting the dunes as a source of water, whether they are included in a national park or not.

We recommended this for study to Mr. NEUBERGER and other park proponents, who, with the exception of the water problem, have proposed a noble idea.—F.W.A.

[From the Eugene (Oreg.) Register-Guard, Apr. 8, 1959]

TAKE IT EASY

The people of western Lane and Douglas Counties are understandably interested, even concerned. They want to know more about this proposal to create an Oregon Dunes national seashore in their backyards. However, too many of them are screaming before they're hurt. We have seen no evidence that anybody intends to ride over them roughshod, even if they could.

In Reedsport Sunday, a representative of the park service will be on hand to answer questions and to explain further what the proposed park status will mean to businessmen and others in the Florence-Reedsport area. It would be well to wait, at least until then, before opposing the park idea.

From here, it appears as if some citizens have been taken in by persons whose motives are questionable and whose tactics are quite transparent. We speak of those who stand to turn a fast buck by speculating in some of the land the Government might want for park purposes. Given a choice between a national park and a row of townlots, they'll take the profitable townlots any day, not because they represent the wisest development of the area, but because they are profitable.

Others of the area, like those of us who live inland, should take a broader view. We should not let ourselves be aroused by the high-sounding protestations of those who are scrambling to salvage their own dreams of easy money. Rather we should withhold judgment until more of the facts are in.

These things take time. There is no chance of there being a national reserve over there for at least 3 years, and probably for much longer than that. All points of view will have a chance to be heard.

This proposal should be recognized for what it is—a proposal in which the park service is interested. That, and no more. The service, now deep into its "Mission 66" program of refurbishing worn out parks, is reluctant to take on new responsibilities until it can live up to the ones it has inherited. Far from moving too quickly to establish a park area in Oregon, the service is likely to move with the greatest deliberation. This is no time, by irresponsible alarms, to discourage establishment of a park that we may someday wish we had.

PUBLIC OPINION DIVIDED ON COAST PARK PLAN

(By Malcolm Bauer)

REEDSPORT.—Public opinion is sharply divided in central Oregon coast communities over the merits of a proposal to establish a 35,000-acre national seashore recreation area between the mouths of the Siuslaw and Umpqua Rivers.

This was apparent here Sunday afternoon as 150 persons crowded into a room in Reedsport High School to hear an explanation of the plan from officials of the National Park Service headed by Dan H. Thompson, Chief of Recreation Resource Planning in the National Park Service headquarters in Washington, D.C.

APPLAUSE GREETS FORESTER

Loud applause greeted the statement of George Harrington, resident forester at the Crown-Zellerbach Tahkenitch Tree Farm, that recreation development in the area should be left to local and State governments. He said several Oregon payrolls depended on lumber produced on the tree farms' 10,000 acres, 3,000 of which are included in the area suggested for Federal development.

There was also generous applause for Martha Ann Platt, 2738 Northeast 14th Avenue, Portland, who supported the recreation proposal as incorporated in Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER's Senate bill 1526. Speaking as vice president of the Oregon Audubon Society and conservation chairman of the Mazamas, she said "a national park label" would attract many tourists.

William E. Walsh, Coos Bay, ex-president of the State senate, presided at the hearing which he described as an information session not a debate.

QUICK ACTION URGED

"If we are going to have a national park in this area," Walsh said, "the sooner we can have it the better."

A second such session will be Monday at 8 p.m. at the junior high school in Florence.

The following points were developed by Thompson and other NPS officials in response to questions, principally from Orin Collier, Reedsport lawyer, speaking for the Port Umpqua Chamber of Commerce.

1. The study area which may or may not coincide with the boundaries drawn for the national seashore recreation area contain: 13,115 acres of Federal land including national forest, 522 acres of State-owned land (Jesse M. Honeyman State Park), 320 acres of county-owned land, 14,963 acres of privately owned land and 4,250 acres of freshwater lakes (Cleawox, Siltcoos, Woahink).

CONSULTATION PROVIDED

2. Boundaries will not be established (by the Secretary of the Interior) without full consultation with local officials and consideration of local public opinion.

3. There is no provision for the direct reimbursement of taxing units for revenue loss by conversion of private property to public use, but, in Thompson's view, "the recreation area should produce far more revenue than ever received from taxes." He said that 2,500,000 annual visitors to the Great Smoky Mountain National Park, spent an estimated $28 million for services in the immediate vicinity of the park.

4. It is intended to depend for services on establishments outside the recreation area. Commercial properties within the area generally would be acquired by the Government.

RESIDENCES APPROVED

5. Private residences would also be bought. In some cases, the Government would agree to a life tenancy by the owner, but the latter could not leave the property to his children. The tenant would not have to pay rent during his life tenancy.

6. The National Park Service would try to acquire property by negotiation. It would use the extreme course of condemnation only to clear a title, to prevent undesirable uses or to gain property for a specific official facility.

7. Thompson roughly estimates the cost of property acquisition in the "study area" at $3 million.

8. State and Federal highways such as Highway 101, would remain in their current status; there would be no toll or special regulation even though they should run through the area. County roads would probably be taken over by the parks service.

9. Fishing would be allowed; the parks service prefers no hunting of game, except perhaps of migratory wildfowl under State regulations.

10. Initially, the recreation area would be operated by a permanent staff of about 10 persons and an additional seasonal staff of from 10 to 15.

11. Construction work is by bid and in the experience of the park service, local contractors usually can bid lowest.

12. There would be no change in the status of Honeyman State Park.

A. J. Meyer, general manager of the Gardiner branch of International Paper Co., made a brief statement opposing the project because of lack of information on its possible effects.

FEDERAL PLAN FAVORED

An officer of the Port Umpqua Chamber of Commerce, who preferred to remain anonymous, told this reporter that it was his belief that sentiment in his organization favored the Federal program. The contrary was the case, he said, in Florence, the site of Monday night's hearing.

The National Park Service attitude was summed up by Herbert Maier, associate regional director of the NPS with headquarters in San Francisco: "We have to think big, not small," he said. "A mere strip of beach is not enough. A certain amount of upland area is needed for services and also as a buffer."

The area has 24 miles of coastline and varies in depth from the beach from about 1 to 6 miles. The plan incorporates the Sea Lion Caves, a private enterprise 12 miles north of Florence, but no issue on that property was raised at the hearing here.

COMPETITIVE BID CONTRACTS

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, recently I introduced S. 1383, a bill which provides that the Federal Government in awarding contracts for national defense or for civilian goods must award these contracts on a competitive bid basis with the contracts then going to the lowest responsible bidder.

Exceptions were made only in those instances wherein the advertisement for public bids would not be feasible from a national security standpoint.

In introducing that bill I quoted from a report from the Comptroller General which had been submitted to the Congress on January 20, 1959, wherein he called to our attention a specific case in which the Government had paid over $6 million more than would have been paid under the same contract had the proper business procedures been followed.

To emphasize the urgent need for the enactment of this type of legislation, I am today calling attention to another report recently submitted by the Comptroller General, wherein another $1 million was unnecessarily being expended.

This report involves a Department of the Air Force contract with the Avco Manufacturing Corp., Crosley Division, of Cincinnati, Ohio. In rendering this report, the Comptroller General said:

> An excessive price was negotiated for contract AF 33(600)-31100 because the Air Force accepted more than $1 million of recorded costs which the contractor included in error in its pricing proposal.

This was a negotiated cost-plus contract. When the Comptroller General made his audit, it was found that the contractor had included in the recorded costs of $13,331,769 more than $1 million representing the cost of excessive quantities of several component parts which had been purchased and charged against this contract. These components were not required for use on this contract, but they were actually acquired by the same contractor for use in performing under another fixed-price contract with the same department. For example, 15 turrets were required for performance under contract AF 33(600)-31100, but the contractor included 47 turrets in recording costs for the same cost-plus negotiated contract. This resulted in the Federal Government's being charged excess costs of more than $900,000 for these turrets alone. Additional errors of approximately $100,000 in recording costs of other materials against this same contract were found, bringing the total to in excess of $1 million.

It should be remembered that these extra purchases of component parts, which were being charged to this cost-plus fixed contract and which were not needed, actually meant that not only was the cost of the contract raised by $1 million, but also had the error not been corrected the contractor would have received the normal 10 percent profit on the error.

Furthermore, the major portion of these $1 million parts which were bought in excess of the requirements and charged against this cost-plus contract actually were used on another contract which the Avco Manufacturing Co., had with the U.S. Government at the same time—only the second contract was a fixed-price contract.

Simply stated, the company through this claimed error charged $1 million of their own costs on a fixed-price contract to a cost-plus contract.

There was no reason whatever why both these contracts could not have been awarded on a competitive bid basis with all companies being allowed to participate, thereby not only eliminating the $1 million error but also probably reducing substantially the cost of the original contract.

The Air Force and the contractor have agreed upon the overstatement of the original price in the amount of $1,133,510, and the contractor has accordingly refunded this amount to the U.S. Government. The point is, however: How many such contracts are there which have not been audited and upon which errors have not been found?

To further emphasize the need for mandatory competitive bidding I call attention to the fact that the Department of Defense is now refusing to give the Comptroller General access to adequate information whereby his office can review many of the contracts. The Comptroller General claims that this permission is being denied his auditors even when the contracts in question are unclassified contracts. For instance, they have been refused access to the reports of the Inspector General of the Air Force covering the study of the ballistic missile program.

Congress has appropriated billions of dollars to our national defense departments, but it is physically impossible for us in Congress to examine each of these contracts; however, Congress does have in the Comptroller General's office an agency whereby the expenditures of all of these departments can be audited.

Unless this arbitrary ruling on the part of the Defense Department denying the Comptroller General access to adequate information for auditing all of these unclassified contracts is reversed, there is no manner in which Congress can know what is being done. I shall insist, as one Member of the U.S. Senate, that the Comptroller General be given full and unrestricted authority to audit the expenditures of any agency of the U.S. Government, and I join others in asking for a reversal of this ruling and for the passage of my bill.

SHASTA DAISY PROPOSED AS NATIONAL FLOWER

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I have received a most delightful letter from the third grade class of Baywood School in San Mateo, Calif., in which these youngsters movingly state their case for the choice of the Shasta daisy as the national flower. They point out that like our country, the Shasta daisy was once small and wild but with work and patience it has become a lovely flower; that the white of its petals is symbolic of purity; that its center is a big heart of gold like the people of our country, and that its many petals might represent our 50 States.

Mr. President, these arguments have touched me so much that if I were not already committed to the corn tassel, I would be tempted to join with the third grade of Baywood School and urge the adoption of the Shasta daisy as our national flower. I ask unanimous consent that this letter be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR HUMPHREY: Our class studied about Luther Burbank, the plant wizard. He was a great man. He loved living things. He knew more about plants than any other man in the world. He gave the world more than 3,000 new fruits, vegetables, and flowers. One of the flowers he created was the beautiful Shasta daisy.

Because we feel that there should be a reason for the choice of our national flower, we think that the Shasta daisy created by a great American would be a good choice.

Besides being an American flower the Shasta daisy is hardy, simple but beautiful, blends well with all colors, grows everywhere, and keeps well when cut.

Like our country the Shasta daisy was once small and wild but with work and patience it has become a lovely flower. The white of its petals is symbolic of purity and its center is a big heart of gold like the people of our country. Its many petals might represent our 50 States. We hope you will consider the Shasta daisy as a national flower.

Sincerely,

LORNA PICKRELL,
Class Representative, Third Grade, Baywood School, Alameda and Kentucky, San Mateo, Calif.

LATIN AMERICAN POLICY AND THE VISIT OF FIDEL CASTRO

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, at 7 o'clock this evening Fidel Castro, one of the most controversial figures of our time, will arrive in Washington. One thing is certain about Dr. Castro: To millions of Cubans he symbolizes their hope for a better life.

What we are witnessing in Cuba is a revolution with a capital "R." The Cubans want an end to miserable poverty on a beautiful island whose soil and climate could be extraordinarily fruitful. There is a determination to break their economy's dependency on a single crop—sugar—with its uncertain world markets and its seasonable unemployment. And there is a pent-up mass hunger for land, understandable in a country where less than one-tenth of 1 percent of the farmers own one-fifth of all agricultural land, and 8 percent own 70 percent of the land. Cubans also want an end to an almost unbroken chain of election frauds, nepotism, and graft which have constantly frustrated their hopes for competent, responsive, and responsible government.

Dr. Castro's task of realizing such a social revolution in a country whose feudal roots go back over four centuries is immensely more complex than his amazing defeat of a modern, well-equipped army. He has surrounded himself in his cabinet with a number of honest, capable men, several of whom are accompanying him to Washington.

Dr. Castro's labors are complicated by the machinations of the international Communists. It is pertinent to recall that the Communists have a long history in Cuba. Trained party organizers furnished much of the leadership in establishing labor unions after the overthrow of the brutal Machado dictatorship, in 1933. Subsequent Cuban Governments, including that of Batista, found it convenient to "play ball" with the Communists. The outlawing of Communist activities in 1952 drove them underground. After the overthrow of Batista, the Communists have emerged as the single most organized, disciplined political force in the country. In Cuba, as elsewhere, they have sought to identify themselves with the reforms of the revolution.

The Communists are trying to maneuver us into appearing to be opposed to the aims of the revolution. In this, their task has been facilitated by the almost universal resentment in Cuba of our military aid to Batista.

We must admit in all candor that the future in Cuba is uncertain. The great majority of the Cuban people want an authentic national revolution. It should be our policy to be sympathetic to their aspirations, and to let them know, through Dr. Castro and the team who accompanies him that the Cuban people can count on us for understanding and help.

Cuba is a part of a larger picture which extends in one form or another all the way from the Rio Grande to Tierra del Fuego. It is imperative that we understand what is occurring today in Latin America, if we are to formulate an effective Latin American policy. Anticommunism is not enough. We must forcefully demonstrate what we are for.

Our gravest error has been a misreading of the revolutions gripping the region. Some people are prone to dismiss Latin American revolts as mere changes in the palace guard, while others see Communist influence in every upheaval. These stereotypes can be our undoing.

Today, the nations to the south are in the midst of an epic social revolution. We and the Communists have vied with each other in telling people the world over that they no longer have to live out their lives in hopeless misery. The peoples of Latin America took us at our word.

They want an end to semi-feudal conditions in which 5 percent of the population owns from 80 to 90 percent of the land; in which a handful of nations and foreigners live in luxury, while the majority live in squalor; in which disease strikes down their children, and hunger and ignorance perpetuate their slavery; in which the wealthy minority join with the army to keep things just as they are.

Many thousands of Latin Americans have risked exile, imprisonment, torture, and death to achieve responsible governments, responsive to the needs of their people. These courageous people usually come from the classes that produce political leadership—namely, students, union leaders, and professional and businessmen. The rash of revolutions that toppled tyrannies in Argentina, Colombia, Venezuela, and Cuba attests to their determination to achieve freedom and bread.

THE LATIN AMERICAN IMAGE OF THE UNITED STATES

In the midst of that upheaval, which we—above all other people—should be able to understand and to sympathize with, the United States has somehow managed to appear callous and indifferent. While we have eagerly sought Latin American support to stop the spread of Communist tyranny, we have demonstrated a peculiar nonchalance toward despotisms of the home-grown variety.

Our Government has pinned medals on notoriously corrupt and brutal dictators, invited Venezuela's ruthless secret-police chief to the United States to study FBI methods, sent a warm message of official condolence at the assassination of the tyrant Somoza, when the Nicaraguan people themselves were secretly rejoicing, and kept a stream of armaments flowing to Batista long after it had become apparent that he was using them against his own people, contrary to the stipulations of our defense treaty.

The Communists, of course, are getting a lot of mileage out of such errors. But we must face the fact that our own actions, not Communist propaganda, have created throughout Latin America an image of the United States as a nation selfishly engrossed in defending its own freedoms, but heedless of the aspirations of others.

A NINE-POINT PROGRAM FOR IMPROVING LATIN AMERICAN RELATIONS

Latin America, as population zooms, as industrial development spreads, and as hope and impatience mingle, is going to be a cauldron of competing political ideologies. We should welcome this development, not fear it.

In no region of the world have we deeper historical traditions to build upon. It was with the Latin American Republics that we first developed the idea of regional cooperation. The bold idea of mutual cooperation to attack disease, illiteracy, and poverty was born within the inter-American family. These are the people who wept unashamedly when Franklin Delano Roosevelt died.

Today in Latin America there are many leaders who understand and admire our democratic system, and want to develop something comparable in their own countries.

Our traditions of individual freedom and concern for ordinary human beings were once the cornerstone of our successful Latin American policy. Today, to Latin Americans, these much-admired beliefs seem to stop at the border. While we caution our neighbors about Communist activities and Communist infiltration, we appear peculiarly cold toward the Latin Americans' yearning to achieve genuine civil liberties.

The recent steps taken by the administration to repair our tottering Latin American policy should be applauded. They are steps in the right direction, but they will not be enough if the escalator of history is going faster in the opposite direction. We must replace our massive indifference to Latin American aspirations with massive cooperation.

The Latin American situation cries out for imaginative, long-range planning, rather than the hurried, patched-up measures after an explosion has occurred.

A coordinated program on the order of the Marshall plan would give the Latin Americans new hope of attaining bread and freedom. The possibilities of such an effort should be explored carefully, not primarily as an anti-Communist stratagem, but because it is good for Latin America and for the United States. We should not be ashamed of our humanitarian tradition, nor should we be embarrassed if humanitarian and security objectives sometimes coincide with our national policy.

In conclusion, I should like to propose a nine-point program for improving United States-Latin American relations. I believe this program is realistic, workable, and in harmony with the best interests of our country and of our 20 sister republics.

First. The United States should increase the volume of its economic aid in support of Latin American efforts to develop diversified and viable economies, so they will not be dependent, as they now are, on a few commodities. Requests for loans from the Development Loan Fund and the Export-Import Bank should be dealt with expeditiously and sympathetically. We should cooperate fully with the new Inter-American Development Institution. The proposed corps of technical experts within the Institute could help the smaller, inexperienced countries draw up coordinated development plans.

Second. The United States should accelerate and strengthen its program of technical assistance in agriculture, health, education, vocational training, and public administration. The time has come to recapture the original fervor of President Truman's bold new program which was widely hailed in Latin America when it was first announced a decade ago.

Third. The United States should support vigorously the current moves within Latin America to establish regional markets. Elimination of inter-American trade barriers would broaden markets for Latin American products and would make low-cost manufacturing feasible. Both are indispensable prerequisites to diversification and economic growth.

Fourth. The United States should review its trade and tariff policies as they affect imports from Latin America. It is self-defeating for us to provide economic assistance with one hand, and then take it away, with the other, by shortsighted trade restrictions. If policies designed to strengthen our trade with Latin America cause hardship to any domestic industry, the Government has a responsibility to aid those so affected. In the Senate, I recently cosponsored an amendment to the Area Redevelopment Act (S. 722) to make such aid possible; but, unfortunately, it did not pass the committee stage.

Fifth. The United States should give wholehearted support to the health programs under the direction of the Pan American Sanitary Organization. Widespread disease which stalks Latin America is a tremendous economic drain as well as a human tragedy. Investment in health is perhaps the cheapest, most effective investment we can make in the future of the Western Hemisphere.

Sixth. The United States should develop a bold and imaginative program of student and cultural exchange.

We need to reexamine our methods of screening Latin American scholarship recipients. Too frequently the test has been the friendliness of the recipient toward the United States. Young Latin Americans of so-called leftist tendencies have been excluded, when they are often the very ones who would benefit most from the program.

Seventh. The U.S. press, radio, and TV networks should give wider and better balanced news coverage of Latin American affairs. This, of course, is something our Government can do little about. But it is essential that the American people have a continuous report and interpretation of Latin American developments if they are to understand the magnitude of the problems in that region and what we are being asked to support. When news of revolutions and executions dominate our newspapers, it is hard for the American taxpayer to form an understanding of the underlying realities in the 20 American Republics, and of our interest in them.

Eighth. The United States should thoroughly reappraise its military assistance program in Latin America. What we have given one nation for hemispheric defense has often provoked demands by another for an equal amount of aid. Great care should be taken not to encourage this type of arms race, which Latin American governments can ill afford. We should give greater attention to the coordination of military policy and strategy in the hemisphere. This might well result in a decrease in the requirements of national military establishments.

Further, our military assistance to certain dictatorial governments has raised the question of whose freedom those governments are defending. The use by Batista of U.S.-supplied armaments against his own people, contrary to stipulations of our defense treaty, has greatly damaged U.S. prestige throughout Latin America. It makes little sense to speak of hemispheric defense while arming a tyrant who uses weapons to intimidate his own people.

Ninth. The United States should lend its support to the idea of regional arms control. Last year Costa Rica submitted such a plan to the Organization of American States, and received nominal support from the U.S. delegation. Our Government should now press for the consideration of the Costa Rican plan, or some similar project, at the 11th Inter-American Conference to be held at Quito next year.

The quality of our overall policy toward Latin America will be determined not only by what we do, but by how we do it.

Unless we pursue our policies with a genuine interest in the welfare of our fellow human beings, they will do little to heal our wounded inter-American relations. The steps already taken by the Department of States, many of them complete reversals of former policy, will avail us little if they are done reluctantly and only under Latin American pressure.

We must, if we are to recapture the warm bonds of friendship which characterized the best days of the good neighbor policy, breathe into inter-American cooperation that intangible spirit which then characterized our relations—a deep-rooted conviction that the Western Hemisphere can, indeed it must, be a new world where freedom and opportunity flourish.

Let us hope that we will be able to convey our deeply felt, best wishes to Fidel Castro and the Cuban people for the full realization of their aspirations for a democratic and progressive Cuba.

ADDRESS BY THE VICE PRESIDENT BEFORE THE ACADEMY OF POLITICAL SCIENCE

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, on Tuesday evening, April 14, the Vice President delivered a very important address before the Academy of Political Science in New York. This address should be of great interest to everyone who is interested in devising a means for the settlement of international disputes.

I ask unanimous consent to have the Vice President's address printed in the body of the RECORD.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me on that point for a moment?

Mr. AIKEN. Yes. First I should like to have consent to have printed an editorial from the New York Times of today relating to the address.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. AIKEN. Now I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I had hoped to have the privilege of introducing the address for the RECORD, but only one of us can do so. I thought the address was a vital statement of policy and position, and we are delighted that the address was delivered in New York City. I want to commend my colleague for putting it into the RECORD.

Mr. AIKEN. I am sure it will be of great interest, as I stated, to everyone who is concerned with devising a means for the settlement of international disputes and misunderstanding of agreements between countries.

There being no objection, the editorial and address were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Apr. 15, 1959]

FOR A WORLD OF LAW

An important and far-reaching proposal for realizing the guiding ideal of both the United States and the United Nations was made by Vice President NIXON in his speech before the Academy of Political Science.

The ideal, long proclaimed by American statesmen, in particular President Eisenhower, and embodied in the United Nations Charter, is to establish a peaceful world in which the rule of force will be replaced by the rule of law.

To that end Mr. NIXON proposes to elevate the International Court of Justice at The Hague to a real Supreme Court of the world with far wider jurisdiction and employment in international disputes and with the power to make binding decisions especially in cases involving differing interpretations of international treaties and agreements that have been a dominant element in the conflict between the free world and the Communist bloc. Under his plan this latter power would be spelled out in all future international agreements, which would provide both for submission of any dispute arising from their interpretation to the court and for pledges by the signatory nations to be bound by the court's decisions.

Mr. NIXON characterized his proposal as still unofficial. But he has wide administration backing for it and, in line with President Eisenhower's state of the Union message, forecast administration recommendations to Congress to give effect to it by modifying American reservations as to the court's jurisdiction which set a pattern for other nations.

The International Court of Justice, consisting of 15 international jurists elected by the United Nations General Assembly and the Security Council, is already "the principal judicial organ of the United Nations." As such it is charged with helping to bring about "conditions under which justice and respect for the obligations arising from treaties and other sources of international law" shall prevail. But it has been unable to do much toward that goal, first because it can deal only with cases voluntarily submitteed to it by both parties, which has meant about two cases a year, and second because it has no enforcement powers of its own, such enforcement being left to the paralyzed Security Council.

By giving special recognition to the Court and its functions and powers in future treaties, Mr. NIXON's proposal would go far in remedying some, if not all, of these weaknesses. International disputes would still have to be settled in the main on a political basis by negotiations and conferences, but the court could still give far greater moral authority to any resulting agreements and thereby help not only replace force by law but also mitigate the balance of atomic terror that now keeps the peace.

But to enable it to do so it will still be necessary to arrive at common standards and a generally accepted language in which words will mean what they say and mean the same to all parties. That will be no easy task in a world in which the Communists regard law and morality as merely an instrument for the destruction of their opponents and twist words into their opposites, so that in their jargon slavery becomes freedom, dictatorship becomes democracy, oppression becomes respect for human rights, and new conflicts are snatched out of thin air, as in the Berlin crisis. But any progress in rectifying this situation is welcome, and Mr. NIXON'S proposal deserves both study and support.

TEXT OF ADDRESS BY THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES BEFORE THE ACADEMY OF POLITICAL SCIENCE, NEW YORK, N.Y., APRIL 13, 1959

An invitation to address this distinguished audience is one of the most flattering and challenging a man in my position could receive.

Flattering because the very name of this organization at least implies that the profession which I am proud to represent can properly be described as a science rather than by some of the far less complimentary terms usually reserved for politics and politicians.

And challenging because I realize that an Academy of Political Science expects a speech of academic character. I hasten to add, however, if it is proper to quote a Princeton man at a Columbia gathering, that in using the term academic I share Woodrow Wilson's disapproval of the usual connotation attached to that word. Speaking on December 28, 1918, in London's Guildhall he said: "When this war began a league of nations was thought of as one of those things that it was right to characterize by a name which, as a university man, I have always resented. It was said to be academic, as if that in itself were a condemnation, something that men could think about but never get."

In my view, the primary function of the practicing politician and of the political scientist is to find ways and means for people to get those things they think about; to make the impractical practical; to put idealism into action.

It is in that spirit, that I ask you to analyze with me tonight the most difficult problem confronting our society today. It is, as I am sure we will all agree, the simple but overriding question of the survival of our civilization. Because while none of us would downgrade the importance of such challenging problems as the control of inflation, economic growth, civil rights, urban redevelopment—we all know that the most perfect solutions of any of our domestic problems will make no difference at all if we are not around to enjoy them.

Perhaps at no time in the course of history have so many people been so sorely troubled by the times and dismayed by the prospects of the future. The almost unbelievably destructive power of modern weapons should be enough to raise grave doubts as to mankinds ability to survive even were we living in a world in which traditional patterns of international conduct were being followed by the major nations. But the threat to our survival is frighteningly multiplied when we take into account the fact that these weapons are in the hands of the unpredictable leaders of the Communist world as well as those of the free world.

What is the way out of this 20th century human dilemma? For the immediate threat posed by the provocative Soviet tactics in Berlin, I believe that to avoid the ultimate disaster of atomic war on one hand, or the slow death of surrender on the other, we must continue steadfastly on the course now pursued by the President and the Secretary of State.

In the record of American policy, as it has unfolded since the time of Korea, our national resolves to stand firm against Communist aggression are clearly revealed. This has particularly been the case since the policy of containment matured into the policy of deterrence. In the recurrent post-Korean crises of the Formosa Straits, the Middle East, and now Berlin, the President, and Mr. Dulles have given the Soviet leaders no possible cause to misconstrue the American intent.

I believe moreover that the Soviet leaders are equally on notice that regardless of which political party holds power in Washington these policies of resolute adherence to our principles, our commitments and our obligations will prevail. I specifically want to pay tribute to members of the Democratic Party in the Congress for putting statesmanship above partisanship by making this clearly evident in the developing situation of Berlin.

We can also take confidence in the fact that at this moment the United States possesses military power fully adequate to sustain its policies, and I am certain that whatever is necessary to keep this balance in favor of the free nations and the ideals of freedom will be done, by this administration and by its successors regardless of which political party may be in power.

What this posture of resolute national unity taken alone must mean in the end, however, is simply an indefinite preservation of the balance of terror.

We all recognize that this is not enough. Even though our dedication to strength will reduce sharply the chances of war by deliberate overt act, as long as the rule of force retains its paramount position as the final arbiter of international disputes, there will ever remain the possibility of war by miscalculation. If this sword of annihilation is ever to be removed from its precarious balance over the head of all mankind, some more positive courses of action than massive military deterrence must somehow be found.

It is an understandable temptation for public men to suggest that some bold new program will resolve the human dilemma—that more missiles, more aid, more trade, more exchange, or more meetings at the summit will magically solve the world's difficulties.

The proposals that I will suggest tonight are not offered as a panacea for the world's ills. In fact, the practice of suggesting that any one program, whatever its merit, can automatically solve the world's problems is not only unrealistic but, considering the kind of opponent who faces us across the world today, actually can do more harm than good in that it tends to minimize the scope and gravity of the problems with which we are confronted, by suggesting that there may be one easy answer.

But while there is no simple solution for the problems we face, we must constantly search for new practical alternatives to the use of force as a means of settling disputes between nations.

Men face essentially similar problems of disagreement and resort to force in their personal and community lives as nations now do in the divided world. And, historically, man has found only one effective way to cope with this aspect of human nature—the rule of law.

More and more the leaders of the West have come to the conclusion that the rule of law must somehow be established to provide a way of settling disputes among nations as it does among individuals. But the trouble has been that as yet we have been unable to find practical methods of implementing this idea. Is this one of these things that men can think about but cannot get?

Let us see what a man who had one of the most brilliant political and legal minds in the Nation's history had to say in this regard. Commenting on some of the problems of international organization the late Senator Robert Taft said: "I do not see how we can hope to secure permanent peace in the world except by establishing law between nations and equal justice under law. It may be a long hard course, but I believe that the public opinion of the world can be led along that course, so that the time will come when that public opinion will support the decision of any reasonable impartial tribunal based on justice."

We can also be encouraged by developments that have occurred in this field in just the past 2 years.

Not surprisingly the movement to advance the rule of law has gained most of its momentum among lawyers. Mr. Charles Rhyne, a recent president of the American Bar Association, declared in a speech to a group of associates in Boston a few weeks ago that there is an idea on the march in the world. He was referring to the idea that ultimately the rule of law must replace the balance of terror as the paramount factor in the affairs of men.

At the time of the grand meeting of the American Bar Association in London in July 1957, speaker after speaker at this meeting—the Chief Justice of the United States, the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain, the Attorney General of the United States, and Sir Winston Churchill—eloquently testified that the law must be made paramount in world affairs.

An adviser to the President, Mr. Arthur Larson, left the White House staff to establish a world rule of law center at Duke University.

One hundred and eighty-five representatives of the legal professions of many nations of earth met in New Delhi last January and agreed that there are basic universal principles on which lawyers of the free world can agree.

A year ago, through the activity of the bar association and by proclamation of the President, May 1—the Communist May Day—became Law Day in the United States. The bar association stimulated more than 20,000 meetings over the country on the first Law Day. In a few weeks, this tribute to an advancing idea will be repeated on a far greater scale.

President Eisenhower, you will recall, said in his state of the Union message last January: "It is my purpose to intensify efforts during the coming 2 years * * * to the end that the rule of law may replace the obsolete rule of force in the affairs of nations. Measures toward this end will be proposed later, including reexamination of our relation to the International Court of Justice."

I am now convinced, and in this I reflect the steadfast purpose of the President, and the wholehearted support of the Secretary of State and the Attorney General, that the time has now come to take the initiative in the direction of establishment of the rule of law in the world to replace the rule of force.

Under the Charter of the United Nations and the Statute of the International Court of Justice, institutions for the peaceful composing of differences among nations and for law giving exist in the international community. Our primary problem today is not the creation of new international institutions, but the fuller and more fruitful use of the institutions we already possess.

The International Court of Justice is a case in point. Its relative lack of judicial business—in its 12-year history an average of only two cases a year have come before the tribunal of 15 outstanding international jurists—underlines the untried potentialities of this Court. While it would be foolish to suppose that litigation before the Court is the answer to all the world's problems, this method of settling disputes could profitably be employed in a wider range of cases than is presently done.

As the President indicated in his state of the Union message, it is time for the United States to reexamine its own position with regard to the Court. Clearly all disputes regarding domestic matters must remain permanently within the jurisdiction of our own courts. Only matters which are essentially international in character should be referred to the International Court. But the United States reserved the right to determine unilaterally whether the subject matter of a particular dispute is within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States and is therefore excluded from the jurisdiction of the Court. As a result of this position on our part, other nations have adopted similar reservations. This is one of the major reasons for the lack of judicial business before the Court.

To remedy this situation the administration will shortly submit to the Congress recommendations for modifying this reservation. It is our hope that by our taking the initiative in this way, other countries may be persuaded to accept and agree to a wider jurisdiction of the International Court.

There is one class of disputes between nations which, in the past, has been one of the primary causes of war. These economic disputes assume major importance today at a time when the cold war may be shifting its major front from politics and ideology to the so-called ruble war for the trade and the development of new and neutral countries.

As far as international trade is concerned, an imposing structure of international agreements already exists. More complex and urgent than trade, as such, is the area of international investment. For in this area will be determined one of the most burning issues of our times—whether the economic development of new nations, so essential to their growth in political self-confidence and successful self-government, will be accomplished peacefully or violently, swiftly or wastefully, in freedom or in regimentation and terror.

We must begin by recognizing that the task of providing the necessary capital for investment in underdeveloped countries is a job too big for mere Government money. Only private money, privately managed, can do it right in many sectors of needed development. And private investment requires a sound and reliable framework of laws in which to work.

Economic development, involving as it does so many lawyers and so many private investors, will tend to spread and promote more civilized legal systems wherever it goes. Already, in its effort to encourage U.S. private investment abroad, the U.S. Government has negotiated treaties of commerce with 17 nations since 1946, tax conventions with 21 nations, and special investment guarantee agreements under the Mutual Security Act with 40 nations. A host of other special arrangements are in effect, such as those under which we have helped six nations draft better domestic legislation relating to foreign investment.

What has been done is for the most part good but there are several areas where additional action is called for. The countries that need economic development most are too often least likely to have the kind of laws, government, and climate that will attract investment. The political risks of expropriation and inconvertibility against which ICA presently sells insurance are not the only political risks that investors fear. Three U.S. Government commissions, as well as numerous private experts, have recently recommended a variety of improvements in our machinery for fostering foreign investment.

I select three for particular endorsement. Our laws should permit the establishment of foreign business corporations meriting special tax treatment, so that their foreign earnings can be reinvested abroad free of U.S. tax until the U.S. investor actually receives his reward. In addition, more tax treaties should be speedily negotiated to permit tax sparing and other reciprocal encouragements to investors. The ICA guarantee program should be extended to include such risks as revolution and civil strife. Finally, a concerted effort should be made to extend our whole treaty and guarantee system into more countries, especially those in most need of development.

The great adventure of economic development through a worldwide expansion of private investment is bound to develop many new forms and channels of cooperation between governments and between individuals of different nations.

We need not fear this adventure; indeed we should welcome it. For if it sufficiently engages the imagination and public spirit of the legal profession and others who influence public opinion, it must be accompanied by the discovery or rediscovery, in countries old and new, of the legal principles and the respect for substantive law on which wealth and freedom alike are grounded.

There are encouraging signs at least that we are on the threshold of real progress toward creating more effective international law for the settlement of economic disputes between individuals and between nations.

Turning to the political area, we have now come far enough along in the great historic conflict between the free nations and the Communist bloc to know that negotiation and discussion alone will not necessarily resolve the fundamental issues between us. This has proved to be the case whether the negotiations took place through the very helpful processes of the United Nations, or at the conference table of foreign ministers, or even at what we now call the summit.

What emerges, eventually, from these meetings at the conference table are agreements. We have made a great many agreements with the Soviet leaders from the time of Yalta and Potsdam. A major missing element in our agreements with the Soviet leaders has been any provision as to how disputes about the meaning of the agreements in connection with their implementation could be decided.

Looking back at the first summit conference at Geneva, for example, we find that it produced an agreement, signed by the Soviet leaders, which elevated the hopes of the entire world.

It should be noted, however, that the President and the Secretary of State repeatedly warned both before and after the holding of the conference that success could be measured only in deeds. One of the announced purposes of the conference was to test the Soviet sincerity by the standard of performance.

The summit conference has since been characterized by some as a failure, but in terms of agreements, as such, it was a success.

Let me quote briefly from that agreement: "The heads of government, recognizing their common responsibility for the settlement of the German question and the reunification of Germany, have agreed that the settlement of the German question and the reunification of Germany by means of free elections shall be carried out in conformity with the national interests of the German people and the interests of European security."

In other words, those who participated in the conference, including Mr. Khrushchev, agreed at Geneva on a sound method for dealing with the German problem—the very same problem from which he has now fathered the new crisis at Berlin. But while the agreement seemed clear, as events subsequently developed, Mr. Khrushchev's understanding of its meaning was ostensibly different from ours.

The crucial question remained—how was the agreement to be effective when the parties disagreed as to what it meant? This is typical of a problem that can arise wherever any agreement is entered into between nations.

In looking to the future what practical steps can we take to meet this problem? I will not even suggest to you that there is any simple answer to this question. For obviously there can be none. But I do believe there is a significant step we can take toward finding an answer.

We should take the initiative in urging that in future agreements provisions be included to the effect (1) that disputes which may arise as to the interpretation of the agreement should be submitted to the International Court of Justice at The Hague; and (2) that the nations signing the agreement should be bound by the decision of the Court in such cases.

Such provisions will, of course, still leave us with many formidable questions involving our relationships with the Communist nations in those cases where they ignore an agreement completely apart from its interpretation. But I believe this would be a major step forward in developing a rule of law for the settlement of political disputes between nations and in the direction all free men hope to pursue. If there is no provision for settling disputes as to what an international agreement means and one nation is acting in bad faith, the agreement has relatively little significance. In the absence of such a provision an agreement can be flagrantly nullified by a nation acting in bad faith whenever it determines it is convenient to do so.

While this proposal has not yet been adopted as the official U.S. position, I have discussed it at length with Attorney General Rogers and with officials of the State Department and on the basis of these discussions I am convinced that it has merit and should be given serious consideration in the future.

The International Court of Justice is not a Western instrumentality. It is a duly constituted body under the United Nations Charter and has been recognized and established by the Soviet Union along with the other signatories to the charter.

There is no valid reason why the Soviets should not be willing to join with the nations of the free world in taking this step in the direction of submitting differences with regard to interpretation of agreements between nations to a duly established international court and thereby further the day when the rule of law will become a reality in the relations between nations.

And, on our part, as Secretary Dulles said in his speech before the New York State Bar Association on January 31: "Those nations which do have common standards should, by their conduct and example, advance the rule of law by submitting their disputes to the International Court of Justice, or to some other international tribunal upon which they agree."

We should be prepared to show the world by our example that the rule of law, even in the most trying circumstances, is the one system which all free men of good will must support.

In this connection it should be noted that at the present time in our own country our system of law and justice has come under special scrutiny, as it often has before in periods when we have been engaged in working out basic social relationships through due process of law. It is certainly proper for any of us to disagree with an opinion of a court or courts. But all Americans owe it to the most fundamental propositions of our way of life to take the greatest care in making certain that our criticisms of court decisions do not become attacks on the institution of the court itself.

Mr. Khrushchev has proclaimed time and again that he and his associates in the Kremlin, to say nothing of the Soviet peoples, desire only a fair competition to test which system, communism or free capitalism, can better meet the legitimate aspirations of mankind for a rising standard of living.

Perhaps it is significant that the leaders of the free world do not feel obliged to so proclaim so often. The world knows that this is the only kind of competition which the free nations desire. It is axiomatic that free people do not go to war except in defense of freedom. So obviously we welcome this kind of talk from Mr. Khrushchev. We welcome a peaceful competition with the Communists to determine who can do the most for mankind.

Mr. Khrushchev also knows, as we do, that a competition is not likely to remain peaceful unless both sides understand the rules and are willing to have them fairly enforced by an impartial umpire. He has pointedly reminded the world that Soviet troops are not in Germany to play skittles. The free peoples passionately wish that Mr. Khrushchev's troops, as well as their own, could find it possible to play more skittles and less atomic war games. But we remind him that his troops could not even play skittles without rules of the game.

If the Soviets mean this talk of peaceful competition, then they have nothing to fear from the impartial rules impartially judged which will make such peaceful competition possible.

The Soviet leaders claim to be acutely aware of the lessons of history. They are constantly quoting the past to prove their contention that communism is the wave of the future. May I call to their attention one striking conclusion that is found in every page of recorded history. It is this: the advance of civilization, the growth of culture, and the perfection of all the finest qualities of mankind have all been accompanied by respect for law and justice and by the constant growth of the use of law in place of force.

The barbarian, the outlaw, the bandit are symbols of a civilization that is either primitive or decadent. As men grow in wisdom, they recognize that might does not make right; that true liberty is freedom under law; and that the arrogance of power is a pitiful substitute for justice and equity.

Hence once again we say to those in the Kremlin who boast of the superiority of their system: Let us compete in peace, and let our course of action be such that the choice we offer uncommitted peoples is not a choice between progress and reaction, between high civilization and a return to barbarism, between the rule of law and the rule of force.

In a context of justice, of concern for the millions of men and women who yearn for peace, of a constant striving to bring the wealth abounding in this earth to those who today languish in hunger and want—in such a context, competition between the Communist world and the free world would indeed be meaningful. Then we could say without hesitation: Let the stronger system win, knowing that both systems would be moving in a direction of a world of peace, with increasing material prosperity serving as a foundation for a flowering of the human spirit.

We could then put aside the hatred and distrust of the past and work for a better world. Our goal will be peace. Our instrument for achieving peace will be law and justice. Our hope will be that, under these conditions, the vast energies now devoted to weapons of war will instead be used to clothe, house, and feed the entire world. This is the only goal worthy of our aspirations. Competing in this way, nobody will lose, and mankind will gain.

FOREIGN MILITARY AID

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks what I consider to be a very penetrating article on foreign military aid, written by one of the great military authorities of our country, Hanson W. Baldwin. I ask that the entire article be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Apr. 4–15, 1959]

FOREIGN MILITARY AID—DOUBTS OF ITS COMBAT EFFECTIVENESS REFLECTED IN CONGRESSIONAL DEBATE

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

The continuing debate on foreign military aid, now resumed after the congressional recess, has become a recurring phenomenon of each legislative session.

The debate reflects far more than a thwarted longing for the dear dead days beyond recall when isolationism and a fortress America strategy were viable political-economic-military concepts. Nostalgia and a human desire to get away from the world's problems are inherent in the perennial foreign-aid debate, but there are other more important factors.

One is a feeling, fostered by the origin of the foreign-aid programs, that there should be some finite end in sight to a program of overseas aid. When foreign aid was started Congress and public opinion believed that the aid was temporary, to help fill the vacuums of power left by World War II. But it has assumed a permanent character over the years and the pressure of high taxation prompts an annual reexamination of the program.

LITTLE REVIEW PROVIDED

Another factor that has provoked increasingly intensive analysis of foreign military aid by Congress is the lack of adequate mechanisms in the executive branch of Government for continuous critical review of the program's combat effectiveness.

An ad hoc committee to study foreign military aid, headed by William H. Draper, Jr., is now undertaking such a review in behalf of the President, but such judgments should be continuously available, in the opinion of Congress.

There are also some serious military reservations in the Pentagon. These apply, not to the principle of collective security, of overseas allies, nor of foreign aid, but to some of the methods and practices that have characterized the program.

The old shibboleth so often used to sell the program that a dollar spent overseas to train and equip allies buys much more combat effectiveness than a dollar spent on U.S. forces is particularly resented by some officers in the Pentagon. It is certainly open to serious challenge.

CALLED CHEAPER

The basis for this easy generalism is, of course, that foreign soldiers and equipment are cheaper, that the Nation can get more divisions, more bang for a buck. But omitted from this inaccurate formula is the factor of comparative quality. Too often no detailed analysis, country by country, is applied as a qualifying factor.

There are other factors in certain countries that, in the opinion of some qualified military men, have seriously reduced in those countries the value of the foreign military aid program. Too often military aid has been used as a political prop, or for nationalistic prestige purposes, as in Iraq. It would be hard to prove that the money spent for military aid to Iraq has served any really useful purpose, either military or political.

Too often the United States attempts to build in small undeveloped countries armies after its own image, with all the formal trappings that go with a major industrialized state. And too often, when dealing with its largest allies, the Nation has been reluctant, or slow, to furnish them the arms that have for them major political and military significance today—nuclear weapons and missiles.

CHANGES ADVOCATED

Many military observers believe that there should be some important changes in the Nation's objectives and methods in some countries. In many of the smaller countries the original objective of military aid has been completely altered with the years. In small countries, like Thailand, there are really only two valid goals for any military-aid program: An internal security force powerful enough to prevent any Communist coup or conquest by subversion and a small "trigger" force, ready to fire the first shots against external aggression.

Both of these forces should also have the capability of organizing, leading, and developing, with this country's help, a major indigenous guerrilla effort in case of invasion. The kind of armed force needed and the type of warfare to be waged would obviously vary with the terrain, climate, people, and other conditions.

But the sort of defense that the Tibetans have employed against the Chinese Communists offers far more hope in terms of combat effectiveness for each dollar spent than a "show army" of tanks and jet planes that would always be outnumbered and that the smaller nations could never properly employ.

Yet today the United States is still trying to create around the world forces in its own image, and despite Algeria and its lessons, there has been far too little attention paid to guerrilla warfare and how to meet it.

In the case of our larger allies—France, the United Kingdom, Italy, West Germany, and so on—the problem differs materially. Despite the political and military dangers of a greater dispersal of nuclear arms, it is clear that such a dispersion will take place, no matter what the United States does.

These nations have acquired or will acquire nuclear weapons and missiles, but with this country's help they can become nuclear-missile powers of importance far more rapidly and at less cost than if they must depend upon their own resources. This affirmative policy, fortunately, has been endorsed, but practically it has been implemented far too slowly.

These factors, plus individual mistakes and inefficiencies, are some of the problems that underlie the congressional debate on foreign aid. They deserve continuing critical examination, not only by Congress, but by the executive branch of Government.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, within the 3-minute rule, I should like to read a paragraph or two for special emphasis. Mr. Baldwin says:

The old shibboleth, so often used to sell the program that a dollar spent overseas to train and equip allies buys much more combat effectiveness than a dollar spent on U.S. forces is particularly resented by some officers in the Pentagon. It is certainly open to serious challenge.

The basis for this easy generalism is, of course, that foreign soldiers and equipment are cheaper; that the Nation can get more divisions, more bang for a buck. But omitted from this inaccurate formula is the factor of comparative quality. Too often no detailed analysis, country by country, is applied as a qualifying factor.

It was along those lines of criticism that a special study made for the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate 2 or 3 years ago, in connection with a group of contracts for which we paid $240,000 of the taxpayers' money, caused me to believe we ought to make a very careful analysis of the facts in regard to both foreign military aid and economic aid, to the end that we would strengthen both of those programs by eliminating what I am satisfied is great waste in both.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.

INTEGRITY IN BUDGETING

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, every Federal and State regulatory body in its scrutiny of private utility operating statements and balance sheets is concerned about the integrity of the accounts.

With eagle eye practice from years of experience, the accounting sleuths of the utility commissions conduct a search along the boundary line between capital investments and operating expenditures.

The Federal Power Commission raised its collective eyebrows, for example, when a recent investigation of private utility expenditures for full-page national magazine advertisements disclosed that one electric company was capitalizing the cost of the advertisement and thereby making that cost a part of its rate base on which it then claimed a "fair" rate of return in perpetuity.

The more common line of demarcation comes down to such day to day questions as accounting for the price of an insulator on a utility pole. When first installed, an insulator is capitalized. But a replacement is considered operating or maintenance expense.

The strict observance of this line of demarcation results in an accounting structure that has integrity. The investor is thus given assurance that the capital structure is not full of water.

On the other hand, the Internal Revenue Service wants to be assured that the operating statement of a manufacturing company does not include capital items as tax deductions in the guise of operating expense.

With all this concern over accounting and budgeting integrity in the private enterprise sector of the economy, it is increasingly a matter of great concern to me that the entire concept of the Federal budget lacks the very integrity which we so vigorously impose on private business.

The businessman every day must make decisions on whether to buy a building or rent, whether to buy a machine or employ more people. The city manager must decide whether to have the police patrol on foot or in cars. These decisions involve the distinction between capital investments and operating expenditures. The integrity of management decisions depends on the distinction.

The proposal for a capital budget for the Federal Government pertains to the managerial and accounting integrity of the Federal establishments. It applies a fundamental business principle to public business.

This is much more than a matter of practicing what we preach or what is good for the goose is good for the gander.

Integrity, as thousands of businessmen have learned to their sorrow, is much more than, and can be quite different from, honesty. Many an honest business has gone sour because of poor bookkeeping.

The proposal for a capital budget points the way to a higher integrity of administrative procedure. It is like adding a fourth dimension, the dimension of time and time concepts, to our three-dimension space world.

The capital budget makes it possible to distinguish the short-range view of the 1 year operating expense from the long-range view of the capital investment that is wealth producing and may last for centuries.

Government, much more than individuals and corporations, must be able to take the long-range point of view. The capital budget is the tool for looking ahead, for raising our sights to take into account the needs of generations to come.

Every farmer makes decisions as between "a quick buck" or the long-range husbanding and conservation of his land. In the latter case, he practices the integrity of thinking that is the essence of the capital budget. When he practices capital budgeting, he is being a good steward, the trustee who will turn over to his son a better farm.

The Federal Government will gain in stature and in public respect as it demonstrates not by words and preaching but by action and deeds that it serves in the role of the good steward, looking after the needs of generations to come.

The Government must take the point of view of the long term, as well as the short term. It must provide the leadership for the long-range point of view. It must hold out its spear to distinguish between the temporary current operating expenditures and the long-range capital investments.

These are some of the reasons why I think the capital budget, as provided in my bill, S. 1244, will point the way to a higher integrity of public administration. The adoption of the capital budget should help us all, both in and out of government, to raise our sights and give greater weight to the long-range point of view.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a column by A. Robert Smith, which was published in the Eugene, Oreg., Register-Guard on April 6, 1959, on the subject of the Morse and Humphrey capital budget bills.

There being no objection, the column was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MORSE, HUMPHREY BILLS WOULD ALTER U.S. BUDGETING

(By A. Robert Smith)

WASHINGTON.—With the battle of the budget continuing to loom as the fundamental political factor between President Eisenhower and the Democrats in Congress on such issues as Federal airport aid, a housing bill, school construction aid, and other so-called spending bills, increased attention is being focused on proposals to have the Government distinguish between its investments and its spending.

During the past month, Senator WAYNE MORSE, Democrat, of Oregon, and Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY, Democrat, of Minnesota, introduced different bills with the similar purpose of creating a capital budget that would list those projects on which the Federal Government can expect to realize a tangible return. Senator BOB BARTLETT, Democrat, of Alaska, and WILLIAM PROXMIRE, Democrat, of Wisconsin, are cosponsors of MORSE'S bill. Representative AL ULLMAN, Democrat, of Oregon, is sponsoring it in the House.

MORE PROGRAMS

The political attraction of the capital budget idea is that it would make it possible for the Government to undertake more programs involving Federal financial assistance without unbalancing the regular spending budget. It would offer a means, in a word, for both the economizers and the spenders to achieve a political victory in the battle of the budget.

The capital budget idea has won some impressive endorsements that are nonpolitical, however. It was recommended by the Hoover Commission on Government Reorganization. And by Committee for Economic Development, composed of business and industrial leaders. Also the Congressional Joint Economic Committee headed by Senator PAUL DOUGLAS, Democrat, of Illinois.

Under the Morse bill, the President would be asked to separate from his list of usual nonreimbursable expenditures in the annual budget all those items which met both of two tests: that they represent a useful economic life of more than 10 years; and that they be revenue-producing or self-liquidating in nature. All of these items would go into the separate budget as capital investments.

"Mortgage loans, such as REA and FHA loans, are included in productive capital investments, because they meet both tests," MORSE explained. "The network of Federal corporations and similar activities, such as Bonneville Power Administration, should be treated as productive capital investments.

"Flood control dams would not meet the test of revenue producing. Irrigation investment would not meet the test of interest repayment. Farm crop mortgages would not meet the test of revenue nor the test of 10 years' life. Thus none of these capital investments would qualify as productive capital investments as here defined," MORSE added.

MORSE said he made the definition of a capital investment intentionally severe. Otherwise, all sorts of spending programs could be lumped into this capital budget to evade the problem of balancing the regular spending budget.

NEW LIGHT ON DEBT

A capital budget would also put a new light on the national debt by distinguishing between what MORSE called live weight debt and deadweight debt.

"An identification of the presently existing productive capital investments of the Federal Government, such as FHA, REA, and other gilt-edge loans, and the net worth of Government corporations and such long-range revenue-producing assets as hydroelectric facilities, the Alaska Railroad, the St. Lawrence Seaway, and many others," MORSE declared, "would reduce the public debt to a much more meaningful figure."

Senator HUMPHREY said, "Every businessman is familiar with a capital budget" because businesses prepare balance sheets which list assets on one side and liabilities on the other. He said it is time we put the Federal Government in its bookkeeping methods on a businesslike basis also.

"If American Telephone & Telegraph Co. maintained a budget like that of the Federal Government, we would still be communicating in this country by smoke signals," HUMPHREY contended. "It is time we stopped lumping expenditures for paperclips with investments in public power projects."

HUMPHREY recalled that last year Congress had an emergency housing bill which authorized a Federal agency to use an extra $1 billion to buy home mortgages.

BILLION IN ASSETS

"Immediately the cry was raised that the Congress was spending a billion dollars," he recalled. "No mention was made of the fact that the Government was gaining a billion dollars in assets or that this billion dollars would be paid in full with interest. No, as far as the public knew, from newspaper reports and the charges of reckless spending, the Congress had simply spent a billion dollars for which there was nothing to show and which the taxpayers would have to pay. This, of course, is simply not the case. A capital budget would have shown in a true light that the Government in this case invested $1 billion, and gained $1 billion in assets."

U.S. ASSETS

In the context of the perspective these Senators are trying to establish for viewing Government fiscal policy, the House Government Operations Committee earlier this year tabulated the real property and personal property assets of the Federal Government. The remaining public domain, including mineral resources, for example, was valued at $14 billion. The committee concluded:

"This Federal property inventory report records, as of June 30, 1958, Federal real and personal assets as being over $262 billion. It is interesting to observe, in this connection, that the size of the national debt, as of June 30, 1958, was reported as being over $276 billion."

THE PROPOSED NEZ PERCE DAM PROJECT ON THE MIDDLE SNAKE RIVER

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the Multnomah County Labor Council, AFL–CIO, and the Idaho-Oregon-Washington Hells Canyon Association have provided me with copies of their resolutions of April 6 and March 9, respectively, relative to the proposed Nez Perce Dam project on the Middle Snake River.

I ask unanimous consent that these resolutions be printed in the RECORD at the close of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, it is with special pleasure that I ask that these be made available for the information of my colleagues, because in my opinion both resolutions express strong support for a project which is clearly in the public interest. Construction of the Nez Perce project should be postponed temporarily pending a solution of the fish-passage problem, but I have every reason to believe that within a reasonably short period of time an intensive study by the experts in this field will produce a solution to the fish-passage problem. The mere fact that we are awaiting the solution to the problem of fish passage should not serve as a basis for sacrificing a great multipurpose project through the construction of one or two inferior dams in the same general reach of the river.

My views on the Nez Perce project were set forth in a statement I submitted on March 14, 1959, to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors in Washington, D.C. I ask unanimous consent that an extract from the statement containing my comments on the Nez Perce project be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the extract was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

For the most notable example of what I mean by partial development rather than maximum development, let's look at the recommendations for the stretch of the Snake River above Nez Perce. Under the principle of full development and maximum net benefit the 1948 report protected full development by providing for such projects as high Hells Canyon and Nez Perce in this strategic reach of the river. Ten years later both projects are missing from the division engineer's major water plan. Justification for incomplete and partial development in this report is based on a nebulous time equation analysis used by the division engineer. By application of this formula the division engineer apparently is trying to justify the retreat from a superior, maximum-use, multipurpose project, to a more costly and inferior combination of projects.

The substitution of two dams to provide substantially the same accomplishments as one in the same general location is obviously illogical. The illogic is very well borne out by the cost and benefit figures given by the division engineer in the report.

I do not propose that Nez Perce be built now, it should be stressed. But I have confidence in the ability of the Nation's scientists and engineers to solve the complex problem of fish passage and conservation and expansion of fishery resources. I am satisfied they can do the job if our scientific and technical resources are promptly and assiduously applied.

Therefore, I believe the recommendation in the current report, favoring construction of High Mountain Sheep and Lower Canyon, be set aside, and that Nez Perce Dam of optimum height be recommended, subject to solution of the fish-passage problem. Above all, this ideal site should be reserved for its full contribution to our people and to posterity.

NEZ PERCE RESOLUTION

Whereas Nez Perce Dam on the Middle Snake River was proposed by the Corps of Engineers in 1948, but not recommended for construction because of the fish passage problem; and

Whereas Nez Perce Dam would be the largest dam in the world, with a hydroelectric power capacity of 2,500,000 kilowatts, which is greater than that of Grand Coulee and Russia's Kuibyshev Dam of 2,300,000 kilowatts; and

Whereas power from Nez Perce could be sold at about 1.5 mills per kilowatt-hour and is the lowest cost power known to be available for development in the United States; and

Whereas this low cost power would make possible the development of other vital natural resources in the Pacific Northwest, would make possible the creation of new jobs and new industries; and

Whereas the economy of the Pacific Northwest States has been worsening during the past several years, with regular seasonal unemployment compounded by business failure and the lack of sufficient economic growth to meet the needs of a growing population; and

Whereas the vast storage capacity of Nez Perce Dam, which would control both the Middle Snake and Salmon Rivers, would contribute not only to the control of floods but to needed power production at downstream dams especially during the power-short winter months; and

Whereas winter power shortages frequently force industrial shutdowns at the very same period that our seasonal lumber and agricultural industries are closed, making year around jobs and employment in any field exceedingly difficult; and

Whereas the only obstacle to immediate construction of Nez Perce Dam is the as-yet unsolved problem of downstream passage of fingerlings over high dams; and

Whereas this same problem interferes with the construction of all other high dams or combinations of dams in the same reach of rivers; and

Whereas other dams proposed as alternates to Nez Perce are neither as good nor as economical as Nez Perce; and

Whereas despite the spectacular progress made through research in solving fish passage problems at high dams, and the prospect that further research will lead to a solution of the problem at Nez Perce, the Corps of Engineers has not yet proposed a long-range fisheries research program nor a special Middle Snake River fisheries research program; and

Whereas the fish passage problem should be solved within the next 5 years, granted sufficient effort on the part of the Corps of Engineers and State and Federal fisheries agencies; and

Whereas other sources of hydroelectric power are available for development during that 5-year period that will not interfere with ultimate construction of Nez Perce Dam; and

Whereas the Army Engineers' own study shows the great and undebatable superiority and economy of Nez Perce Dam over proposed alternatives; and

Whereas the best interests of the economy of the Northwest and the people of the region will best be served by its ultimate construction: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Multnomah County Labor Council, AFL–CIO, at Portland, Oreg., on March 30, 1959, endorses the Nez Perce project and opposes the alternative proposals; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors to recommend to Congress the authorization and ultimate construction of Nez Perce Dam; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge the Corps of Engineers and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors to prepare and present to Congress, in coordination with State and Federal fisheries agencies, a long-range program for upstream fisheries research and conservation, and special Middle Snake River fisheries research program with emphasis on solving the problem of fish passage at high dams; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge Congress to authorize the Nez Perce Dam for Federal construction deferred until a speedy solution is found for the fish problem, or in other definite ways to preserve the Nez Perce reach for ultimate construction of Nez Perce Dam; and be it finally

Resolved, That we urge the adoption of similar resolutions by the Oregon AFL–CIO and other labor councils and unions in the State of Oregon.

MULTNOMAH COUNTY LABOR COUNCIL, AFL–CIO,
GORDON SWOPE,
Secretary pro tempore.

RESOLUTION BY THE IDAHO-OREGON-WASHINGTON HELLS CANYON ASSOCIATION URGING THE AUTHORIZATION OF NEZ PERCE DAM WITH ACTUAL CONSTRUCTION TO BE DEFERRED UNTIL THE FISH PROBLEM IS SOLVED

Whereas the Corps of Engineers in 1948 proposed the construction of the Nez Perce Dam on the Snake River but deferred recommending construction pending solution of the fish passage problem; and

Whereas the Nez Perce Dam would be the largest dam in the world and have a hydroelectric power capacity of 2,500,000 kilowatts which exceeds that of Grand Coulee Dam and is even greater than Russia's Kuibyshev Dam of 2,300,000 kilowatts which is now the largest hydroproject in the world; and

Whereas Nez Perce power would cost about 1.5 mills per kilowatt hour which is the lowest cost power known to be available for development in the Nation; and

Whereas this low cost power would open up the mineral and other resources of the area, attract chemical and metallurgical industries, provide new job opportunities, improve the per capita income of our people, and raise the standard of living; and

Whereas Nez Perce Dam has great engineering and geographic advantages because one dam would dam two rivers and create two reservoirs at a saving of over $150 million compared to the next alternative; and

Whereas the Nez Perce Dam has the advantages of an excellent rock foundation and great economy because no cost will be involved for relocation of railroads, farms, roads, or towns; and

Whereas Nez Perce Dam would swallow up the floods of both rivers and stabilize navigation conditions from Lime Point and Lewiston to the Pacific Ocean as well as providing urgently needed flood control at all downstream areas; and

Whereas Nez Perce Dam would hold the stored floodwater for release in winter to create a great amount of downstream power when it is most urgently needed to carry winter peak loads; and

Whereas the only impediment to immediate start of construction of Nez Perce Dam is the fish problem, specifically the downstream passage of fingerlings; and

Whereas such spectacular progress has been made through fisheries research and actual operations at Brownlee Dam, Pelton Dam, Baker Dam, and Engeltrout Dam, as well as through the Japanese method of fish farming, which indicates that a satisfactory solution of the fish problem should be assured within 5 years; and

Whereas the fisheries problem is in fact also an impediment at this time to the construction of the alternatives to Nez Perce Dam; and

Whereas such a 5-year delay can be advantageously used to build the high Asotin Dam to provide barge navigation to the Nez Perce Dam and thus avoid the construction of a $15-million railroad for construction purposes; and

Whereas the 5-year delay of Nez Perce Dam would be feasible from a power standpoint since many alternative hydroelectric projects are available throughout the Pacific Northwest which would not involve the fish problem; and

Whereas the 308 review report clearly shows that the Nez Perce Dam is far and away the best and most economical development of the Snake River; and

Whereas the Nez Perce Dam would result in the fullest, comprehensive, multiple purpose development of the Snake River; and

Whereas Congress should authorize the Nez Perce Dam at this time in order to save the damsite and permit construction to start as soon as the fish problem is definitely solved: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Idaho, Oregon, and Washington Hells Canyon Association at Lewiston, Idaho, March 9, 1959, endorses the Nez Perce Dam and opposes the alternative schemes; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors to recommend the ultimate construction of Nez Perce Dam; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge Congress in the next omnibus bill to authorize the Nez Perce Dam but with actual construction to be deferred until the fish problem is solved.

THE "PACIFIC NORTHWEST ACCOUNT" BILL—RESOLUTION OF MADRAS-JEFFERSON COUNTY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point a resolution dated March 2, 1959, adopted by the Madras-Jefferson County Chamber of Commerce supporting the bill S. 1388, of which the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] is principal sponsor and I am a cosponsor.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas there has been introduced in the Congress of the United States, House bill 3510, to provide for the establishment by the Secretary of the Interior an account known as Pacific Northwest account bill dealing with the payment of construction costs on irrigation projects after 50 years; and

Whereas this Pacific Northwest account bill having been proposed and if enacted will greatly assist the irrigation farmers, in this north unit of the Deschutes project, to carry the load of the construction costs that have been incurred in securing water for the arid lands in this and other parts of Oregon, also other parts of the State; and

Whereas the assistance from the net power revenues produced by the large Government hydroelectric installations of the Western States is necessary to help these projects that have a high construction cost and cannot be paid out in the 50-year period as now required by law; that we feel there should be some relief granted for the irrigation farmers living on the projects that cannot be paid out in 50 years; also for the benefit of needed projects that can be constructed at the high costs that could not otherwise be constructed; and

Whereas this bill, we feel, would treat all projects alike and at the same time would materially assist in bringing more lands under irrigation; that by so doing would make more area for the people to live and have a home of their own; and

Whereas that under the terms of the bill as we understand it, only a part of the net revenues would be used and these revenues would be applicable after many of the hydroelectric projects have been paid in full, so that the Government of the United States, that originally built these projects had received all of their original costs; and

Whereas that, as above mentioned, we do have a project in this immediate area, north unit of the Deschutes project that would be greatly benefited in some 40 years; that the costs of said project were much higher than was originally expected or anticipated; that we feel that in this way our farmers and landowners can at some time in the future have the original costs reduced to such a figure that they can be paid out without great hardship; and

Whereas it may seem advisable in the future to enlarge this project as well as others built under similar circumstances; that if the same is enlarged and additional lands taken in, the costs would be even higher than that during the construction of the original project; that our district would be in a better position to take care of the increased population that might in the future desire to settle in this part of Oregon:

Now, therefore, we desire to go on record as favoring this Senate bill 1388 introduced by Senator MURRAY, of Montana; that it was unanimously voted by this organization to support this bill and urge all of the Oregon delegation in Congress to use their utmost efforts to see the same made into law; that we feel it is to the best interests of all of the people of the Columbia River Watershed; that all of the projects will eventually receive the same necessary benefit;

That we request that this resolution as passed by this Madras-Jefferson County Chamber of Commerce be forwarded to the Oregon delegation in Congress; to the sponsors of this bill and that the same be used at the hearing before the Committee; that the same be spread on the minutes of this hearing as an expression of the views of the Madras-Jefferson County Chamber of Commerce.

MADRAS-JEFFERSON COUNTY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
DON LEHMAN, President.

Attest:

HOWARD W. TURNER, Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JORDAN in the chair). Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is concluded.

PROGRESS IN LATIN AMERICA

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, yesterday was Pan-American Day, a day designated to commemorate the union of the Americas.

We should today and every day hereafter reaffirm our dedication to peace and justice, to friendship and cooperation between all the nations of the Western Hemisphere.

The Senate was not in session yesterday in order that proper tribute could be paid by the Members of the Senate to the memory of one of our greatest Senators, Robert Taft. For this reason, many of us who had intended to speak on Pan-American Day and review the progress and the changes resulting since the last Pan-American Day were unable to do so.

Therefore, today I should like to occupy some of the Senators' time in reviewing what changes have occurred and the little progress that has been made in this area during the past year.

There has been no shortage of conferences, discussions, and words with respect to what we should do to improve our Latin American relations, but unfortunately most of them add up to the conclusion that, "Yes, one of these days we should sit down and really do something meaningful about Latin America."

Mr. President, it is high time we got off our conference chairs and began to act, because one of these days it may be too late. There is indisputable evidence that comes to us every day from the press, the radio, and particularly from those who travel in these Latin American countries that things are on the march, and in some cases they are not marching in the right direction.

It was my very great privilege to make what has now become an annual trip through some of these Latin American countries a few months ago. I made a tour of Mexico, Honduras, Guatemala, and Panama, and then on to the new Federation of the British West Indies, whose capital is located in Trinidad.

On this, my first visit to any of the countries since the regrettable incident which occurred on the Vice President's Latin American tour last year, I made additional studies of the testy and ticklish Latin American problems. I should like at this time to briefly recapitulate some of my observations and experiences on that tour, some of them heartening and others most disturbing, and point up conclusions which vividly indicate the necessity of immediate action on the part of the United States.

I went to Mexico shortly before President Adolfo Lopez Mateos was inaugurated.

During my 10-day stay, I was pleased to observe Mexico's economic and political progress. During its trial-and-error period following the revolution of 1910, Mexico suffered severely. Today the Mexican people can be justifiably proud of the hardships which they have endured to root out colonial, dictatorial and semifinal traditions that were strangling the development of Mexico as a modern nation.

We can be encouraged by the fact that the U.S. and Mexican relations are at a better point now than they ever have been. President Mateos' election was marked by the most peaceful, and at the same time, the heaviest voting ever held in Mexico.

No longer in the pistol-packing category, Mexico's men of action have learned—as we have—to negotiate a settlement instead of shooting for one.

President Eisenhower's visit to Mexico last month demonstrated the deep interest the American people hold in maintaining and strengthening our ties of friendship with Mexico.

Before getting into the minus points, let me stress a few more plus factors about Mexico. It was my privilege to talk with President Mateos and with Dr. Padilla Nervo, the Foreign Minister, while in Mexico.

President Mateos is a handsome man, young—only 48—charming and intellectual. He is the symbol of Mexico's newly formed middle class—a class which eats bread, not tortillas; a class which wears shoes and hopes and works for a brighter tomorrow. He comes from a family of historic importance, and he has made an impressive record as the peacemaking Secretary of Labor in the just past regime of President Adolfo Ruiz Cortines.

This man, President Mateos, who is Mexico's man of moderation, is a great admirer of our Majority Leader LYNDON JOHNSON. My visit with the President took place just before Senator JOHNSON'S visit was arranged, and throughout our discussion Lopez Mateos kept inquiring as to JOHNSON'S beliefs, background, and interests. I know that his visit with Senator JOHNSON later must have been a pleasant and profitable one for both.

President Mateos' thinking is along the lines of that of the liberals of our country, a radical change from policies heretofore. An avid reader, he reads well in English but does not yet speak it fluently. This man—who will guide the destiny of our next door neighbor for the next 6 years—seems certain of his country's future.

He is eager to attract U.S. investors, who no longer have the jitters about bringing their capital into this land so filled with opportunities. Our businessmen have helped the Mexican economy through investments and the Mexicans definitely want more.

I was impressed by President Mateos' independence and self-assurance. In our chat, which lasted almost 45 minutes, he was relaxed and interested even though many hundreds of people were waiting to present problems and make requests of him. I came away realizing that he is well aware of our efforts to help his country; it was a most rewarding and encouraging visit for me.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMATHERS. I am happy to yield to the able Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am very happy that my distinguished colleague the junior Senator from Florida is commenting, as he is, on the country of Mexico, our neighbor to the south.

As the Senator knows, my native State of Arizona borders on the State of Sonora, one of the fastest growing states in Mexico. During the days following the inauguration of President Mateos, it was my pleasure to visit with him for about half an hour, during which time we discussed a particular problem involving our mutual border.

I wish to corroborate what the Senator has said about general conditions in Mexico under President Mateos. We have every reason to expect that under this President's regime we shall see a very rapid advancement in living conditions in Mexico. We shall see industry grow. We shall see farming become mechanized and modernized. We shall see highways built. We shall see the country opened up.

I can only say to my colleagues in the Senate and to my fellow Americans that instead of visiting Europe, instead of visiting the Far East, if one has not paid a visit to the delightful country of Mexico, one has not really lived.

The former Ambassador from Mexico to this country, Senor Tello, is now Minister of Foreign Affairs. I do not know whether the Senator intends to comment on him or not, but he is a member of the new team in Mexico, which is bringing the potential giant to the foreground.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. SMATHERS. I thank the able Senator from Arizona for his comments. I think it has been well demonstrated over the years that he is not only one of Mexico's good friends in the United States, but he is also most sympathetic with the problems of all of Latin America. I thank the Senator for reminding me of Ambassador Tello. I have not referred to him here. As the able Senator has said, he is the new Foreign Minister of Mexico. He is a man who understands the problems with which we in the United States are confronted. I am certain he will appreciate the efforts of the Senator from Arizona and others of us who have continually tried to improve the relationships between Mexico and the United States.

While in Mexico, I talked to representatives of the mining and sugar industries. The future of lead and zinc has Mexicans frankly worried. Although their interests were not hurt as badly by the quota imposed on them last September as had been predicted, the situation still demands a close watch. We cannot extend our hands in friendship, while at the same time knocking off 20 percent of our lead and zinc imports from this good neighbor, which at the same time is our second best customer.

In Mexico's case the raising of import duties was like a sharp slash across the cheek, for lead production there is worth more than $60 million and the zinc output is valued at $74 million. Before the quota system was enforced, 90 percent of Mexico's mining production had been marketed in this country.

Senor Garcia Reynoso, who was then the director-general of the National Union of Sugar Producers and who is now the Under Secretary of the Minister of Economy, participated in my conversation with representatives of the sugar industry.

Their problem is briefly this: The Mexicans would like to sell enough sugar to the United States to earn the dollars they need to purchase machinery for sugar refineries. This machinery is purchased here in the United States. I visited several sugar mills and saw what they were doing and how they were doing it.

Mexico is not a sugar-surplus country. It needs additional machinery and more sugar to meet the demands of its own people. Obviously, their claims should be seriously considered when we take up the sugar bill in the Congress this year.

On the minus side of Mexico it can be marked heavily with red ink that the Communist threat is large and menacing. The Russian Embassy in Mexico City has more than 100 Reds assigned there. Officially it is as large as our own Embassy—and unofficialy larger—yet trade with Russia makes up less than two-tenths of 1 percent of Mexico's exports and imports. U.S.S.R. exports to Mexico came to $614, while imports totaled $140,000; whereas we trade over a billion dollars worth of goods a year. And there is a constant stream of Mexicans visiting the United States, and American tourists visiting Mexico. The figure of Communists at the Soviet Embassy in Mexico does not include those attached to embassies of Communist bloc countries.

We have only 63 Foreign Service officers stationed in Mexico.

There is considerable evidence that Mexico City acts as headquarters for much of the Communist activity now taking place throughout Latin America—a sort of school for would-be Reds. Mexico is in a peculiar position, for it permits the Communists to have freedom of movement and expression. The Communist Party is not registered as a party in Mexico, however, for they have less than the qualifying 75,000 members to register.

Perhaps, because of the seeming lack of strength in card-carrying members of the Communist Party, Mexico does not fear a threat. Yet, the Communists represent a sword of Damocles dangling over their heads and ours, for Red agitators are at work trying to undo everything we try to do.

Obviously, the Reds are designing to create tensions within Mexico to halt the progress being made under democratic institutions. A monthly magazine written in Spanish, called U.S.S.R., is distributed free throughout Mexico and represents more of the propaganda being funneled from Red headquarters. They seek to stir dissension and distrust between us and Mexico.

Last summer the Red agitators played an active part in inciting strikes which all but paralyzed the capital. Last February a strike cut off telegraph lines in Mexico City for 2 weeks.

The Government of Mexico is not unmindful of these Communist activities and only last week expelled two Soviet Embassy attachés from the country, charging they had a hand in the Easter weekend rail strike. Two other Red attachés were reported marked to go.

The recent flareup between Guatemala and Mexico over a Guatemalan patrol plane strafing some Mexican shrimp boats oddly enough became a vehicle for anti-United States Communist propaganda. Some fellow-traveling articles appeared in newspapers throughout Mexico to the effect that the whole affair was a U.S. plot to pit Mexico against Guatemala in accord with the old divide-and-conquer theory. Such a suggestion was ridiculous, of course. But that kind of Communist propaganda leaves a residue of poison.

If the Mexicans should become inflamed at the Colossus to the North—as we are called—by this bull-baiting, Red-flag waiving, then the Communists will have succeeded. We cannot permit this to happen.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMATHERS. I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Alaska.

Mr. GRUENING. I ask the able Senator from Florida, who has effectively devoted a great deal of time and attention to improving the relationships between the United States and our Latin-American neighbor republics, whether he does not agree with me that we should do everything we may properly do to improve our relations and strengthen our bonds with our one land-neighbor to the south, Mexico, and that that is of prime importance, in our international relations.

Mr. SMATHERS. I absolutely agree with the Senator from Alaska. I believe we are not giving to the subject the attention it deserves.

Mr. GRUENING. I am in full accord with the Senator from Florida. Is it not a fact that as we improve our relations with Mexico, we improve them thereby also with all the other Latin-American countries?

Mr. SMATHERS. The Senator is absolutely correct. What we do in relation to Mexico spills over into the other Latin-American countries. As a matter of fact what we do is appreciated by all the Latins in the other countries.

Mr. GRUENING. A very interesting article from the magazine the New Leader pointing out the leadership which Mexico is assuming among Latin-American countries was recently placed in the RECORD by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD]. In line with that article, it seems to me there is every good reason why we should be closely associated with Mexico in common efforts to improve our relationship and to help Mexico and ourselves develop economically and culturally, and on a basis of friendly intercourse and exchange proceed in ways tending to mutual advantage to bind more closely the ties of neighborliness and friendship.

Mr. SMATHERS. I thank the Senator for his observation. I agree with him fully.

The Americas must stand united against our common foe. As one, we should be up in arms against the Reds, lest they cause us to carry arms against one another.

Let me add here that I was extremely gratified by the good work being done in Mexico by our Ambassador, Robert Hill. He is an outstanding representative, for he speaks the language, tirelessly works to understand the problems and aspirations of Mexicans and, in turn, helps them to understand us. Energetic and capable, Ambassador Hill is doing an excellent job in one of the most dynamic and key posts in the Western Hemisphere.

HONDURAS

My next stop was Honduras, which is situated in the middle of Central America. On his last voyage, Columbus encountered Honduras and gave it that name—meaning depths—because of the deep water offshore. This mountainous country, which has a perpetual spring-like climate, once was the seat of the Mayan Indians' cultural and religious center.

Because it is nearly 90 percent mountainous, Honduras has a stupendous transportation problem. We can imagine how costly it would be to build and maintain roads on such precipitous terrain.

In fact, today, 1959, there are only about 25 miles of paved road in the entire country—a country whose area is about the size of the State of Pennsylvania. The rest of the roads, comprising some 1,400 miles, are dirt roads mostly over steep and hazardous ranges. During the rainy season, less than half are even passable.

This lack of transportation has been a major obstacle to Honduras' economic development. For example, there is no road connecting the east with the west. Most of the people are crowded into the western end of the country, while the fertile eastern portion lies nearly uninhabited.

Meeting President Ramon Villeda Morales was a privilege, for I discovered that this man, with a sensible program, speaks beautiful English and is well informed. Both a physician and a diplomat, the 41-year-old President won by a landslide in 1957 in the first free elections in some time.

Honduras had been in the hands of dictators and military juntas from 1932 until Dr. Villeda Morales assumed the reins. Dr. Villeda is familiar with the Washington scene, having served as Ambassador from his country to the United States before his election as President. He is friendly to the people of the United States and knowledgeable about our problems and aspirations and our desire to be helpful to his country.

Incidentally, I also met with some of Dr. Villeda Morales' Cabinet, among whom was Roberto Martinez Ordonez, then Minister of Public Works and Communications, who is an engineering graduate of the University of Alabama. He has a strong American flavor, having played football for Alabama in both the Orange and Sugar Bowls.

In this minister and in the Public Health Minister, also named Martinez, we have excellent allies and ambassadors issuing good will for the United States.

I was privileged to address a joint session of the congress in Honduras, where my impressions of what the United States was trying to do to improve relationships between our two countries were very cordinally received.

When I was flown to the Guayape Valley, I was able to observe in action our best type of technical cooperation which is combined with loans. This 25-mile-wide valley, with a river threading through it, had never been fully used by the Hondurans. It was isolated from the rest of the country because of the lack of roads and the absence of a bridge across the river.

Thanks to a $1.75 million credit made available to the Honduran Government from the so-called Smathers amendment funds, a basic road network is being built.

Access roads are going in to connect the valley with the town of Juticalpa, which already connects by means of an all-weather road to the population centers in the west. Moreover, the new bridge over the Guayape River means that both sides of the valley can make use of the road network.

Another U.S. university alumnus, Ernesto Crespo, an engineering graduate of Louisiana State University, is in charge of coordinating the Guayape Valley development project, which includes the training of Honduran Army troops in road construction. We have excellent ICA representatives in Honduras cooperating with the Honduran Government officials, and our Ambassador, Robert Newbegin, a practical, realistic man, is doing for us a useful and sensible job.

No one imagines that the economic problems of Honduras will evaporate with the opening to settlement of the Guayape Valley. The nation faces grave difficulties in its struggle to raise the living standards of the people. Per capita income amounts to scarcely $200 a year. More than 60 percent of those over 10 years of age are illiterate.

Less than one-half of the children are today receiving any schooling. On Honduran farms of less than 25 acres—and this includes at least 50 percent of the farm population—5 out of 6 farms do not even have a wooden plow.

Nevertheless, an end to the isolation of the various pockets of civilization in Honduras will be a great stride forward in the country's drive to modernize. With roads, several villages will be able to group together to provide a teacher for the children. Heretofore inaccessible, good farmland will be made available for cultivation. Farm goods can move to market, and products of light industries can move to farms.

I am proud of the part the United States is playing and can play in this continuing endeavor. All that Hondurans ask is that we continue to cooperate with them, to assist them in their very constructive efforts to build their country, and to improve the lot of their people.

GUATEMALA

I visited Guatemala for 5 days. I was delighted to spend an hour and a half with its President, Miguel Ydigoras Fuentes, and with the Foreign Minister, Jesus Unda Murillo.

President Ydigoras is like an umpire at a ball game. He is undergoing critical fire from the left and the right—from those who think his reforms go too far and from those who want him to push ahead faster.

Contrary to reports I had heard about a team of bodyguards being posted around him constantly, he did not have more than the customary amount of protection afforded any president in Latin America when I saw him walking on the streets of Guatemala City. President Ydigoras is an experienced, friendly man. He speaks excellent English, has visited the United States many times, has several grandchildren living in the United States now, and all in all seems most favorably disposed toward us. But he has many problems.

Guatemala needs strong leadership. Sagging coffee prices have dealt the worst blow to its economy. What is more, the fields in which cotton has been planted have not solved the problem, because the demand for cotton is off, as our own farmers well understand. The banana crop suffered because of cold weather. The Communist uprisings and sporadic shootings have frightened away the regular cruise ships and diverted practically all the tourist industry from Guatemala.

We in the United States are helping in several respects to meet the problems there through ICA programs and the building of the Pan-American Highway. However, we may have to do more, and soon, to help Guatemala meet its mounting problems, problems triggered and exploited by the ever present Communists.

During my visit with the President, it was he who brought up the matter of United Fruit Co.'s troubles with labor, a problem at that time which caused him great concern because the United Fruit Co. is the largest employer of labor in Guatemala. The United Fruit Co. owns the railroad and has provided much of the nation's income, but it is being asked to move forward in increasing benefits and wages by strong pressure from the unions. It is a problem to know how far and fast the company can go.

The 62-year-old Army veteran says he should not be expected to solve in the first or second year of office problems which his predecessors never solved, but it appeared to me that he was making progress in these various areas.

Guatemala counts on coffee for 73 percent of its exports. As coffee drinkers for the most part, we know how much less we pay for a pound now than we did several years ago. Consider, then, how much less income Guatemala can count on. We can buy only so much of Guatemala's coffee, as is the case with Brazil, Colombia, and other coffee-raising nations. Experimentations in corn, cotton, tobacco, and a type of jute called Kenaf are a part of Guatemala's attempts to get back on its financial feet after coffee pulled the economic rug out from underneath the country.

President Ydigoras showed keen sensitivity to the aspects of all the problems facing his people.

When I met with the Guatemalan Chamber of Commerce, composed of native businessmen, I was truly shocked to discover how little they know about the United States.

To them we are the land of manna from heaven. They were most unrealistic about our national budget. Indeed, they were surprised to learn that Members of Congress pay taxes. Their amazement was heightened when I told them that some people pay taxes as high as 91 percent. I was thus able to impress on them the real significance of U.S. contributions in the light of the heavy tax burdens its citizens bear.

It was my turn to be amazed when I began to compare the makes of cars on the narrow Guatemalan streets. On my previous visits there, American cars were in the majority. Now British, German, and Italian cars appear to be on the increase. Considering the country's narrow roads and the price of gasoline, which is set at 60 cents a gallon, I can readily understand why Guatemalans prefer small European models.

Last year, the 20 American Republics bought $559 million worth of automobiles and parts. As the American Republics construct more roads and earn more foreign exchange with which to purchase manufactured products, they will buy even more cars. If the car manufacturers of the United States do not want to be priced entirely out of the Latin American market, they will have to make some concessions to the considerations of their customers.

A more hopeful future for Guatemala lies in the fact that one of the most concentrated searches for oil is now being conducted there. At least, Guatemala will have another liquid gold export.

Guatemala is one of the most picturesque and historic of all Latin American countries, with beautiful scenery, lakes, mountains, farmlands. When Tobias Hartwick, of the Embassy staff, took us to Antigua, which had been the capital of Guatemala until it was destroyed by earthquake in 1773, I was reminded that the cathedral in Antigua was built in 1534, almost 75 years before our Jamestown settlement.

The people of Guatemala have a historic past of which they can be proud. But, because they are too busy looking ahead to the future, about which Government officials are most optimistic, they do not have the time to be nostalgic.

I found that Ambassador Mallory, an excellent representative of the United States, and his staff were doing a creditable and understanding job in a difficult assignment.

Much as President Ydigoras is liked personally by his people, he admits that no leader can be completely popular when his country has many holes in its pockets.

Just recently, a small armed uprising in the mountains of western Guatemala was put down; however, observers on the scene say that a move is afoot to bring to the Presidency before 1960, one Señor Ortiz Passarelli, who was elected President of Guatemala in 1957, after President Armas was assassinated. Because the army annulled the election, Ydigoras, the defeated candidate, was inaugurated.

Mr. President, we must not overlook the fact that the Communists lost considerable face in Guatemala when they were overthrown. Therefore, that is one country which they would again like to control, a country in the vital chain which links us to the Panama Canal and open shipping lanes.

PANAMA

My next stop was Panama, where I stayed from November 29 to December 2. President Ernesto de la Guardia and other high officials of the Panamanian Government kindly took time for conversations about their problems.

The most serious problem at the time was the student unrest.

When we learn that in Panama the pre-teenage group—students ranging from 11 to 14 years—are being skillfully manipulated for Communist and anti-government purposes, we realize this is more than merely the usual youthful exuberance for political participation which is common in Latin American countries.

Last May, rioting got out of hand, with the result that at least nine persons were killed and many injured. On November 3, Panama's Independence Day, students and members of the National Guard again clashed.

The situation is quite delicate. The government cannot very well move troops against the children.

Some of the points of agitation in Panama are first, a larger share of the receipts from the Panama Canal for the country of Panama; second, increasing tuition in Canal Zone schools for non-zone resident children, and third, different wage scales for U.S. citizens and Panamanian citizens who work in the Canal Zone.

On the first issue, I do not profess to know the answers. Panamanian politicians concur, however, that something should be done about it soon.

On the school matter, for years Panamanian children from outside the Canal Zone have been accepted, with the payment of tuition. No tuition is charged for children of residents of the zone. For the school year 1958 and 1959, tuition rates for nonresidents were jumped, from $225 to $351, for grades 1–6; from $270 to $450, for grades 7 to 12; and from $360 to $600, for junior college.

The Panama Canal Company claims that the actual per student costs for the above-mentioned grades amount to $515, $575, and $920, respectively, with the Canal Zone government subsidizing the difference. I have no reason to doubt their accounting or their reasoning that tuition increases must follow rising operational costs. I do think, however, that in this matter we can be pennywise and pound foolish. If higher fees put up a barrier to the education of Panamanian children in U.S. curriculum, we could very well be erecting a parallel barrier to future United States-Panama understanding. Perhaps an appropriation will be necessary to keep the doors of our schools open to Panamanian children. No wiser long-term investment can be made.

Another source of friction—for which we might seek some adjustment—is the difference in wages being paid to U.S. citizens and Panamanian citizens who work in the Canal Zone. The basic wages for employees of the Canal Zone are supposed to be the same, regardless of citizenship. But U.S. citizens receive an increment which represents the difference between U.S. taxes and the Panamanian taxes. Then they receive an additional 25 percent as an oversea differential.

Ernesto de la Guardia, Panama's President, is typical of the new leadership which is coming into power all over Latin American. He is intelligent, nervous, energetic, and highly nationalistic. He wants more and better things for his people. He is not unfriendly to the United States, for he understands us very well. He is a graduate of Brown University, and his son and relatives were educated in the United States.

But like the other restless, awakening countries of Latin America, Panama has problems; and the Communists exploit and exaggerate these problems. So President de la Guardia has to be continually on guard, and he must demonstrate progress; otherwise, the Communist charges would look true. Panama is one country to which we must immediately give consideration. We cannot turn our backs on its problems or be indifferent to its requests; otherwise there may be a real explosion there.

TRINIDAD

The last stop on my trip was Trinidad, a British possession in the Caribbean since 1802. In 1941, the United States acquired a 99-year lease to the naval base at Chaguaramas.

Although Trinidad is separated by only 7 miles from the Venezuelan coast, the island's problems and its relations with us do not fit into the Latin American context of events in the Caribbean. I wish to diverge for a moment from a discussion of our Latin American relations, to report on some interesting developments on our own doorstep.

Early in 1948, after years of negotiation, Trinidad joined with its sister colonies of Jamacia, Antigua, Barbados, Dominica, Grenada, Montserrat, St. Christopher, Nevis, Anguilla, St. Lucia, and St. Vincent, to form a federation known as the West Indies, looking forward to eventual independent status as a member of the British Commonwealth. Some of the islands of the federation are separated by as much as 1,000 miles of sea. The total population runs to about 3 million.

I spoke with a number of the officials of the new federation government, and found them very intelligent, and loaded with problems reminiscent of our own postrevolutionary days of the Articles of Confederation. There is much interisland rivalry. Each of the islands has its own laws and its own tariffs. Passports are necessary in order to travel between the islands.

While I was in Trinidad, there was some talk and fear of the withdrawal of Jamaica from the federation. Jamaica is the largest and most populous member; and there is fear in Jamaica that it will be taxed disproportionately, to develop the other islands. Jamaicans also are concerned that federation will mean an end to the safeguards for its industries, and hence competition from Trinidad, the next largest member.

The only outstanding problem for the United States in the West Indies concerns the Chaguaramas Base. Trinidad has been selected as the location for the capital of the West Indies federation. A committee appointed to choose the actual site for the capital selected Chaguaramas, despite the fact that the British Government had indicated that it was necessary for defense purposes. The West Indies federation is still without a permanent site for its capital. Meanwhile, the Chief Minister of Trinidad, Dr. Eric Williams, has found that the question makes a convenient whipping-boy to stir up interest in his political campaign. The matter is presently quiescent; but it could crop up in the future.

I found that the West Indians were also troubled about their itinerant laborers in the United States. I discussed the question with Mrs. Phyllis Allfrey, the Minister of Labor and Social Affairs of the federation government, who stated that the federation is most anxious to have the United States permit more West Indians to come to the United States to work. I suggested that their government make an appointment with our Department of Labor, to discuss the complex matter.

I am sure all of us wish well for the future of the West Indies. Their future is allied with ours. We should give them every consideration in their efforts to launch a free and sturdy federated government in the Caribbean.

CONCLUSIONS

Mr. President, I have mentioned the high points of my Latin American tour in hopes that these facts will stimulate among the Members of Congress greater interest in our sister republics.

That this trip reaffirmed my long-held conviction that the United States must recognize our deep interests and ties in Latin America is plain to see.

Arduous and continuing work is ahead of us. Spasmodic awakenings and bursts of energy cannot bring long-range satisfactions.

In 1954, when he announced his resignation as Secretary General of the Organization of American States, the great Alberto Lleras Camargo, now the President of Colombia had the following wise words of admonition for the members of the inter-American family:

> The economic problems of inter-American life are surely not more difficult than were those of a political nature in the past. The latter were in fact so thorny that when attempts were made to put off debate on them or to ease the attendant strain, it was customary to turn to economic topics, as something pleasanter, more congenial to everyone, of mutual interest, and of slight import.
> Today that is no longer true, obviously. There are serious conflicts of interest, and economic views that appear to clash just as much as, early in this century, the corollaries of the Monroe Doctrine might have jarred with the principle of nonintervention. Millions of words, some of them harsh, some pleasant, some wrathful, and others persuasive, had to be exchanged via the channels of the Organization before essential agreements were reached that made it impossible to differ any longer on the first principles of Pan-Americanism. The same thing is bound to happen in this other field, in which solidarity is no less important, distinctive and indispensable than it is in purely political areas. But in order to bring this about, the one thing that should not be done is to desert the council tables at which the very least that could be accomplished is a clarification of the area of disagreement, an indispensable prerequisite for understanding.

Mr. President, 5 years later there are some signs of moves toward the inter-American economic cooperation which Dr. Lleras hoped for. Our country has agreed to consult with our Latin American neighbors, before taking any unilateral action which might affect the markets of their principal exports.

This, indeed, is a beginning. It is a definite recognition that the United States, as a great consumer's market, by its domestic actions can, and does, affect the lives of millions of Latin Americans. We have also, at long last, agreed to participate in an inter-American development bank; and it is now well on the way to being organized.

Several years ago it was popular to say that what we need in our foreign program is more trade, not aid. On this point, all of us agree. Certainly our Latin American neighbors agree. I have yet to visit a country of Latin America which does not desire our trade more than our aid, for trade is aid. It is lasting. It develops both countries. It is dignified. It is mutually helpful. But, Mr. President, we must, in truth, be willing to move and compete for trade.

Latin America constitutes the greatest market in the world for our goods. In 1958, we sold Latin America 26 percent of all our exports—worth more than $4.1 billion. In return we import 40 percent of their products; but they may not be our best customer tomorrow if economic barriers imposed by the United States send these one-crop countries into eager Red hands.

Russia makes uneconomic deals with anyone, feeling that losses can be borne by their entire economy, when political aims are to be achieved.

Offers of loans and technical assistance by the Communists will become more appealing to our good neighbors if our similar offers are conspicuously absent.

That is why I feel private American investments in Latin America, coupled with technical know-how, can achieve further economic gains for those countries, and thus mend the rips in our relations.

United States private investments in Latin America during 1958 reached over $9 billion. These American investments are making a great contribution by creating employment, introducing technical know-how, and in general, stimulating economic growth in their host country.

But Latin America needs many times over the amount of private capital that investors are presently willing to invest outside the United States. Perhaps Senators will recall the private Argentine mission that was here unofficially at the time of President Frondizi's visit making just that point and pleading for investments.

We made some loans to the Government, but more helpful and most encouraging was the willingness of some of our businessmen to invest capital in Argentina's future.

One of the ways by which U.S. capital might be encouraged would be to provide some form of tax relief. There already has been some inter-American discussion of U.S. tax laws which nullify Latin American efforts to induce private investments through tax concessions. This is certainly a matter which warrants further discussion.

Along the line of providing tax relief, I intend to introduce proposed legislation designed to defer U.S. taxes on income earned abroad until such time as such income is brought home as a dividend payment or as a remittance of profit. Businesses incorporated under the laws of the United States, but which are engaged exclusively in foreign operations, would become subject to U.S. corporate income tax on their foreign earnings only when such earnings are distributed to the parent stockholders in the United States.

Even with inducements through tax relief, private U.S. investments cannot do the whole job in Latin America. For some time to come, the Latin American Republics are going to need many public loans for such nonprofitable but essential developments as roads, bridges, ports, and sanitation systems.

On January 8, I introduced a bill which would establish the office of Under Secretary of State for Western Hemisphere Affairs. I believe now, more than ever, that this post is necessary if we are to achieve a new and dynamic policy with regard to Latin America. This bill has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I sincerely trust that the committee will be disposed to consider it favorably and that it may be enacted this year.

Rioting incited by and involving Latin American students has made black headlines in our newspapers this year, as in years past. The incidents, well known to us all, should awaken us to the fact that these young people are those we may very well be dealing with at conference tables in the todays that become tomorrows. That is why I favor, suggest—yes, in fact, urge—that we consider an effective, greatly broadened student exchange program between the Americas, so that casual misunderstandings will not be turned into stone-throwing hassles.

Wherever Communists can, they plant people in schools, to warp and twist young, curious minds. Unless we combat this wholesale mesmerizing with a program whereby students can visit this country to study, thus seeing how people of the United States really live, we stand to hinder hemisphere relations.

If Senators will recall, I mentioned several key government officials in Latin America whom I met on this tour who were American educated. These men, and many more, such as Galo Plaza, former President of Ecuador, and the Foreign Minister of Ecuador, Carlos Tovor Zadumbida, are doing excellent jobs for their countries and at the same time, because they know us well, are rendering a service to truth and honesty by picturing us as we really are.

Each of those men was educated in the United States. Wherever such men are engaged in active politics, the United States has the best of relations.

I use this point to illustrate how successful exchange programs can be. Like bread cast upon the waters, the results are generously rewarding.

At the same time I would like to see an exchange program conducted between the Americas' newspapermen. The fourth estate, so vital in any nation to its freedom and welfare, is one of the best foes against our common enemy, communism. For where a press is free, and men's minds are likewise free, there the poison pens cannot succeed in maligning relationships. I intend to introduce legislation which will encourage journalists to explore, discover, and study freedom of the press in this country and in the countries to the south of us.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I should like to appeal to the Organization of American States on this illustrious day. The OAS has many duties and responsibilities. It is discharging many of them well. It has been a useful organization and, I think, will be even more useful in the future, but one of its inherent duties is to try to resolve differences and disputes which arise between member countries. Open war between countries has proven to be disruptive and detrimental to both sides.

Obviously, the OAS has a duty to keep the peace in Latin America. Today we are sitting on a time bomb in the Caribbean, a bomb which could explode at any moment.

Since Fidel Castro deposed a dictator and came into power in Cuba, the Caribbean has been brewing up a storm. Gale warnings are up. We must take precaution now, before a series of revolutionary hurricanes sweep away the peace. Many proven friends of Latin America are now greatly apprehensive about what is happening in Cuba. Things have not worked out in Cuba as many of us had hoped. A democracy has as yet not replaced a dictatorship. It appears that one form of suppression has replaced another. Press dispatches on Monday reported that a Rotary Club in Santa Clara, Cuba, petitioned the Government for a return of constitutional protection of individuals—the right of habeas corpus, the end of war crimes trials and the release of those who have been imprisoned without charges filed against them.

Let me quote some press reports which give evidence of the growing concern about the turn of events in Cuba.

Newsweek magazine, of April 13, 1959, has a report on current conditions in Cuba. Let me quote it, in part:

> The Government now is polka-dotted with Communists, with party liners, with fellow travelers, and with men who say in effect: "I have no use for the Communists, but as long as they support Castro why get excited about them?" The editor of the Government newspaper Revolución is Carlos Franqui, a former proofreader on the Communist newspaper Hoy. Another Communist, Alfredo Guevara, runs the army information program. Still another, Violeta Casals, runs Radio Rebelde, the national Castro radio network. The Communists are also taking over cultural activities: Francisco Alonso is head of the National Fine Arts Commission; Vincentina Antuna directs the National Institute of Culture.
> Fidel's brother Raúl is probably not a Red, but as head of the army he has given the Communists free rein; as a result anti-Communists officers are being purged.

The article states further:

> The Ministry of Education particularly has been infiltrated by Reds, anti-Communist teachers are losing their jobs.

Later the article reads:

> People close to Fidel have warned him about the Communists but he refuses to listen. He will not listen to anyone who it attempting to make him face reality, whether about the Communists or about anything else.

I read further from the article:

> The fact nevertheless remains that Cuba could become another Guatemala, that is, a country dominated by the Communists as Guatemala was under Jacobo Arbenz. It very well may—unless Castro stops talking and starts tackling the problems of making Cuba a stable country once again.

I ask unanimous consent to have the entire article from Newsweek printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CUBA—ANOTHER GUATEMALA?

(Will Cuba go Communist? Just 3½ months after Fidel Castro and his bearded rebels swept out of the hills and threw out Fulgencio Batista this chill question is disturbing observers here and in the Caribbean. From Havana, Senior Editor Harold Lavine reports on Castro's new Cuba, and the chances of it becoming another Guatemala.)

What is happening in Cuba can be stated quite simply: The Communists, who were quick to jump on the Castro bandwagon once it really got rolling, now are grasping for the reins. They haven't yet gotten all the reins within their grip—but they could, very easily.

The Government now is polka-dotted with Communists, with party liners, with fellow travelers, and with men who say, in effect: "I have no use for the Communists, but as long as they support Castro why get excited about them?" The editor of the Government newspaper Revolución is Carlos Franqui, a former proofreader on the Communist newspaper Hoy. Another Communist, Alfredo Guevara, runs the army information program. Still another, Violeta Casals, runs Radio Rebelde, the national Castro radio network. The Communists are also taking over cultural activities: Francisco Alonso is head of the National Fine Arts Commission; Vicentina Antuna directs the National Institute of Culture.

Fidel's brother, Raúl, is probably not a Red, but as head of the army he has given the Communists free rein; as a result, anti-Communist officers are being purged. Maj. Ernesto (Ché) Guevara insists that he's not a Communist either, but Guevara has a habit of putting men in Government positions who are.

The Ministry of Education particularly has been infiltrated by Reds; anti-Communist teachers are losing their jobs.

The Communists have infiltrated nongovernment areas, too. They have moved into the labor unions. Batista was quite partial to labor and the leaders of labor were part and parcel of the Batista dictatorship. When he fled they had to quit the country too; those who tarried soon found themselves in La Cabaña fortress. This left a vacuum of leadership, and there were the Communists, ready and eager to fill it.

Why has Castro, who is not himself even remotely a Communist, let the Communists take over so much power? The answer is not a heartening one: The Communists basically are quite right about Castro; the man is a romantic. And the goal of his romanticism has a Communist ring to it—a country in which there are no rich and no poor, a country in which everyone is a member of the middle class. One of his most dramatic acts was to cut rents: All rents under $100 a month have been cut by 50 percent; between $100 and $200 a month, by 40 percent; over $200 a month, by 30 percent. The goal was a sharp redistribution of income.

DEAF EAR

People close to Fidel have warned him about the Communists but he refuses to listen. He will not listen to anyone who is attempting to make him face reality, whether about the Communists or about anything else.

But Castro's vision has a capitalist base. He wants a country in which every farmer owns his own land. Nothing has so caught the imagination of Cuba as Castro's land-reform program; organizations are raising money to buy tractors to give to the campesinos (countryfolk) to use when they have their own land. Here again, Castro is playing Robin Hood; he promises to take from the rich and give to the poor.

His motives unquestionably are praiseworthy; in Cuba the rich are very rich, indeed—and the poor are horrifyingly poor. Yet the fact remains that so far Castro has succeeded only in paralyzing the Cuban economy. The cut in rents killed the real-estate market and halted construction, making thousands of workers idle, cutting the sale of such products as steel and cement by more than 50 percent. The land reform program electrified the campesinos but it has driven investment capital into hiding.

There are today between 300,000 and 400,000 unemployed workers in Cuba in a labor force of approximately 2.3 million; between 300,000 and 400,000 additional workers are woefully underemployed; and the situation will get worse when the sugar season ends late in May and the mills shut down. Castro has instituted a public-works program but it cannot make more than a dent in the unemployment. Any step-up probably would bring inflation and necessitate a peso devaluation.

JUMPY NERVES

Like the Communist threat, these are the facts that Castro refuses to face. He prefers to talk about his prosperous Cuba. And the more he talks, the more nervous businessmen become. Shopkeepers ask tourists: "Have you any dollars I can buy with pesos?" Their explanation: "We don't know what is going to happen tomorrow and a man must take care of himself."

Communists feed on turmoil, and the Communists are having a feast.

The situation is not hopeless. Castro means well. Even those most dubious about the future of Cuba agree on that. Castro is honest, and an honest government is something unique in Cuba; even those most dubious about Castro himself praise him for ending corruption in the government. Most important of all, the Castro revolution was a middle-class revolution and there are plenty of men around Castro who just don't like what is happening. And sometimes they can make themselves felt. When Batista's officials fled Las Villas Province and Ché Guevara appointed a party-liner as governor, for example, the men in Las Villas who had carried guns for Castro drove him out—with guns.

The fact nevertheless remains that Cuba could become another Guatemala, that is a country dominated by the Communists as Guatemala was under Jacobo Arbenz. It very well may—unless Castro stops talking and starts tackling the problems of making Cuba a stable country once again.

This is something for every American to worry about, for Cuba is bigger than Guatemala; it is also a great U.S. naval base—guarding the Panama Canal.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, the New York Times of April 5, 1959, carried a dispatch by its correspondent, R. Hart Philips, which reads, in conclusion:

But the middle class which supported Dr. Castro wholeheartedly during the 2-year rebellion is losing their enthusiasm for the revolution. It is watching with growing concern the activities of the Communists here, who are organizing their party and making considerable progress in gaining control of labor.

Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks an article from the New York Times of Tuesday, April 14, 1959, under the heading "Costa Rican Denies Charges by Castro."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COSTA RICAN DENIES CHARGES BY CASTRO

SAN JOSE, COSTA RICA, April 13.—Former President José Figueres has indignantly denied charges by Premier Fidel Castro of Cuba that he was an agent of Yankee imperialism.

In a recorded speech broadcast today, Dr. Figueres said: "I want the support of the people, not the rabble. I do not want to happen to me what has happened in other Central American countries, where they have substituted the rabble for the people in order to claim popular support."

At this point, his audience of veterans of the 1948 revolt here shouted, "Down with Fidel Castro." Figueres did not intervene.

Warning that a distinction must be drawn between genuine democratic revolutions and those prompted by rabble-supported demagogs, he continued: "In every American country there exists a Communist nucleus that backs a demagog's leadership solely to overthrow it later and establish not merely dictatorship of the proletariat but mob dictatorship."

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, on Friday I put into the RECORD some additional press comments on the Cuban situation. Let me quote briefly from two of those articles.

Mr. John B. McDermott, a correspondent for the Miami Herald, writing from Havana, in a story carried by a news syndicate and published by the Chicago Daily News on March 31, 1959, said:

Memo to Moscow: Keep your secret agents and your organizers home, Nikita Khrushchev. You don't need them here. Fidel Castro is unwittingly talking Cuba into the Communist orbit.

Columnist Drew Pearson, in an article which appeared in the Washington Post and Times Herald, told of the violent revolt which broke out in Bogotá, Colombia, during the Bogotá Conference in 1948. Three hundred were killed in the revolt. Pearson says:

Number One leader of this revolt, it now develops, was Fidel Castro.

Finally, let me cite a United Press International dispatch, carried on April 13, 1959. A story datelined from Havana, Cuba, said:

Dr. Castro said today that elections in Cuba would be delayed until his revolutionary government had finished its work.

It is no wonder we hear and read of a growing barrage of anti-American statements emanating from Cuba these days. This is bad enough, but I think the United States will survive somehow.

However, what is most disturbing is that this group apparently is organizing forces in Cuba to invade the shores of other Latin American countries and overthrow present governments and set up their own.

I have a letter from the President of Haiti, which I should like to read at this time:

PRÉSIDENT DE LA RÉPUBLIQUE D'HAÏTI,
Port-au-Prince, March 31, 1959.

The Honorable GEORGE SMATHERS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your leadership in the U.S. Senate and your definitive position regarding the maintenance of peace in Latin America and particularly in the Caribbean are deeply appreciated.

Unfortunately, and without any desire on our part, Haiti has become involved in the Caribbean war of words—a situation that I sincerely hope does not progress beyond this—between neighboring republics. Haiti definitely cannot afford to be enmeshed in any international disputes at this time, particularly when we have been striving toward the attainment of economic and political stability.

I feel—as you have already noted in your remarks to the press in the United States—that peace must be maintained in this area under any circumstances, and I will cooperate with the U.S. Government through the Organization of American States, the United Nations, and even independently in every way possible to insure that a peaceful situation exists in this hemisphere. There is no doubt in my mind of the importance of hemispheric unity and friendship, especially in the face of the critical situations in Germany, the Middle East, and the Far East.

Please accept my sincere thanks, Mr. Senator, for your support in this sensitive situation. Also, whenever you are able to do so, I should like very much to have you visit Haiti as my guest. Please let me know when you find it to be convenient, so that I can make the necessary arrangements.

Sincerely,

DR. FRANCOIS DUVALIER,
President of the Republic of Haiti.

Mr. President, things are getting pretty extreme when the President of a Republic such as Haiti has to write a letter and plead like that.

Mr. President, we who are members of the OAS should not permit an attack to be launched from Cuba against the country of Haiti. Haiti has already suffered too grievously from killings and bloodshed, unrest and turmoil. An attack of this kind could accomplish no earthly good.

Just a few days ago the U.S. Ambassadors from the 12 Caribbean countries met at San Salvador to discuss this rapidly deteriorating situation in the Caribbean. After one of the really heated sessions where, according to the New York Times, the career diplomats wished to soft pedal the situation and the appointed diplomats sought to take a firm stand against attacks, they finally agreed on the recommendation "that each country be assured the right to develop its political life, free from outside intervention."

Mr. President, that is and has been the historic policy of the U.S. Government. If we had not followed that policy, then, of course, we would have meddled in the affairs of many Latin American countries heretofore, and, undoubtedly, might even have gone so far as to attack a number of countries wherein the governments were not friendly to us. But we have learned over the course of the years that it is best to allow the people of a country to establish a government of their own choice. They may not be able to do it as quickly as they would like, but inevitably time has proved the will of the people is obeyed.

We believe the policy of nonintervention is an intelligent one. We, therefore, do not violate any sovereign nation's borders merely because the nation is either weak or has in power a government which we do not like. Certainly, a precedent of attacking a government when one merely does not approve of the men at the top would be a dangerous precedent to establish in Latin America, or anywhere else for that matter, and ultimately it might well result in the destruction of some of the governments which today are planning to attack other governments.

Mr. President, we are all gratified that most of the countries of the Western Hemisphere abide by the rule of nonintervention. It appears to me that if we and other countries of the hemisphere can follow that rule, certainly the present leaders of the Government of Cuba can properly do the same.

One of the reasons why we are expecially concerned about the disturbing rumors which we hear emanating from Cuba is that it appears some of the proposed attacks are being led by men who, in many instances, are antidemocratic and pro-Communist.

The OAS, I believe, have historically subscribed to the policy of nonintervention. But, as is the case with so many organizations of this type, they are reduced in their effect to the moral suasion of their desires and policies. They have no physical means by which they can, for example, keep the peace and protect helpless countries about to be attacked.

Unfortunately, moral suasion is not a sufficient pressure to the minds of some men who seek to establish Communist beachheads in Central and South America. The OAS is, in that situation, reduced to a position of impotence and helplessness.

Would it not, under these circumstances, be a good idea to build up a force for peace directed and guided in this hemisphere by the OAS?

Such a military force could effectively eliminate the prospect of war in our own hemisphere.

If such a military force directed by the OAS should be deemed a good idea—and I think it is—it could be easily created without any additional expense whatever to any of the American Republics.

As many of the Members of the Senate remember, last year I spoke and voted against a proposed bill to give to certain Latin American countries destroyers and other military equipment. As I said then and believe now, military assistance is not the way to help Latin America. Too often the arms which we have sent to Latin American countries have been, unfortunately, used by the governments then in power, not against some outside threat, but rather against the people of the country to which the arms were sent.

It is my information from the State Department that in the present military assistance program for 1960, $66.8 million is allocated for assistance to Latin American countries. This is an increase even over that which was appropriated last year.

Would it not be a good idea if this proposed military assistance program were scrapped and this money diverted to the OAS, to be used by this organization to create a volunteer police force for the purpose of keeping peace in Latin America?

Certainly the knowledge that there was such a force in existence which could keep the peace would make it possible for every Latin American country thereafter to reduce the size of its own military budget; and the moneys which are now being used to create armies, navies, and air forces could be put to much better use in the building of schools, roads, and hospitals and in raising the economic and social levels of the people of Central and South America.

The people of the various Republics would know that if there were ever any danger of their being attacked from without they could call upon the OAS and get the benefit of its police force to protect them while the issue involved was being settled, as it should be, at the conference table.

The OAS would then become a truly meaningful organization for peace. It would not only continue its very worthwhile purpose in improving economic conditions and settling disputes in the Western Hemisphere, but at the same time could become truly the guardian of peace in the Western Hemisphere for North and South America.

In this connection, I would further recommend that there be created a Court of Justice for the Western Hemisphere similar to, but we hope more effective than, the World Court, wherein people, acting in a civilized manner, following the process of the law rather than the willful ambitions of certain men, could settle their disputes before a high tribunal.

Such a system of courts and a police force would guarantee that justice would prevail, that the peace could be maintained, and that the peoples of the Western Hemisphere could spend their energies, their time, and their money in pursuing the great objectives of better living conditions for all greater liberty for all, and a more enduring peace for all.

CONSTRUCTION OF MODERN NAVAL VESSELS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JORDAN in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived and the morning hour having been concluded, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 3293) to authorize the construction of modern naval vessels.

Mr. PROXMIRE obtained the floor.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

WHERE IS MR. BENSON'S PROMISED FARM BILL?

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, last Wednesday, my friend and the farmer's friend, the distinguished senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], placed in the RECORD a prepared statement in which he asked why the Senate Agriculture and Forestry Committee has not come up with a new farm bill.

Let me assure the able Senator that I share his concern for the economic plight of farm families, not only in North Dakota and Missouri, but throughout the Nation.

According to Department of Agriculture forecasts, farm prices and farm income are expected to drop in 1959.

Yet the Department's inventories and costs continue to rise higher and higher.

Everyone knows, therefore, that we need a new farm bill and a new farm program.

One of the responsibilities of any administrator of an executive department of our Government is to recommend legislation to the Congress.

During the years I have been a member of the Senate Agriculture and Forestry Committee, it has become increasingly apparent that, whereas the present Secretary always goes out of his way to criticize the Congress, he is either unwilling or unable to present a complete program of his own.

When Mr. Benson came before the Senate last February, he offered no overall program to deal with the increasing problems now facing the farmers.

Therefore I asked him to prepare an omnibus farm bill embodying his ideas.

In this connection I quote from the original transcript of hearings held before our committee last February 16 and 17:

Senator SYMINGTON. I would hope that you would come up here and say "This is a problem, I am head of this department, here is the piece of legislation that I think the Congress ought to pass this year to help lick it." Now isn't that a fair request?

Secretary BENSON. Well, Senator, all that is needed is to put some of this language into legal language. That is all that is required.

And from the same RECORD:

Senator SYMINGTON. Mr. Chairman, may I make a recommendation, and if anyone on the committee disagrees I wish they would say so. I recommend that the Secretary of Agriculture draw up in what he calls legal language a bill that the Congress should study and analyze and in his opinion pass in order to help this growing problem of the investment of the American people in agriculture, and also to help the standards of living in agriculture.

Now I recommend we ask the Secretary of Agriculture to give us a bill on agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. That question was posed to him this morning, and he agreed to do that. As I understood him.

Still later in the transcript:

Senator SYMINGTON. Let's have once and for all an overall omnibus farm bill that the Secretary of Agriculture, starting his seventh year, says, "This is what I think the Congress should pass in order to clarify and make constructive the farm program of the United States."

Secretary BENSON. Mr. Chairman, I will do anything you ask me to do that will be helpful to the Congress in discharging its legislative responsibility in this field, so if you want us to——

The CHAIRMAN. I want you to submit a bill that will be satisfactory to the farmers. That is what I want.

The suggestion that the Secretary submit an omnibus farm bill was concurred in by other members of the committee, as the following part of the RECORD confirms:

Senator PROXMIRE. It would certainly seem to me, Mr. Secretary, you would come in and propose changes all up and down the line anywhere you feel the law should be changed and improved.

Secretary BENSON. That is what I have done in the testimony, and we will draft it.

Senator PROXMIRE. Good.

On the second day of the hearings, the chairman of the committee, the distinguished senior Senator from Louisiana, stated:

The CHAIRMAN. And as I stated to you yesterday, we have all the facts, and we have, of course, the President's views and your views, and what we would like to have now is legislation, that is, put into an act the recommendations that you are proposing.

Secretary BENSON. We have already started the lawyers working on phases of it, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. And may I suggest that you deal with it either by titles or separate acts because as we stated yesterday, there are some commodities on which, you see, we acted last year that will not need any attention this year.

Secretary BENSON. Right.

The CHAIRMAN. But in any event, whatever act you propose, suggestions you propose, let's either have it by separate acts or by titles so that this committee can act accordingly.

After waiting nearly 3 weeks I wrote to the Secretary asking when his omnibus farm bill would be sent to the committee in accordance with his above noted agreement.

I ask unanimous consent that my letter of March 5, be included in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARCH 5, 1959.

The Honorable EZRA TAFT BENSON,
Secretary of Agriculture,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: During your appearance before the Senate Agriculture Committee on February 16 and 17, you agreed to send the committee an omnibus farm bill embodying your complete recommendations for solving the current farm problem.

Would you please advise me as to when we might expect to have a draft of this omnibus farm bill.

Sincerely,

STUART SYMINGTON.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Another 3 weeks passed before I received a reply from Acting Secretary True Morse, which did not answer my question.

Mr. President, I ask that the letter from Mr. Morse be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D.C., March 27, 1959.

Hon. STUART SYMINGTON,
Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR SYMINGTON: This is in reply to your recent letter requesting that the Department forward to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry suggested legislative language embodying the recommendations of the Department.

As you will recall, in the Secretary's prepared statement he said the following:

"Last year there was passed the Agricultural Act of 1958, affecting primarily cotton, rice, and corn. In view of this recent action, the Congress may feel it desirable to give that legislation a reasonable trial period."

In his appearance before the Senate Agriculture Committee on February 16 and 17, the Secretary agreed to forward to the committee legislative language embodying the alternative proposals with respect to wheat, tobacco, and peanuts. We have already forwarded the material for wheat and expect to forward the legislative language for tobacco and peanuts very shortly.

Senator ELLENDER, along with a large number of other Senators, as you know, has introduced a bill to extend the Sugar Act. Our recommendations as to the extension of Public Law 480 will be sent soon. We are reviewing other pending legislation to see if there is further legislation needed that is not already covered by pending bills or the recommendations in the President's message of January 29, 1959.

Sincerely yours,

TRUE D. MORSE,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Nearly 8 weeks have now passed, but the Secretary of Agriculture has not yet fulfilled his agreement to provide our commitee with his suggestions, in legislative language, for an overall farm bill.

Accordingly I wrote the Secretary again today, asking him when his promised omnibus bill would be sent the committee. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this letter be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE, COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY,
April 13, 1959.

The Honorable EZRA TAFT BENSON,
Secretary of Agriculture,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Secretary Morse has replied to my letter to you of March 5 asking when the omnibus farm bill you agreed to present the Senate Agriculture Committee would be available.

The letter from Mr. Morse says our committee has received from your Department alternative legislative drafts for wheat and peanuts; therefore it is in no sense a reply to my letter to you of March 5.

Could I again respectfully ask when you plan to fulfill the agreement you made with our committee to provide an omnibus bill embodying all your recommendations for handling the present farm situation?

Sincerely,

STUART SYMINGTON.

Mr. SYMINGTON. The distinguished Senator from North Dakota, and all others who believe action on the farm situation is necessary, likewise may wish to request that the Secretary carry out his promise to give us his proposals in the form of an overall bill.

According to President Eisenhower, the cost alone of storing and handling these growing surpluses will soon be over $19 million a week.

The first step in consideration of how to alleviate this situation is receipt by the Congress of the overall omnibus farm legislation Mr. Benson promised last February. It is already long overdue and Mr. Benson should send it up now.

Instead of doing so, he continues to criticize the Congress.

In this connection, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article from the New York Times of yesterday be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Apr. 14, 1959]

BENSON URGES FIGHT FOR NEW FARM PLAN

WASHINGTON, April 13.—Ezra Taft Benson, the Secretary of Agriculture, said today that consumers and businessmen should battle for "realistic farm programs." He contended that Democrats in Congress were blocking his proposals but offering no positive plans of their own.

"The voice of the American farmer calls in louder and louder tones for freedom to act, and for less Government interference," he said.

"If this is what farmers want, what are we waiting for—what is Congress waiting for? We've made our recommendations. Why don't we get action?"

Mr. Benson raised these questions in a report presented to a meeting of the Associated Retail Bakers of America.

"It is not only farmers who should be in this battle for realistic farm programs," the Secretary went on. "This is the battle of every citizen, every businessman, every taxpayer, every housewife, every consumer, every person interested in a sound economy that is so vital to the future of this country."

Mr. Benson said that it was the conviction of the Eisenhower administration that the best way to help agriculture was to adopt programs that helped the farmers to help themselves.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, it would be amusing if it were not so tragic to watch the efforts of Mr. Benson to blame the Congress, when he himself is either unwilling or unable to present a farm program.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

FOOD STAMP PLAN FOR PERSONS NEEDING PUBLIC ASSISTANCE

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], I introduce a bill to promote the health and welfare, to augment the purchasing power, and to improve the nutrition of those persons receiving public assistance, the unemployed, and other low income, needy persons, and ask that it be appropriately referred.

Many of our fellow Americans are underfed and undernourished. It is a tragic commentary that this should be true in a nation as rich and productive as the United States.

Forty-two percent of the lower income families are not receiving recommended amounts of calcium. They need more milk and milk products.

Nearly one-third of the low income families in our Nation do not receive the minimum recommended allowances of ascorbic acid—vitamin C.

They need more citrus fruits.

Diets of low income persons are also deficient in protein, thiamin, vitamin A, riboflavin, and other important nutrients.

Surveys shows that low levels of income and purchasing power are directly related to inadequate dietary levels. Persons with restricted budgets are simply not able to purchase the kinds of foods so necessary for a balanced, nutritious, and healthful diet.

Many of our fellow Americans are in this position.

First, there are the 4.3 million who are unemployed. Nearly 2 million do not now receive any assistance or unemployment compensation. They cannot purchase the foods needed for a balanced diet. Even those unemployed who are receiving some assistance find it practically impossible to purchase all the necessary foods.

The problem is equally serious for the several million of our fellow Americans whose only source of income is through public assistance.

These people—the aged, the dependent children, the blind, and the disabled—are finding it increasingly difficult to make ends meet on this limited income.

The average public assistance, per individual, is some $60 per month. It is all but impossible to meet normal costs of living and still purchase the foods needed for a healthy and nutritious diet.

There are still other low income and needy persons who are not eligible for any public assistance and who so desperately need additional purchasing power if they are to improve their nutritional level.

Mr. President, the bill we are introducing today would supplement the purchasing power of those needy persons by providing food certificates or stamps to be used as partial payment toward the purchase of designated, highly nutritious foods.

This is how the program would work:

The Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare would determine, based on available research data and from new surveys, the nutrients most commonly found to be deficient in the diets of low income, needy persons.

The Secretary of HEW would then designate the food products which most abundantly supply these nutrients.

Based on available surveys, calcium, protein, vitamin A, thiamin, riboflavin, niacin, and ascorbic acid (vitamin C) are the nutrients most needed. Foods supplying these nutrients include meat, milk, and poultry products, as well as fruits and vegetables.

Food stamps would be issued, and would be used as partial—50 percent—payment toward the purchase of $10 worth of the designated food products.

Persons eligible for the food stamps include:

First. Recipients of assistance or benefits under programs of old-age assistance, aid to dependent children, aid to the blind, and aid to the permanently or totally disabled, as provided in the Social Security Act.

Second. Recipients of unemployment benefits.

Third. Recipients of financial assistance provided for the needy by a State or local agency.

Fourth. Needy persons, including unemployed who are not receiving unemployment compensation benefits; those not eligible for assistance because of lack of legal residence; and other persons not eligible in above categories, who are certified to be in need of supplemental assistance in obtaining an adequate diet.

The stamps would be distributed monthly and, insofar as possible, at the same time and with the monthly assistance payments.

In administering the program, the Secretary of HEW will work through State and local welfare agencies.

The Secretary of HEW will redeem food stamps through normal banking institutions. The Secretary is authorized to reimburse banking institutions for special services they may render in connection with handling the stamps.

Mr. President, there is a real need for this type of food-stamp plan if we want all the American people to have an adequate and nutritious diet, so that they may be strong and healthy.

The program we have introduced is not intended to replace any of the present programs of asistance to the needy. Instead, it is to supplement these programs. As example, the surplus food distribution program of the Department of Agriculture is making some food available to hungry persons in certain distressed areas throughout the country. However, this program is far from adequate either as to quantity or quality.

Prompt action is needed to remedy this situation.

But increased distribution of surplus food commodities is not the total answer. Flour, cornmeal, dried milk, rice, or dried beans do not provide the nutrients so necessary to health and welfare.

The bill we have introduced would supplement these food items with purchasing power, enabling needy persons to obtain more nutritious commodities.

The mechanics of our plan are the result of careful study of various methods which have been tried or suggested in the past.

It is a modest program, with an estimated annual cost—based on current data as to the number of public assistance recipients, the unemployed, and others who would be eligible—of between six and seven hundred million dollars.

Every effort has ben made to simplify administrative procedures and therefore to minimize their cost.

The plan utilizes normal, established retail stores, and therefore does not disrupt or displace regular marketing channels.

Under the program, this supplemental purchasing power may be used only for the purchase of designated food commodities. This insures that the recipient will receive maximum benefits from this program.

We urge prompt action on this bill so that its benefits may soon be available to our fellow Americans who are unable to provide for themselves a balanced and nutritious diet.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD and be held at the desk until the close of business Friday, April 17, so that any of my colleagues who wish to do so may join in sponsoring this proposed legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD and lie on the desk, as requested.

The bill (S. 1686) to provide for the public welfare by authorizing and directing the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to initiate a food certificate program for the benefit of low income and unemployed persons, introduced by Mr. SYMINGTON for himself and Mr. HUMPHREY, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

STATEMENT OF PURPOSES

SECTION 1. It is the purpose of this Act to promote the general welfare by assisting individuals with low incomes, the unemployed, and others, to secure an adequate and proper diet of foods high in nutritional value which are ordinarily consumed in inadequate quantities by persons in such groups through the initiation of a food certificate program. It is the intent of Congress that nothing in this Act should be construed as intending or justifying the payment of inadequate wages, the lowering of standards of public assistance, or the lowering of unemployment compensation benefits.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. As used in this Act—

(a) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare.

(b) The term "food certificate" shall mean a certificate, coupon, stamp, or other medium of exchange issued to an eligible recipient pursuant to the provisions of this Act.

(c) The term "designated food store" means an established grocery store, or merchant engaged in the distribution of food at the retail level, located in the community, meeting the requirement of eligibility as determined by the Secretary.

(d) The term "State" shall include Hawaii, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands.

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE FOOD CERTIFICATE PROGRAM

SEC. 3. (a) The Secretary shall establish and administer a national food certificate program in accordance with the provisions of this Act, and shall make rules and regulations for the conduct thereof. Under such program the Secretary shall issue to eligible persons, as hereinafter provided, certificates which shall be redeemable by the recipient thereof at any designated food store for certain specified foods.

(b) The Secretary shall from time to time designate the specific food commodities which may be purchased with food certificates issued pursuant to the provisions of this Act, and such certificates may be used only for the purchase of such designated foods. Food commodities shall be designated by the Secretary which contain nutrient ingredients found by him to be commonly deficient in the diets of persons receiving assistance under this Act.

PERSONS ELIGIBLE FOR FOOD CERTIFICATES

SEC. 4. (a) The following persons shall be eligible to receive food certificates for any month—

(1) Every individual who is a recipient of assistance or benefits for such month under the programs of old-age assistance, aid to dependent children, aid to the blind, or aid to the permanently and totally disabled provided for in titles I, IV, X, and XIV, respectively, of the Social Security Act.

(2) Every individual who is a recipient of unemployment compensation benefits for such month from any State.

(3) Every individual who is the recipient of financial assistance for such month provided for the needy by any State or political subdivision thereof.

(4) Every individual who, but for lack of legal residence only, would be eligible for such month for financial or other assistance provided for the needy by the State or local subdivision in which such individual is located.

(5) Every needy individual, including unemployed individuals not eligible for unemployment compensation benefits, with respect to whom the Secretary has received a certification for such month from the welfare or public assistance agency of a State or political subdivision thereof under an agreement entered into pursuant to subsection (b) of this section.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to enter into agreements with the welfare or public assistance agency of any State or political subdivision thereof whereby such agency shall certify to the Secretary, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary, the names of individuals of such State or political subdivision who are in need of public assistance but are not eligible for food certificates under paragraphs (1), (2), or (3) of subsection (a), and the Secretary shall provide for the issuance of food certificates to be distributed to such individuals.

ISSUANCE AND VALUE OF FOOD CERTIFICATES

SEC. 5. (a) The Secretary shall provide for the preparation of food certificates for issuance to individuals eligible therefor under section 4. Such certificates shall be in such denominations as the Secretary shall determine, and no individual shall receive food certificates with a face value exceeding $5 for any month. They shall be issued monthly and shall be valid only with respect to purchases made during the month for which they are issued.

(b) Food certificates issued under the provisions of this Act may be used only at designated food stores and may be used only as part payment for food commodities purchased. Part payment shall not exceed one-half of the total cost of the food commodities purchased at the time such certificates are used, and in no event shall such certificates be used as part payment for any food commodities other than those food commodities designated by the Secretary pursuant to section 3(b).

(c) Food certificates shall be distributed by the Secretary, in the case of State agencies making payments to individuals under the programs referred to in paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of section 4(a), to the State agency making such payments, and, in the case of an individual eligible to receive food certificates under paragraph (4) or (5) of such section, to the State agency which certified the name of such individual to the Secretary. Subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary, the eligibility of any individual for food certificates shall be determined by the State agency making the payment by reason of which the individual is eligible for such certificates.

(d) Unless otherwise provided by the Secretary, food certificates for the use of individuals described in paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of section 4(a) shall be issued to such individuals at the same time and together with any payments made by the State under programs described in such paragraphs. Food certificates for the use of individuals described in paragraphs (4) and (5) of section 4(a) shall be issued to such individuals in such manner as the Secretary shall prescribe.

(e) Food certificates shall not be transferred except as provided in this Act, and shall be valid only with respect to purchases made by or on behalf of the person to whom they are issued.

REDEMPTION OF SURPLUS FOOD CERTIFICATES

SEC. 6. (a) The Secretary shall provide for redemption, through the cooperation of banking institutions throughout the Nation, of food certificates. For such purposes, he shall designate banking institutions which shall be authorized to accept such certificates from designated food stores. Institutions so designated shall pay at the time of presentation in cash or by credit to a demand deposit the full value of all food certificates presented to them.

(b) Banking institutions accepting food certificates may present to the Secretary, or such other agency as the Secretary may designate, evidence of the deposit with them of food certificates presented by designated food stores, together with appropriate vouchers. Such evidence of deposit and vouchers shall be considered complete documentation for payment and payments may be made thereon.

(c) The Secretary may advance moneys to banking institutions, where such action appears necessary, to provide funds for the redemption of surplus food certificates. Such advances shall be accounted for by such banking institutions at least monthly.

(d) The Secretary may contract to pay banking institutions designated to receive food certificates a charge determined by the Secretary to be reasonable for the services rendered in acting as such depositories.

RULES AND REGULATIONS

SEC. 7. The Secretary may, from time to time, issue such rules and regulations as he deems necessary or proper in order to carry out the purposes and provisions of this Act.

AUTHORIZATION FOR APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 8. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

CRIMINAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 9. (a) Whoever shall falsely make, alter, forge, or counterfeit or cause or procure to be falsely made, altered, forged, or counterfeited any food certificate or certificate similar thereto for the purpose of obtaining or receiving, or of enabling any other person to obtain or receive, directly or indirectly, from the United States or any of its officers or agents, any money or other thing of value, and whoever shall transfer or utter as true, or cause to be transferred or uttered as true, any such false, forged, altered, or counterfeited food certificate or certificate similar thereto, with intent to defraud the United States, or any mercantile establishment, banking institution, or person, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both.

(b) Any person not being so authorized by this Act or the regulations issued pursuant thereto, who shall have food certificates in his possession or under his control, or any person who shall use, transfer, or acquire food certificates in any manner not authorized by this Act, or the regulations issued pursuant thereto, or who shall buy, sell, or exchange food certificates without being authorized to do so by this Act or regulations issued pursuant thereto shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

REPORTS

SEC. 10. The Secretary shall make an annual report to Congress describing the operations of the food certificate plan and such report shall include information with respect to the following: The number of individuals entitled to receive such certificates; the extent to which such plan has been effective in improving or maintaining health; the effect of such plan on the expenditure habits of recipients of such certificates; the extent to which such certificates have been improperly used; and the amount and type of administrative expenditure incurred in carrying out such plan.

EFFECT ON OTHER ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

SEC. 11. Any benefits received under this Act shall not be deemed to be income or resources for the purposes of any provision of the Social Security Act, nor shall such benefits be used to justify any decrease of cash or other benefits paid to any individual by any State or local subdivision thereof.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SYMINGTON. I should like to yield to my friend, the able Senator from South Carolina, but the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] has yielded to me.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question. How can he explain to the taxpayers of the United States this condition at home, when we are giving $5 or $6 billion for foreign aid?

Mr. SYMINGTON. I believe the comment of the able Senator from South Carolina is most pertinent, indeed.

The people of the country would better understand assistance to other countries if we were taking action to eliminate the serious conditions which exist among our own people.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SYMINGTON. I thank the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin for his typical graciousness and courtesy in yielding to me. The senior Senator from Minnesota has asked me to yield to him, and I take this way of explaining to him that I do not have the floor. I thank the Senator.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I have promised to yield to the Senator from Alaska and to the Senator from Virginia. I realize that the senior Senator from Minnesota merely wishes to comment on the bill which has been introduced by him and the Senator from Missouri. I am glad to yield to him briefly for that purpose.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin. It is with great pride and honor that I join with the Senator from Missouri in the presentation of what I believe to be a very well designed and well developed program for a so-called food stamp system and food assistance program for needy people. It is inconceivable to me that our Government should find it difficult to perfect an administrative program which can bring to needy people the food which they require out of sheer humanitarian considerations.

On the floor of the Senate we have heard time after time, during the past month, statements by the Senators from Kentucky and the Senators from West Virginia—to mention only two States—dealing with the dire need of people in their respective States. Had there been a food stamp program in existence and had there been in existence the kind of program outlined by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON], those people would have had their basic food needs met. There would have been an adequate diet provided. Relief would have been provided for people undergoing that kind of suffering. All of that would have been done without any upsetting of normal markets, without any difficulty for normal retailers, and without any difficulty in connection with what we call normal customs.

I believe that the program which the Senator from Missouri has presented is long overdue. I repeat that it is a program into which a great deal of work has gone in terms of perfecting proposed legislation. We owe the Senator from Minnesota a debt of gratitude for his leadership. He was kind enough to permit me to associate myself with him, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and as one of his good friends, as a cosponsor of the proposed legislation.

I believe that the Members of the Senate will wish to urge prompt action on the proposal by the appropriate committees of Congress. I again thank the Senator for his leadership. I express to him my personal appreciation for what he has done to spell out once again what our country should do in terms of humanitarian assistance to the needy people of this country.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me for 1 minute?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I thank my good friend from Minnesota for his very kind remarks. I deeply appreciate his cosponsorship and support. The other day on a visit to one of our States I found that in that State 100,000 children have less than one-third of an adequate protein diet. I was told that in a class of 30 children in that State, only two of the fathers and mothers of those children had employment. There is a real need for the type of program we have introduced and I hope there will be prompt action on this bill.

I thank the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I promised to yield to the Senator from Alaska. First, I wish to emphasize and underline what the Senator from Missouri has said about the Secretary of Agriculture's failure to give the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry the recommendation which he told us he would give us. He made that promise in February. Anyone who reads the record which the Senator from Missouri has put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will note that the Secretary of Agriculture made the statement that he would give the committee his recommendation for a farm program; that he has not done so, and that he has indicated he has no intention of doing so. I now yield to the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, in the course of the excellent speech by the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri, in introducing the bill sponsored by him and by the able senior Senator from Minnesota, the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr JOHNSTON] interpolated a brief, terse question. I should like to see that question repeated every hour on the hour throughout the remainder of this session of Congress. It is a question which a great many people throughout the United States are asking, and properly so.

Inasmuch as a few minutes have elapsed since the Senator from South Carolina asked the question, I should like to paraphrase briefly his question as I interpret it. It is: How can we justify our failure to provide some of the essential necessities of life—food, clothing, shelter, adequate school and health facilities—to the American people, when we are constantly being asked to give more and more billions of dollars to countries overseas? Why is there not at least an equal if not a greater sense of responsibility for taking care of our domestic needs? While we are being asked to give more and more assistance abroad and warned not to diminish it by 1 cent, we are at the same time being told by the administration we must not ask for adequate funds for the necessities of life for our own people.

I hope the distinguished senior Senator from South Carolina, who uttered that appropriate query will persist in asking it. It is one of the most pertinent queries that can be asked of the Congress and the administration. The American people are asking it increasingly. I should like to have that question answered affirmatively by action on the part of Congress, whatever may be the attitude of the White House.

Mr. HUMPHREY subsequently said: Mr. President, earlier today the distinguished junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] introduced a bill to provide for a food certificate plan, as to which I made a brief comment.

I am proud to be a cosponsor of the bill introduced by the Senator from Missouri.

For too long we have let the clamor of the prosperity jubilee chorus drown out the small voices of the people in our society who have not shared in the rising standards of living that the majority have enjoyed. Through no fault of their own, these citizens have stood helplessly by, with incomes too low to buy anything other than the bare necessities, too low to secure an adequate and proper diet.

The food certificate plan presented by the Senator from Missouri is a practical plan to meet the immediate needs of more than 6 million Americans. Who are these people? They are widows struggling to rear dependent children on social security checks. They are the elderly whose working years were not fruitful enough for them to lay by a store of worldly goods sufficient to maintain them when they could no longer work. They are the unfortunates who are not physically able to keep pace with the rest of us. They are the workers whose lack of skills force them into the fields of intermittent labor at the low end of the wage scale. And, they are the industrial workers whose trained skills are no longer needed and who are drawing unemployment compensation benefits, or have exhausted these benefits.

It is for people such as these that this program is introduced. It is to give those of us who are more fortunate a way to assist those who have not been so lucky.

We have waited long enough for the enactment of this kind of assistance. Similar proposals have been made for years. This is not the ideal program, nor the most far-reaching in its benefits—and certainly it is not the most costly—but it is an affirmation of the intent of the American people to take care of their own.

Our colleague, Senator AIKEN, has long cherished a food allotment plan that would render invaluable assistance to all low income citizens, not just those on the welfare lists. It has been my honor to cosponsor Senator AIKEN's proposal in previous sessions. I will continue to support it and press for its passage. This bill, however, has never gained the official blessing of the Department of Agriculture. Somehow the Secretary of Agriculture has not felt an iota of responsibility toward those in need.

At the direction of the Congress of the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture has released from his vast storehouses certain quantities of such commodities as rice, cornmeal, white flour, dry beans, and the like. This distribution should be continued, but it does not fulfill the nutritional needs of the recipients. Our colleagues from West Virginia, Senators BYRD and RANDOLPH, have pointed out to us here on this floor the inadequacy of these few surplus commodities to fill the needs of the unemployed in their State. The welfare rolls in West Virginia carry the names of more than 300,000 persons. In Pennsylvania, more than 900,000 needy persons are receiving assistance.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a table, compiled by the Agricultural Marketing Service of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, be printed at this point in my remarks. This table shows both the number of persons eligible for assistance—those in one of the welfare categories—and those who participated in the surplus commodity distribution program in February 1959. The difference in the figures is due to the fact that not all of those eligible are able to get to the food distribution points.

Senator SYMINGTON has so thoroughly explained the operation of this food stamp plan and so conclusively stated the case for it that there is little that I can add.

A point which I would like to stress is that this plan utilizes normal, established retail stores. It will increase the amount of products moving through the stores. It does not disrupt or interfere with normal channels of trade.

Also, Mr. President, I want to assure my friends who support more adequate cash assistance programs for the aged, the blind, the disabled, the dependent children, and the unemployed that this bill is not designed as a substitute for such programs. The adoption of this proposal should be based on its own merits. It conflicts in no way with the intentions of any other program, nor does it minimize the need for strengthened cash assistance programs. When we measure the great need of people against available cash assistance and add another $5 per month in the form of food stamps, we have not even begun to give the kind of welfare benefits to the needy which they require and deserve, and which this great rich Nation can afford.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a table entitled "Number of persons in family units eligible for and participating in commodity distribution February 1959," may be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXTENSION OF THE SUGAR ACT

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield briefly to me?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Garrison Diversion Conservancy District, urging the extension of the Sugar Act.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION ADOPTED APRIL 2, 1959, BY THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE GARRISON DIVERSION CONSERVANCY DISTRICT

Be it resolved by the board of directors of the Garrison Diversion Conservancy District, the North Dakota political subdivision organized for the purpose of promoting and bringing about the development of the Garrison diversion project, duly assembled at meeting in Harvey, N. Dak., this 2d day of April 1959, That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby respectfully urged to extend the Sugar Act as proposed by S. 187, and companion measures, 86th Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of this board is directed to mail a copy of this resolution to the Honorable HARRY F. BYRD, chairman, Senate Committee on Finance; Hon. HAROLD D. COOLEY, chairman, House Committee on Agriculture; Senators WILLIAM LANGER and MILTON R. YOUNG and Representatives QUENTIN N. BURDICK and DON L. SHORT.

ROY A. HOLAND,
Chairman.

Attest:

VERNON S. COOPER,
Secretary.

TAX RECIPROCITY

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an editorial entitled "U.S. Tax Attempt Tossed Out," published in the Telegram of Toronto, Ontario, of April 11, 1959.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. TAX ATTEMPT TOSSED OUT

Rarely have tax officials suffered a more decisive defeat than has the U.S. Internal Revenue Service in the courts in Cincinnati, in the case in which the service has tried to tax a Canadian company.

Consolidated Premium Iron Ores, Ltd., a Toronto company whose business is marketing the output of Steep Rock Iron Mines Ltd., has won a clear verdict in the Federal U.S. Court of Appeals against U.S. Government tax officials who assessed it for $4,599,418 in back taxes. In this verdict, the American court has shown more sense than the tax branch of the American Government.

This is a case that has not only ruffled Canadian feelings, but threatened to upset harmonious rclations under the Canada-U.S. tax treaty that provides orderly procedure for avoidance of double taxation.

This is, moreover, the case which would have jeopardized the position of hundreds of U.S.-controlled firms in Canada and, if U.S. tax officials had had their way, delivered a severe blow to Canadian economic development to the extent that it has been based on U.S. capital investment here.

The basic doctrine of tax reciprocity, as it prevails between Canada and the United States, is that U.S. investment in Canada operates under Canadian law as to taxes and other administrative matters. Similarly, Canadian investment in the United States operates under U.S. law, with no duplication of taxes or interference from Canadian authorities.

As the Premium Iron Ore case has demonstrated, this is not good enough for U.S. Federal tax officials. Back in 1956, acting on a tax informer tip, they assessed this company, which is wholly subject to Canadian law, for back taxes in the war years when Canada allowed it tax exemption as a development incentive.

The claim rested on the contention that since Premium Iron Ore is financed by the Cyrus Eaton interests, and Mr. Eaton resides in the United States, the company was subject to U.S. tax. Not overlooked is the fact that Mr. Eaton is a sharp critic of some U.S. policies, notably in foreign affairs, and the United States attempt to collect taxes from a Canadian property of his has a bad odor of political motive, repugnant to Canadian thought.

The Canadian Government protested formally against this claim, both under the St. Laurent and the Diefenbaker regimes. The U.S. tax court described the claim as "inconsistent" and ruled against it. Now the U.S. court of appeal in Cincinnati has upheld this finding.

It's to be hoped that U.S. tax officials will be content with the verdict. Reportedly, they may still appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court. But two clear verdicts are enough to remove any legitimate doubt that the U.S. tax attempt was unfounded. In view of the impact upon Canadian-U.S. relations, it was unwise in the first place.

PROPOSED IRRIGATION RESEARCH PROGRAM IN NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a resolution adopted by the Garrison Diversion Conservancy District of Bismarck, N. Dak.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION ADOPTED APRIL 2, 1959, BY THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE GARRISON DIVERSION CONSERVANCY DISTRICT, REQUESTING AN EXPANDED IRRIGATION RESEARCH PROGRAM IN NORTH DAKOTA BY THE AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH SERVICE

Whereas the Garrison Diversion Conservancy District, a political subdivision of the State of North Dakota, established to bring about the development of the Garrison diversion project, is vitally interested in the successful development of irrigation in North Dakota as proposed under this project; and

Whereas the conservancy district recognizes the valuable work that has been performed by the North Dakota Agricultural Experiment Station and the Agricultural Research Service in irrigation research on the development farms in North Dakota and commends these agencies for their endeavors in this field; and

Whereas the conservancy district recognizes the need for a continuing and expanded irrigation research program that will provide the farmers in the Garrison diversion project area, where irrigation is a relatively untried method of farming, the basic information they need about irrigation; and

Whereas it has come to the attention of the board of directors of the Garrison Diversion Conservancy District that funds included in the Department of Agriculture's budget for fiscal year 1960 for the agricultural research activities in North Dakota will not be sufficient to permit the Agricultural Research Service to undertake new irrigation research projects after the projects presently under way are completed, which completion is scheduled for the current year; and

Whereas the North Dakota State Legislature has appropriated funds to the North Dakota Agricultural Experiment Station to acquire and partially develop a section of land near Carrington, N. Dak., for an irrigation experiment station which station is very typical of the soils, climate, topography, and drainage of the Garrison diversion project and will provide a permanent site for a continuing irrigation research program in North Dakota; and

Whereas the Garrison Diversion Conservancy District believes that the most efficient and economical way in which to obtain the essential irrigation research data is through a program accomplished by the cooperative efforts of the Agricultural Research Service and the North Dakota Agricultural Experiment Station at this Carrington Station: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the board of directors of the Garrison Diversion Conservancy District, at meeting duly assembled at Harvey, N. Dak., this 2d day of April 1959, That the Congress of the United States is respectfully urged to appropriate adequate funds to the Agricultural Research Service, Department of Agriculture, that will be available for the inauguration of an expanded irrigation research program in North Dakota by the Agricultural Research Service at the Carrington Experiment Station in cooperation with the North Dakota Agricultural Experiment Station; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Secretary of Agriculture; the chairman of the Appropriations Committees of the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives; Senators WILLIAM LANGER and MILTON R. YOUNG; Congressman QUENTIN BURDICK and DON L. SHORT; and the Director of Agricultural Research Service, U.S. Department of Agriculture.

FEDERAL INCOME TAX DAY

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, April 15 each year generally has come to be regarded as Federal income tax day.

Today being April 15, it would seem to be appropriate that we should pause to consider the reasons why such high Federal taxes are necessary.

In this connection, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the body of the RECORD a copy of the leading editorial in the Wall Street Journal of this date.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THOUGHTS FOR APRIL 15

It has long been a truism that high taxes make people disdain the law. That has been notoriously the case in France, for example; it is becoming increasingly the case in the United States.

Thus a survey recently conducted by this newspaper showed that two out of five American taxpayers interviewed admitted cheating on their returns. It was not that they used every legal provision to their advantage, but that they deliberately short-changed the Government.

Though such a poll naturally doesn't pretend to be statistically precise for the whole Nation, it is at least indicative of the mood of quite a few people. Others, who wouldn't think of cheating, pay their taxes with annoyance, anger, or disgust.

For the Government to create such a mood is bad enough; what is worse is that the thing doesn't end there. Excessive taxation breeds, in many people, a disrespect for the Government as a whole. Moreover, much of what the Government does with tax money invites both disrespect for Government and the corrosion of individual morality.

Consider the farm program, for one instance. People with a tradition of self-reliance become inured to accepting Federal handouts. Some of them, oppressed by controls, become lawbreakers. Meantime the entire spectacle hardly enhances the dignity of Government. Because Congress refuses to face today's farm facts, the program resembles something dreamed up in a madhouse. And yet a good hunk of the tax dollar goes to pay for this folly.

Similarly, few healthy veterans can possibly believe that they are entitled to innumerable Federal benefits, but they keep on taking them because they are available; why not get what the others are getting? For its part Congress, skittish of imagined political hot water, refuses to reform and reduce the veterans' program. Again, for the public at large, the impression is created of the Government handling tax money in a silly fashion.

The more the Government gets into matters of private concern, the more these twin effects show up—the undermining of individual independence and the placing of Government in an unattractive or ridiculous light.

And the outlook for the future is not auspicious. There are too many in Congress who want to expand Government much further, apparently without limit. They are looking at human existence through the wrong end of the telescope, for Government is not and cannot be the generator of wealth, as our own history abundantly proves. On the contrary, every expansion of Government, paid for through higher taxes or more inflation, is a powerful depressant on the true sources of wealth. Existing taxes are already far too high for sound economic growth.

To put it another way, just suppose that we had sound money and confidence that the Government was going to keep it sound; that we had a Government constantly cutting spending, gradually paying off the debt and reducing taxes. The effect would be electric; the economic goals proclaimed by the statists would seem piddling by comparison to what a free people would accomplish. This is the lesson of our history, and it seems incredible that so many people can manage to misread it.

We all know, or ought to, that this Government was founded in reaction to excesses of government. It was meant to be limited, for the very good reason that the people who founded it understood that in the freest possible play of individual initiative was not only the best guard against tyranny but also the surest route to material abundance. And so long as the Government remained limited it was not the target of the widespread disrespect of the people.

Now in these reflections on April 15 it is certainly not our purpose to condone those who cheat on their taxes. What we are saying is that it is an inevitable reaction to exorbitant taxation—a tax revolt in fact—and a part of the general malady of big government.

After all, Government can hardly expect anything but disrespect when it permits excessive taxation and inflation to cheat the people of their present livelihood and future hopes.

CURRENT SPENDING LEGISLATION

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement by me based on a compilation by Tax Foundation, Inc., showing the present status of current spending legislation.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BYRD OF VIRGINIA

As Congress returns from its Easter recess, it is faced with partially enacted legislation which, in its present status, clearly shows a trend toward enactment of new spending legislation far in excess of administration requests.

Senate action on spending legislation it has considered would increase requested amounts by 24 percent, and in the House of Representatives increases in legislation it has considered so far are averaging 12 percent.

I base these statements on my own interpretation of a strictly factual compilation by Tax Foundation, Inc., which shows currently active bills carrying new spending authority, and their status through Tuesday, March 24, 1959, as Congress recessed for the Easter holidays.

The Tax Foundation is an independent organization which I hold in the highest regard for its research in the field of government.

For years the foundation has been keeping a running box score on spending legislation action in each session of Congress. The present compilation is the first in its current series for the 1st session of the 86th Congress.

On the basis of incompleted legislative action to date, the compilation shows:

1. Some degree of action to date has been taken on administration proposals totaling $10,963 million.

2. The Senate has acted to some degree on administration proposals totaling $6,450 million, increasing them by $1,540 million to $7,990 million.

3. The House has acted to some degree on administration proposals totaling $10,913 million, increasing them by $1,331 million to $12,244 million.

4. The Senate has not acted on any appropriation legislation; it has dealt only with spending authority outside of effective annual appropriation control; the administration requests have been increased in each instance.

5. The only reductions under administration requests appear in House of Representatives action on some items for which final spending authority is provided in regular appropriation bills.

I append the Tax Foundation tabulation, "Congressional Action on Requested New Spending Authority—Status Through March 24, 1959," with explanatory notes:

Congressional action on requested new spending authority—status through Mar. 24, 1959 [1]

EXPLANATORY NOTES RELATING TO PRECEDING TABULATION ON "CONGRESSIONAL ACTION ON REQUESTED NEW SPENDING AUTHORITY—STATUS THROUGH MARCH 24, 1959"

1. The tabulation covers only spending authority requiring no further action by Congress in advance of incurrence of obligations. The three types of spending authority, as recognized in the budget, are appropriations, contract authority, and authority to expend from debt receipts—the latter two representing the so-called "back door" approaches to the Treasury. Authorizations to appropriate, which require further action by Congress and are not considered at this point as within the budget, are excluded. Thus, the tabulation omits certain authorizations to appropriate in the housing and depressed areas bills. The House committee version of the housing bill, in addition to the various amounts carried in the tabulation, also authorizes appropriation of $100 million for loans to nonprofit corporations for housing for elderly persons, as well as smaller amounts for other purposes. It also revives a public housing program which could cost $3.7 billion under a 1949 authorization of appropriations, according to official estimates. The Senate-approved depressed areas bill, in addition to providing spending authority listed in the tabulation, also authorizes appropriations of $89.5 million for specific purposes, plus an indefinite amount for administrative costs.

2. Spending authority intended to be effective in the current fiscal 1959, in fiscal 1960, and in other future years is combined in a single tabulation. Measures listed for fiscal 1959 include those which would be effective in the current year if enacted before June 30, even though comparable proposals may be a part of the administration fiscal 1960 program.

3. The postal deficit is the only part of postal costs which affects the budget. Appropriations from postal receipts are omitted from the tabulation. The budget estimate of $172 million for the fiscal 1960 postal deficit assumed approval of a recommended increase in postal rates to yield $350 million. The House reduced total postal appropriations by $52 million. On the basis of existing rates, the estimated appropriation of $470 million for the postal deficit is an increase of $298 million over the estimate in the budget.

4. The bill authorizing commitments to the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, as passed by the Senate, provides that it shall not be effective until after the beginning of fiscal 1960. As reported to the House, it would be effective in fiscal 1959, as proposed by the administration. The $1,375 million contribution to the International Monetary Fund is an immediate budget expenditure under the administration proposal and its deferment would unbalance the fiscal 1960 budget by a substantial amount. More than $1 billion of this amount would be paid in a non-interest-bearing note, which becomes a part of the public debt. Its deferment might have a bearing on the urgency of an increase in the debt ceiling, believed by the administration to be necessary before June 30. The $3,175 million commitment for the International Bank, while the same type of spending authority as that for the Fund, is not expected to become a budget expenditure. This commitment is intended to facilitate the financing of the Bank's operations by sale of bonds.

5. The tabulation reflects possibilities for affecting the budget situation adversely, from the expenditure side only, at this stage. Rejection in whole or in part of administration proposals for increases in tax revenues, which have made little progress as yet, or losses in revenues resulting from actions by Congress, also could have serious effects upon the budget, either in fiscal 1960 or immediately succeeding years.

6. Comparisons for each branch of Congress relate to the latest stage of action. No appropriations bills have been acted upon in the Senate thus far.

FIDEL CASTRO OF CUBA

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, some months ago when some of us in the Senate publicly criticized Castro of Cuba for the blood baths he was carrying on in Cuba and for his violation of all the civilized rules of fair procedure in the trial of war criminals, statements attributed to Castro came out of Cuba, that the executions would be limited to those who, the Castro followers were satisfied, were guilty of having committed atrocities under the Batista regime.

Some of us, including the senior Senator from Oregon, have been very critical of the inhumanity, brutality, and totalitarianism of the Batista regime, as is evidenced by the fact that, as a member of the Subcommittee on Latin-American Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I led the fight in that committee for a cessation of the shipment of American arms to Batista. We who had taken that position felt that the explanation given by Castro was no justification for inhumanity to man, and that the sound, civilized principles of the Geneva convention should be followed in Cuba.

I have before me a news dispatch dated at Havana, April 14, all of which I shall ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, but a part of the article reads as follows:

Premier Castro has stated that those convicted of counterrevolutionary activities would be executed by firing squad. Some 2 weeks ago five men were arrested for conspiring to kill Dr. Castro. They were lodged in La Cabaña fortress across the bay from Havana, where some "war criminals" of the Batista regime are awaiting trial.

The article continues by pointing out that one person was condemned to be executed because of the alleged sale of marijuana.

Although Dr. Castro said in a public speech that those trafficking in narcotics, those involved in illegal gambling, in counterrevolutionary activities, and those who misappropriated funds would be executed by firing squad, no legislation has been approved fixing this penalty.

It is with sadness that I report such an announcement coming out of Cuba. I still think a system of government by law, based upon fair procedure, ought to prevail if the head of the Cuban Government wants to represent that his is a government of freedom, personal liberty, and fair procedure.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article, entitled "Cuba Arrests Nine in Plot," published in the New York Times of April 15, 1959, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CUBA ARRESTS NINE IN PLOT—OTHERS ARE REPORTED INVOLVED IN ANTI-CASTRO CONSPIRACY

HAVANA, April 14.—Nine persons, including a former councilman of the municipality of Regla across the bay from Havana, have been arrested on a charge of conspiring against the revolutionary government. The group was arrested in a meeting in a house in Regla.

The police say they found documents that will lead to the arrest of others involved in the conspiracy. A report circulating in Havana today said that "10th of March" bombs and arms were seized in the house, although this has not been comfirmed by the police, March 10 was the date on which the former President Fulgencio Batista seized control of the Government in 1952, thus linking the conspiracy to the former regime.

Premier Castro has stated that those convicted of counterrevolutionary activities would be executed by firing squad. Some 2 weeks ago five men were arrested for conspiring to kill Dr. Castro. They were lodged in La Cabaña Fortress across the bay from Havana, where some 800 "war criminals" of the Batista regime are awaiting trial.

The appeal of Heriberto Bertematy Rodriguez, who was condemned April 19 to be executed if convicted of the sale of marijuana, will be presented tonight in La Cabaña.

Although Dr. Castro said in a public speech that those trafficking in narcotics, those involved in illegal gambling, in counterrevolutionary activities and those who misappropriated public funds would be executed by firing squad, no legislation has been approved fixing this penalty. However, Bertematy was sentenced under article 16 of the Rebel Criminal Code, which was interpreted by the court to apply the death penalty to any crime it considered to be to the social detriment of the nation.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent also to have printed in the RECORD at this point an article entitled "Costa Rican Denies Charges by Castro," published in the New York Times of April 14, 1959.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COSTA RICAN DENIES CHARGES BY CASTRO

SAN JOSE, COSTA RICA, April 13.—Former President José Figueres has indignantly denied charges by Premier Fidel Castro of Cuba that he was an "agent of Yankee imperialism."

In a recorded speech broadcast today, Dr. Figueres said: "I want the support of the people, not the rabble. I do not want to happen to me what has happened in other Central American countries, where they have substituted the rabble for the people in order to claim popular support."

At this point his audience of veterans of the 1948 revolt here shouted, "Down with Fidel Castro." Figueres did not intervene.

Warning that a distinction must be drawn between genuine democratic revolutions and those prompted by rabble-supported demagogues, he continued: "In every American country there exists a Communist nucleus that backs a demogogue's leadership solely to overthrow it later and establish not merely dictatorship of the proletariat but mob dictatorship.

HAVANA, April 13.—Dr. Castro said today that elections in Cuba would be delayed until his revolutionary government had finished its work.

He also repeated the charge that his enemies were buying arms in Miami and preparing a campaign against him there.

NOMINATION OF CLARE BOOTHE LUCE TO BE AMBASSADOR TO BRAZIL

Mr. MORSE. Mr President, at a hearing before the Committee on Foreign Relations this morning I asked Mrs. Luce some questions concerning her record and her statements. One of my colleagues on the committee asked if questions on those subjects had been asked when the nomination of Mrs. Luce to be Ambassador to Italy was being considered. She said they had not been asked. I think the record will show that she said something to the effect that it was a private hearing, not a public hearing.

I asked Mrs. Luce if I was a participant in that hearing. She said I was. I asked her if she believed I was a member of the committee at that time. She said she believed I was. I told her I was certain that she was mistaken.

But I always document my statements. Therefore, let the RECORD show that I had not even been appointed to the Committee on Foreign Relations until some 2 years after Mrs. Luce was before the committee in 1953, when her nomination to be Ambassador to Italy was considered.

But even if I had been a member of the committee at that time, I probably would not have asked her questions on the points about which I asked her this morning, because I was not aware until recently of the very unfortunate remarks which she made.

I simply wish to say on the floor of the Senate, before I go to the committee room to vote against the confirmation of the nomination of Mrs. Luce this afternoon, that the great architect of the Good Neighbor Policy, whose memory is revered all over Latin America and South America, was Franklin Roosevelt. I have no intention of voting to confirm the nomination as Ambassador of Brazil of anyone—man or woman—who admits, as Mrs. Luce admitted again this morning, that she did say that Franklin Roosevelt was the only President in the history of the United States who lied us into a war. I asked her to document the charge. I will never vote to confirm the nomination of anyone who is guilty, as I told her this morning, of such subversive statements.

RESPONSIBILITY OF THE INDIVIDUAL SENATOR—ITS DISINTEGRATION—PART III: RESPONSIBILITY TO THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY PLATFORM

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, in February and again last month I pleaded on the floor of the Senate for more democracy in the Democratic Party in this body.

These speeches do not in any sense constitute an attempt to organize a revolt or to split or divide the Democratic Party in the Senate. As I have said before, the Senate, like the country, urgently needs strong leadership. Indeed, there is no intention to weaken the remarkably able leadership of our majority leader. I think he has served his party, the Senate, and the country very well. There is every intention, however, to make the great power which properly inheres in his office subject to the kind of direction and control to which it should be: that of all other Democratic Senators.

Since I last spoke in the Senate on this subject, other Senators have made criticisms of the conduct of the leadership. I warmly approve each of these criticisms. They were constructive and positive. They were calculated to achieve the same objective I seek; that is, the opportunity for more Democratic Senators to have a voice in Democratic policy or to have Democratic policy determined so that it can be known by all members of the Democratic Party in the Senate.

FIGHT FOR FULL SENATE REPRESENTATION FOR ALL STATES

Mr. President, I want to make it emphatically clear that this is not a fight for the rights of individuals who happen to be U.S. Senators. It is a fight for full representation for the States these Democratic Senators represent. Once again, Mr. President, I will not be personal, but no one can convince me: First, that the Senator from Texas is in any direct sense responsible to the people of Wisconsin as is the Senator from Wisconsin; or second, that the Senator from Texas knows as much about the needs of the people of Wisconsin as does the Senator from Wisconsin. As long as the Senators from Wisconsin, Michigan, Illinois, and Pennsylvania, for instance, are denied the right to have anything to say about where our party is going in this body, the people of Wisconsin, Michigan, Illinois, and Pennsylvania are denied that right too. This is a fight for full representation in the Senate of the United States for all Americans.

ACID TEST: RESULTS

But it is more than this, Mr. President, and this is why I am speaking today. In the hard-eyed view of many, the test of any legislative body is not in its procedures or organization—however good or bad, just or unjust they may be. The real test is in the results: The laws which a legislative body writes onto the statute books or fails to write.

How do we measure these results? How do we tell whether a legislative body is or is not doing the job it should do? What fair, objective standard of evaluation is available?

Every Senator, every editorial writer—in fact, every interested citizen—has his own subjective standard of assessment. These standards differ so that what one competent and honest critic would call a distinguished record of accomplishment, another equally competent and honest critic might call a disaster for America and mankind.

PARTY PLATFORM AS STANDARD

No standard, therefore, can satisfy everyone or come close to it. There is one standard, however, that can measure objectively and precisely the performance of a party. That is the standard which the party itself has adopted. The national platform of a political party was freely established by responsible members of that party before its candidates went to the American people to ask for their support.

Mr. President, the performance of a party in compliance with its platform measures a moral responsibility that was summed up simply, bluntly, and, I think, brilliantly by former President Harry S. Truman in his Memoirs, when he wrote:

> The platform of a political party is a promise to the public. Unless a man can run on his party's platform—and try to carry it out, if elected—he is not an honest man * * *. When I was elected President, I tried to carry out the platform promises that had been made. The basic principle in all of those platforms was the benefit of the average man who has no pull in Washington. To me, party platforms are contracts with the people, and I always looked upon them as agreements that had to be carried out.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I must leave the Chamber, to attend a meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee, which is scheduled for 3 o'clock.

I wish to say that I have read the prepared text of the Senator's speech, and I wish to associate myself with its major premise, which I believe is a plea on the part of Democratic Senators for a recognition that a political platform is a solemn promise made by a political party, in the form of an offer of a political contract.

As I said in the Senator's home State a week ago last night, as I supported the position he has taken in the Senate for greater Democratic practices and procedures within the operations of the Democratic Party in the Senate, I believe that the Democratic Party has a duty to the American people to keep faith with its pledges of 1956, in the last contract it offered. And come 1960, I believe the American people will take a long, hard look at the 1960 platform, from the standpoint of evaluating the degree to which in good faith we have tried to keep our pledges of 1956.

I believe the Senator from Wisconsin is performing a great service for the Democratic Party, by having the courage and the forthrightness to stand on the floor of the Senate and make his plea for carrying out the pledges of our party; and I am proud to associate myself with his point of view.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I wish to express my deep gratitude to the distinguished Senator from Oregon. I know of no one, either in or out of the Senate, whose support I would rather have. He has always demonstrated integrity and courage, and he has said exactly what was on his mind, let the chips fall where they may. That is exactly the kind of support I am particularly glad to have.

Of course, Mr. President, I recognize that the President of the United States is primarily responsible to the platform of his party, and the responsibility of Senators to the platform is of a different degree. Nevertheless, it is a responsibility that has been recognized emphatically and clearly. For instance, in the Report of the LaFollette-Monroney Committee, the Joint Committee on the Reorganization of Congress, in March 1946, there was this affirmation:

> Strong recommendations were made for formal expression within the Congress—
> I repeat, "within the Congress"—of the main policies of the majority and minority parties. These recommendations called for some mechanism which could bring about more party accountability for policies and pledges announced and made in the national platforms of the major political parties * * * only through the expression of the will of the people by their support of political parties on the basis of their platform pledges can the majority will be determined.

FUTURE PERFORMANCE AS MEASURE

So today, Mr. President, I propose that we measure the performance of the Senate against our party platform. Furthermore, in order to make this proposal as constructive as possible, I suggest that we look ahead, rather than behind. The record of the 85th Congress is history. We can quarrel over the promises it kept and the promises it did not keep. But such recriminations would serve a far less useful purpose than to look strictly to the future: to set forth the promises that were made by our Democratic Party in 1956 that have not yet been kept, but which our party can still redeem this year and next.

I believe very deeply that frequent caucuses of the Democratic Party would be immensely helpful in giving the Democratic Party the force it needs for redemption of these promises. There are other vital procedural changes that would help, too, such as expansion of the Democratic Policy Committee, or promulgation of a Senate Democratic program, announced as such by any responsible Democratic agency in the Senate, including the majority leader.

But I shall willingly concede that if the following significant pledges of the 1956 platform are honored by the United States Senate this year or next, then the party leadership will have demonstrated its practical party responsibility, whether caucuses are held or are not held.

STILL-TO-BE-KEPT PLEDGES

The performance of the party with regard to these promises—ratified by the National Democratic Convention in 1956—between now and sine die adjournment in 1960, will be the test.

The still-to-be-kept promises from the 1956 Democratic platform that follow are the major pledges made to the vast majority of Americans who are often forgotten between elections. In the case of these pledges, I shall mention the citizens to whom the promises have been made, and who await their fulfillment.

First of all, we assumed responsibility to the children in crowded schoolrooms, by promising—and this promise is yet to be kept:

> We pledge the Democratic Party to * * * legislation providing Federal financing to assist States and local communities to build schools.

Second. We assumed the responsibility of promising the families who are without homes of their own—and this is another promise yet to be kept:

> We pledge * * * that the availability of low-interest housing credit will be kept consistent with the expanding housing needs of the Nation.

Third. We assumed the responsibility of promising the taxpayers whose taxes are high and whose incomes are modest—and these are two more promises which are yet to be kept:

> The immediate need is to correct the inequities in the tax structure which reflect the Republican determination to favor the few at the expense of the many.
> We favor an increase in the present personal tax exemption of $600 to a minimum of at least $800.

Military and budget requirements may make this impractical, but certainly the pledge to correct inequities should be honored.

Fourth. We assumed the responsibility of promising the low income, nonunion workers—and these are two more promises which are yet to be kept.

> We feel it imperative to raise the minimum wage to at least $1.25 an hour.
> We further pledge as a matter of priority to extend full protection of the (minimum wage law) * * * to all workers engaged in or affecting interstate commerce.

Fifth. We assumed the responsibility of promising the families who live in slums—and this is another promise which is yet to be kept:

> We favor increasing the Federal share of the cost of the urban redevelopment and renewal programs.

Sixth. We assumed the responsibility of promising the citizens whose rights are now denied because of race or religion—and these are three more promises yet to be kept:

The Democratic Party pledges itself to continue its efforts to eliminate illegal discrimination of all kinds in relation to: Full rights to engage in gainful occupation;

Full rights to enjoy security of the person.

Full rights to education in all publicly supported institutions.

In all fairness, I think it should be acknowledged that the 1957 Civil Rights Act fulfills the platform pledge for legislation to eliminate illegal discrimination in relation to the full right to vote; and certainly the majority leadership deserves great credit for that accomplishment. That Act is the first civil-rights Act in 80 years.

Seventh. We assumed the responsibility of promising the family breadwinners who are without jobs—and these are two more promises which are yet to be kept:

We shall continue to work for a stronger unemployment insurance system, with broader coverage and increased benefits consistent with rising earnings.

We shall also work for the establishment of a floor to assure minimum level and duration of benefits and fair eligibility rules.

Eighth. We assumed the responsibility of promising the families who are making payments on mortgages or on time-payment plans—of course this group includes most American families—and this is another promise which is yet to be kept:

We pledge ourselves to a vigilant review of our debt management policy in order to reduce interest rates in the service of our common welfare.

The Senate Finance Committee conducted the investigation of debt management policy, but Congress has refused to take any effective action to lower interest rates. Everyone knows that interest rates have been rising.

Ninth. We assumed the responsibility of promising the citizens whose political influence is confined to their votes—and again another promise which we have yet to keep.

The Democratic Party pledges itself to provide effective regulation and full disclosure of campaign expenditures and contributions in elections to Federal offices.

Tenth, and finally, Mr. President, we assumed the responsibility of promising the family farmers—and this is another promise which we have yet to keep—that we would improve farm income. The pledge in the platform explicitly ties the party to 90 percent price supports and the extension of such supports to most agricultural commodities not now supported. In view of the failure of the Congress to act in 1957 or 1958 to fulfill the Democratic Party's farm plank in any part, the situation is now such that complete platform redemption is impractical. Any measure that would improve farm income to any significant extent at less cost to the taxpayer would be about as much as could be fairly expected of the Democratic majority. But at least this promise to the family farmer should be kept; and it seems a fair reading of the party platform indicates that the Senate has an obligation to keep at least that part of the promise.

These are explicit or reasonably explicit promises made by the Democratic Party in its 1956 platform. They are the principal promises made to 10 very large groups of forgotten citizens. They represent promises made by our party to what President Truman called "the average person who has no pull in Washington"; or the man whose political influence, like the farmer's, is dwindling and is relatively small between elections. It is small, that is, in relation to the number of farmers in the population, and the farmer's importance when the party draws up its campaign appeal for votes.

I have omitted pledges which could have been kept but are now impossible to keep, such as the platform pledge for majority cloture. This civil rights promise is dead until 1961 because of the successful fight led by the majority leader at the outset of this session against its fulfillment.

If no significant additional attempt is made by the leadership to fulfill these promises. I think it is a fair conclusion that one-man rule, the lack of democracy in the Senate of which I have complained, is not getting results that caucuses might very well achieve.

The fact is that many Democratic Senators ran for office and were elected on many of these pledges. I am convinced that regular systematic legislative caucuses called to consider our party's responsibility to its platform would permit our party, with its 2 to 1 majority in the Senate, to keep many of these 15 promises.

Let me make my position absolutely clear. The majority leader and the Democratic majority in the 85th Congress did an excellent job in keeping promises in a number of specific fields: National defense, statehood, postal pay, power and water, atomic energy, foreign aid, and international trade. But in serving the interests of those whose influence between elections dwindle and disappear until it is time to ask for their support again, the Democratic majority still has a big job to do.

CHALLENGE TO THE LEADERSHIP

The 85th Congress is history, but nearly 2 full years remain to the 86th. This is the challenge I am proposing to our leadership. If all or most of these specific pledges made by our party to the voters of America are kept before adjournment in 1960, the majority leadership will have given a ringing, substantive answer to my plea for more Senate democracy. On the other hand, if these promises remain empty and unanswered, it will be clear to all Americans how big a stake they have in the democracy in the Senate for which I have been fighting.

And the stake in Senate democracy will be especially big for the parents of the child in the crowded school; or the young couple unable to meet the stiff interest payments necessary for a decent home or the $6,000 a year taxpayer struggling to support his family under a burden of Federal income taxes made heavier because of vast loopholes for the oil boys and the capital-gains-exception boys who know their way around in Washington.

The vast majority of Americans will find themselves included, not once but several times, in the categories of citizens for whom the major promises made in the Democratic platform of 1956 have yet to be kept.

This is a fight for those who exercise their only political influence when they go into the voting booth on election day and cast their ballot for the man and party that promises to stand for their interest.

Of course, this is the same old battle that has historically perplexed representative government. Special interests are immensely skilled in finding ways of frustrating the general interest. They will continue to work shrewdly and effectively to keep these promises from being fulfilled in the coming 2 years.

A regular legislative party caucus, called to discharge our Democratic responsibility to our Democratic platform is one answer. This is the traditional, proven method of assuming full party responsibility in the Senate. But the majority leader can show that Senate democracy is not the only way to meet our responsibility. He can answer special interest pressure by driving for the passage of legislation promised to the 10 groups of citizens who are still waiting to have the pledges made to them fulfilled.

Finally, this is not a matter of liberal fighting conservative. We have as much of an obligation to keep promises that might be classified as conservative as we have to keep those considered liberal. Our duty is to do what we said we would do. This is a matter of plain morality. We Democrats have made promises to tens of millions of Americans—average Americans who have no powerful national associations or labor unions or influential friends—to secure justice for them. They had only their faith that when they voted Democratic the promises made to them would be kept. We have made our promises. Now we have a moral duty to try to keep them.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. McNAMARA. I did not have the opportunity of hearing the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin as it was delivered on the floor of the Senate, but the Senator very kindly furnished me, in advance, a copy of his address. I want to join with him in his remarks, and to congratulate him on the fine presentation he has made.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan. Nobody has more clearly or dramatically or sharply nailed down the issue than the Senator from Michigan did when he pointed out that not only have we not kept the party pledge with regard to unemployment compensation, but that there was no way the 16 Democratic Senators who sponsored the McNamara unemployment compensation amendment or proposal could secure a Democratic policy position. The Senator from Michigan tried in every way he could to persuade the leadership to afford them an opportunity to appear before the policy committee, and so forth, in order to achieve a position of the majority on unemployment compensation. I think in this fight he dramatically demonstrated how urgently necessary it is to develop the kind of institution for which I have been pleading—not simply for us as a matter of our own dignity and satisfaction, but for the people we represent, the people we fight for, and to whom we have made our promises.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

THE PRESIDENT'S REQUEST FOR DEVELOPMENT LOAN FUND SHOULD BE APPROVED

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, in a few days the U.S. Senate will have the opportunity to vote on the President's request for a mutual security program supplemental appropriation for the Development Loan Fund.

Two years ago, after a thorough review of our mutual security program, this organization was created. It is to the great credit of the Congress that the Development Loan Fund, a highly constructive supplement to our foreign economic policy, was organized. This Fund exists to help the economic development of peoples less fortunate than ourselves. It does so by providing long-term repayable loans, instead of grants or gifts, to economically and technically sound projects in a characteristically American fashion. It thus has a real appeal to the American taxpayer. Loans can only be made after careful review by a competent Board of Directors, and only to countries outside the Communist orbit. Loans are made for a specified period of time, at reasonable rates of interest, and only for projects which will contribute to the long-term economic growth of the country in which the project is undertaken.

I sincerely believe there is an imperative need for the Development Loan Fund and its place in the conduct of our foreign policy.

RELATION TO FOREIGN POLICY

Acting Secretary of State Herter, in testimony before the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee, declared our major foreign policy objectives to be:

> First, we are trying to establish a stable world order, built on a durable peace.
> Second, we are encouraging the economic growth of free nations, for both practical and humanitarian reasons.
> Our third objective is to gain ever-widening acceptance of the idea of the dignity of the human individual.

We seek to achieve these objectives by a variety of means, but sound economic development in underdeveloped countries plays an essential part in the achievement of them all.

Since the close of the Second World War, 20 new nations have emerged in the world. For the great majority of them their struggles to obtain stability and orderly development cannot be won unless the poverty, disease, and death, which have marked their course, are overcome.

For hundreds of millions of people, life, even in this age of solar and nuclear power, is still a Hobbsian nightmare—"brutish, short, and nasty." It is unthinkable that these teeming millions who live in what are called the underdeveloped countries of Asia, the Middle East, Africa, and Latin America will be content to accept these conditions for very long. They seek a better life. There can no longer be any question that these countries will seek to develop themselves. The only question is, How?

The success of our mutual security program in maintaining the peace, in deterring further Communist aggression, and the swallowing up of still free peoples has forced the Communists into a new offensive posture. Since 1954, unable to break up our defensive alliances, the Soviet-bloc countries have directed their energies toward economic penetration of underdeveloped countries.

Economic development requires capital. For the underdeveloped countries there are three possible sources of capital—domestic, Communist, and Western. The relative emphasis which underdeveloped countries place on these alternative sources will profoundly affect their economic and political evolution and consequently our security, prosperity and freedom.

A good part of the capital needs of the underdeveloped countries can and must be supplied from domestic sources. But for most of these countries existing production is barely sufficient to cover current consumption needs. Only a small margin of production, therefore, can be channeled into the formation of capital. If these countries despair of obtaining sufficient capital from abroad, they will be forced to adopt totalitarian measures at home. They will seek development by suppressing consumption and by forcibly mobilizing capital and labor. And this is not politically healthful to the free, self-governing nations of the world. A contemporary and terrifying example are the new communes of Communist China. Here may be found today what George Orwell predicted for 1984. These nations may withdraw into militant and embittered nationalism. For them, development will create a climate in which freedom will find grave difficulty to survive. For us, it will mean the loss of many vital raw materials and markets, a vast erosion of our world power and the end of an opportunity to further the cause of human freedom.

The second source of capital for the underdeveloped countries is the Communist bloc. As we well know, the Communist leaders use trade and aid as political weapons. Even though their assistance may be unaccompanied by formal political conditions, the spread of their capital, technology, and manpower throughout the underdeveloped countries is calculated in advance to have a beneficent political effect for communism.

The third source of capital is the industrialized West—primarily the United States. This means that our investment, public or private, represents the only chance for the underdeveloped countries to achieve a tolerable rate of economic development without sacrificing human values in their governmental systems or among their peoples. In this connection, it is easily understandable why private American capital is reluctant to pioneer loans in many of these unsettled areas.

The United States, with 6 percent of the world's population, produces 40 percent of the world's goods. We enjoy a per capita income of $2,400 per year, while per capita income in the underdeveloped countries varies between $50 and $300 per year. Food, though barely sufficient to sustain life, is far below health standards in the underdeveloped countries. Energy, except for that supplied by human beings is about one-twentieth the amount produced per person in the more developed countries.

Most of these countries lack anything approaching sufficient basic facilities in transportation, power, and communications. Financial and commercial institutions are often inadequate. Manufacturing and extractive facilities are frequently technically backward or nonexistent.

The Soviet bloc countries have been exploiting these conditions as rapidly and ruthlessly as their own forced-draft industrial growth permits. Consider the very attractive package offered by the Soviet Union through their representative to the Asian-African Peoples Solidarity Conference at Cairo in December, 1957:

> We do not seek to get any advantages. We do not need profits, privileges, controlling interest, concession, or raw material sources. We do not ask you to participate in any blocs, reshuffle your governments, or change your domestic or foreign policy. We are ready to help you as brother helps brother, without any interest whatever, for we know from our own experience how difficult it is to get rid of need. Tell us what you need and we will help you and send, according to our economic capabilities, money needed in the form of loans or aid—to build for you institutions for industry, education, and hospitals—our only condition is that there will be no strings attached.

We cannot underestimate the effectiveness of appeals of this sort. In the period 1953–56 the Soviet bloc made agreements with 10 underdeveloped country of the Middle East and Africa to provide them with $1.5 billion in economic aid. Although not all of this total has actually been expended so far, funds are being made available as projects are approved. On a global basis the Communist aid effort is still much smaller than ours, but it has come to approach the size of our effort in key uncommitted countries such as Burma and Indonesia. It now greatly exceeds our effort in Afghanistan, Egypt, Syria, Yemen, and Nepal.

Three facts in particular should be noted about the Communist aid offensive. First, it is highly selective, concentrated in those countries not yet firmly committed to either side in the cold war. Second, it emphasizes projects having an important psychological impact in the recipient countries. Third, in contrast with most of our assistance programs, Communist aid is provided on terms specially adapted to the needs and desires of the underdeveloped countries—long-term, low interest loans—commonly at 2 to 2.5 percent—with the possibility of at least partial repayment in commodities or local currencies, with no formal economic or political commitments and with a minimum of administrative redtape.

The increase in Communist aid to the underdeveloped countries has been matched by an increase in Communist trade. The Soviet Union itself has been taking the agricultural surpluses of these countries—Egypt's cotton, Burma's rice, Uruguay's wool—and sending in return arms or capital goods and raw material neded for development. Between 1953 and 1956 the Soviet Union nearly doubled its imports from the underdeveloped countries and increased its exports to them more than fivefold. Other members of the Communist bloc—Poland, Czechoslovakia, and more recently Communist China, have also increased their trade with the underdeveloped countries, although by lesser amounts. By the end of 1958, Western businessmen were talking about Communist China's "economic invasion" of Asia and Africa.

For most countries of the Middle East and Asia and elsewhere, trade with the Communist bloc is growing at a faster rate than trade with the non-Communist world. In certain cases this has led to an economic dependence on Communist countries which has increased vulnerability to Communist influence. From Egypt, for example, the Communist block took 12 percent of exports—mostly cotton—in 1953, 34 percent in 1956, and 46 percent in 1957. A comparable growth in dependence on exports to the Communist bloc—mostly fish—has developed in Iceland, a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

The increase in Communist bloc aid and trade with underdeveloped countries has been matched by an increase in technical assistance and cultural exchange. During the last half of 1957, 2,300 Soviet-bloc technicians worked for a month or longer in 19 such countries of the non-Communist world. During the year as a whole about 2,000 technicians, professional people and students from these countries went for training to the Soviet Union or other Communist centers. Moscow, suddenly become a world center, is swarming with Arabs, Africans and Asians eagerly absorbing Communist know-how.

What does this farflung Communist economic offensive mean for the United States? Khrushchev himself supplied us with part of the answer when he told a group of U.S. Senators: "We value trade least for economic reasons and most for political reasons as a means for promoting better relations between countries." Stated less diplomatically, this means simply using aid and trade to advance the spread of world communism. The fact that in Russia foreign trade is a state monopoly gives Moscow a great advantage on this campaign. It can readily withhold foreign purchases, sales and credits to punish its enemies—as when it refused to send promised oil shipments to Israel after the Sinai campaign of 1956. Similarly, it can make them available to woo friends as when it buys Egyptian cotton for which there is no outlet in Western markets.

The Soviet bloc's economic offensive also promotes Communist political aims by less direct and more long-term means. The Communist leaders believe that the economic dependence fostered by their trade and aid programs will eventually lead to political dependence. They know that even where Communist loans and grants do not aid local Communist groups directly, they do so indirectly by increasing the respectability and prestige of Communists. They realize that even if Communist technicians and Communist technical training are formally restricted to scientific or economic subjects, these can still influence the institutions of an underdeveloped country. In short, the Communist economic offensive is an instrument by which the Communists hope to effect a basic change in the political orientation of the non-Communist world, particularly of the underdeveloped countries which contain the vast majority of the world's population.

In spite of the Soviet plans and programs, American policy, which seeks to aid other people to achieve their aspirations, cannot be designed as an emergency response to every zig and zag of Soviet policy. Our mutual security program, of which the Development Loan Fund is an integral part, serves to strengthen the free world's capacity to resist aggression. History has long taught us that free institutions cannot mature in a climate of chronic economic crisis. It is our intention to help these less fortunate people of the world to chart a long-term plan of economic development which will create the conditions favorable to the growth of free institutions so fundamental to the free world's continuance.

THE DEVELOPMENT LOAN FUND—EVOLUTION AND USES

The Development Loan Fund emerged out of the firm conviction of Congress that the best interests of the United States will be served if the worldwide drive for economic development is conducted within the framework of free societies and in association with the free world.

In the past, American aid was often intermingled with assistance given for other purposes. It was provided partly on a grant and partly on a loan basis and funds were programed annually by country.

The Development Loan Fund lends money for specific, economically sound, and technically feasible projects. It does not undertake the programing of annual projects by country. It is free from the requirement to obligate its funds within fixed periods, thus enabling it to concentrate upon long-range economic growth. The Fund is a revolving fund—repayments of loans and payments of interest will be available for new credit activities.

The Development Loan Fund supplements investment from other public and private sources and it does not extend credit when other financing is available on reasonable terms. The Development Loan Fund is able to provide financing on a flexible basis, where the countries might lack sufficient capacity to repay loans on normal banking terms from such institutions as the Export-Import Bank and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. Moreover, many of the most needed undertakings—power development, communications, and transportation—are not the kind that conventional financing can support.

The legislation establishing the Fund assured close coordination of its activities with our underlying foreign policy objectives by establishing a governing board which must pass upon all loans before they can be made. This Board is composed of the Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, as Chairman; the Director of ICA; the Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Export-Import Bank; Managing Director, Development Loan Fund; and the U.S. Executive Director for Reconstruction and Development, who is also an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

The Development Loan Fund is authorized to extend only loans, credits, guarantees, and other forms of financing, excluding grants or direct purchase of equity securities. Loans are usually made for periods of 15 to 30 years, and at interest rates running a little more than 4 percent as an average. This should be compared, Mr. President, with the Russians' technique of making very low interest loans, sometimes as low as one-half of 1 percent and rarely more than 2½ percent, with repayments often worked out in the form of barter deals.

The difference in interest rates has been offset by the fact that some of our loans are for longer terms than the customary 12-year period, standard for Soviet loans.

Congress initially authorized appropriations of $500 million to be available for use beginning in fiscal year 1958 and $625 million to become available in fiscal year 1959. Under these authorizations, $300 million was appropriated for use beginning in fiscal year 1958 and the executive branch last spring requested that the full $625 million authorized be appropriated for use beginning in 1959.

Ultimately, the conference committee on mutual security program appropriations agreed to appropriate only $400 million, although some members expressed the view in the conference report that the $400 million appropriation was insufficient to fulfill the objectives of the Development Loan Fund and stated:

> If additional funds are needed next January the Appropriations Committees of the House and Senate will give earnest consideration to the recommendations of the Executive in view of the importance of maintaining our friendly relations with countries with whom we have undertakings.

American experience in loan repayments since the end of the war offers convincing proof that we need not fear the capacity of prospective borrowers to repay. Between 1945 and 1958, the United States has collected $5,153 million in principal repayments; $1,805 million from reverse grants and returns; and $2,092 million in interest. As the nations of the world improve their economic foundations, repayments can be undertaken on a shorter term basis. Above all, help now assures the conditions which make repayments to the United States profitable to all concerned.

President Eisenhower believes there is an urgent need to insure the continued operation of the Fund by restoring the appropriation originally requested. In the judgment of this administration failure to do so will impair the success of our efforts to assist the underdeveloped countries to maintain and improve their standard of living in the face of the enormous population explosion underway in many of them. We must do so in the confident belief that the improvement of man's lot on this earth with the God-given right to decide his own fate is the best guarantee we have against a return to the fang and the claw of primordial man.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, the bill (S. 144) to modify Reorganization Plan No. II of 1939 and Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953.

A NEW ERA FOR LATIN AMERICA

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, on April 3 of this year the very able, amiable, and distinguished Senator from the State of Minnesota and a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee [Mr. HUMPHREY] delivered a very enlightening address entitled "A New Era for Latin America" before the student body and faculty of the University of Florida at Gainesville, Fla.

All of us are eager to do what we can to repair the deterioration which has taken place in our policy toward this area. Having for many years been deeply interested in promoting and maintaining good relations with Latin America—an area vital to our own survival in time of emergency and our economic well-being in time of peace—I was particularly pleased to read this thought-provoking address. It gave me increased encouragement to know that my colleagues in the Senate and in the House of Representatives are now taking an active part in replacing platitudes by programs of positive action to improve United States-Latin America relations.

I feel that the speech deserves the attention of all Members of Congress, and I request unanimous consent to have it inserted in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A NEW ERA FOR LATIN AMERICA

Tonight I might have selected as my topic the Berlin crisis. the troubled Middle East or the vexing problem of attempting to control the nuclear arms race. But I have chosen instead to talk about Latin America and United States policy toward her Latin American neighbors. Since the end of World War II we have been preoccupied with a series of crises on the periphery of the Communist empire—Greece, Berlin, Korea, Indochina, Suez, Quemoy, Lebanon, and again Berlin. In the meantime, the seemingly less precarious situation in Latin America went almost unnoticed.

It took the demonstrations against Vice President NIXON last spring to explode any remaining illusions about the state of our Latin American relations. The plain truth is that today inter-American relations are in a more critical stage than they have been at any time in the past 3 decades.

At this point, I would like to pause to pay tribute to the University of Florida, one of the few U.S. universities which has a well-rounded Latin American studies program. Recently, the Hispanic Foundation of the Library of Congress surveyed universities across the country to find out which ones offered Latin American studies. I am told that only eight universities fall into category I, that is, ones which offer a well-staffed, well-rounded course of study about Latin America. The University of Florida is one of these eight. Florida's awareness of the importance of inter-American understanding also has been reflected in the thoughtful and persistent efforts of Senator SMATHERS to bring attention to the realities of our foreign policy in Latin America.

We are now on the threshold of the 69th anniversary of the Organization of American States. It has long been customary at this time of the year to extol pan-American peace, solidarity and cooperation. Such oratory now would be a gratuitous gesture. It is dangerous to perpetuate comfortable fictions about a bond that has been broken. The first prerequisite of a responsible and effective policy toward Latin America is a willingness to face the facts, however unpleasant they may be.

OUR STAKE IN LATIN AMERICA

There is no disagreement on the importance of cordial, cooperative relations with our 20 sister Republics. Everyone agrees that strategically, ICBM's notwithstanding, Latin America remains one of the key foundations of our defense shield. Politically, close and harmonious relations with the Latin American people, who now number over 180 million, add to the free world's strength in the larger issues of the cold war.

Economically, the American Republics constitute a vital ingredient in our own well-being. The area is second only to Europe as a purchaser of our exports. Twenty-five percent of all our exports go there. In 1957 this meant the sale of $560 million worth of automobiles and parts, of $445 million worth of chemicals, $135 million of medicines, $121 million of edible animal products, and so on across the board of U.S. products. Latin American purchases add up to a lot of jobs for a lot of people in the United States. At the same time, imports from south of the Rio Grande consist of many strategic minerals as well as materials essential to our peacetime industries. U.S. private investments in the area now total over $9 billion, more than in any other region of the world.

Why, then, have relations deteriorated?

CRISIS POLICY

Part of the responsibility lies in our preoccupation with Europe, the Middle East and Asia. While attention to these vital areas is understandable, the resulting neglect of Latin America cannot be justified. The personal diplomacy of the administration has also tended in the same direction. With all decision-making power concentrated in Secretary Dulles, the less precarious situation in Latin America got shoved into the background until it too became a crisis. Up until the recent disturbances, I am told, Foreign Service officers working in Latin America were somehow considered to be occupying second-class positions.

TAKING LATIN AMERICA FOR GRANTED

The good neighbor policy itself may be partly to blame for the assumption that nothing much could go wrong within our hemisphere. Latin American representatives tried to make their grievances heard through proper channels and at stated conferences. Often their warnings and protests were bitter. But the good neighbor policy had been so successful in cementing United States-Latin American relations that long after its demise an aura of good will lingered on, hiding the grim realities underneath. The hangover from the good neighbor policy seems to have created an impression in the United States that the Latin American Republics were solidly with us no matter what we did or did not do.

LATIN AMERICAN REVOLUTIONS

The attitude of taking Latin America for granted is only part of the growing estrangement between the United States and Latin America. I think that our gravest error has been a misreading of the revolution gripping the region. Some people are prone to dismiss Latin American revolts as mere changes in the palace guard, while others see Communist influence in every upheaval. These stereotypes can be our undoing.

Today, the nations to the south are in the midst of an epic social revolution. We and the Communists have vied with each other in telling people the world over that they no longer have to live out their lives in hopeless misery. The peoples of Latin America took us at our word.

They want an end to semi-feudal conditions in which 5 percent of the populations owns 80–90 percent of the land; in which a handful of nationals and foreigners live in luxury while the majority live in squalor; in which disease strikes down their children and hunger and ignorance perpetuate their slavery; in which the wealthy minority joins with the army to keep things just as they are.

Many thousands of Latin Americans have risked exile, imprisonment, torture, and death to achieve responsible governments, responsive to the needs of their people. These courageous people usually come from the classes that produce political leadership—students, union leaders, professional and business men. The rash of revolutions that toppled tyrannies in Argentina, Colombia, Venezuela, and Cuba attests to their determination to achieve freedom and bread.

THE LATIN AMERICAN IMAGE OF THE UNITED STATES

In the midst of that upheaval, which we above all other peoples should be able to understand and to sympathize with, the United States has somehow managed to appear callous and indifferent. While we have eagerly sought Latin American support to stop the spread of Communist tyranny, we have demonstrated a peculiar nonchalance toward despotisms of the home-grown variety.

In 1954 Secretary Dulles took time to fly to the ninth Inter-American Conference in Caracas to press for an inter-American declaration against Communist intervention in the Western Hemisphere. That very same year we bestowed the Legion of Merit on Pérez Jiménez (pronounced Hema-nes) then the hated dictator of Venezuela. The incredible citation reads in part:

"To H. E. Marcos Pérez Jiménez, President of the Republic of Venezuela for the exceptional nature of his outstanding accomplishments. His Excellency, as President of the Republic of Venezuela and previously, has demonstrated a spirit of friendship and cooperation with the United States. The sound economic, financial, and foreign investment policies advocated and pursued by his administration have contributed greatly to the economic well-being of his country, and to the rapid development of its tremendous resources. These policies, judiciously combined with a far-reaching public works program, have remarkably improved its education, sanitation, transportation, housing, and other important basic facilities."

Shortly after our tribute to Pérez Jiménez, the Archbishop of Caracas dared to denounce the tyrant in a pastoral letter, and thousands of anguished Venezuelans hazarded their lives to get rid of the bloody oppressor upon whom we had lavished praise.

On January 10, 1958—just 13 days before unarmed men, women, and children rose heroically against the brutal Venezuelan dictatorship—the man who had been our Ambassador to Venezuela from 1951 to 1956 wrote from his new post in Turkey to the dictator's savage secret police chief congratulating him for putting down the first abortive revolt. The letter, on Foreign Service stationery, came to light after the democratic revolution.

These incidents are, unfortunately, not isolated. Our Defense Department, in the middle of the Cuban revolt, decorated the officer who had commanded air raids against the Cuban people. We kept up a stream of armaments to Batista long after it had become apparent that he was using them against his own people, contrary to the terms of our defense agreement.

The Communists, of course, are getting a lot of mileage out of such errors. But we must face up the fact that our own actions, not Communist propaganda, have created throughout Latin America an image of the United States as a nation selfishly engrossed in defending its own freedoms, but heedless of the aspirations of others.

THE ECONOMIC SITUATION IS SERIOUS

U.S. official attitudes with regard to Latin America's economic problems have deepened the estrangement between us.

Our economic attitudes toward Latin America have created the image of the United States as arrogant, paternal, interested primarily in promoting the interests of U.S. investors, and unconcerned for the well-being of ordinary human beings. It is painful to think that the generous impulse of the United States, which first created the idea of technical assistance in Latin America in 1942, now seems so perverted.

As you know, all the American Republics, to a greater or less degree, fall into the category of underdeveloped countries. All are dependent on the export of one, or at best a few, commodities to earn the foreign exchange to buy vital necessities and to finance economic development.

Any downswing in the world price or demand for their few exports plays havoc with their income. This uncertainty makes development planning exceedingly difficult.

With an average annual per capita income of less than $300, some areas in Latin America are hard pressed to maintain even this low living standard in the face of a rapidly growing population.

Our neighbors have not been sitting on their hands waiting for assistance. Ninety percent of the capital invested in the area is Latin America's own. The reserves accumulated from the sale of raw materials during World War II, made possible a spurt of development in the region. From 1945 to 1953 the average per capita income rose at the rate of 3.3 percent a year, and Mexico, for example, achieved a rate twice as great. After 1952, with reserves depleted and the price and demand for Latin America's principal products on the decline, the accelerated rate of development ground to a halt.

Responsible leaders in Latin America are worried. On the one hand they have populations awakened from centuries of apathy who are demanding a better deal in life. On the other hand, the ubiquitous Communists are there, dangling tempting promises before the eyes of the underprivileged. Democratic leaders in Latin America know that they must produce some tangible results, that they must provide some hope for a better future, if democratic government is to endure.

THE U.S. RESPONSE HAS BEEN AMBIGUOUS

On the question of Latin America's economic development the United States has presented an ambiguous picture. Latin Americans understood and welcomed Secretary Marshall's stirring declaration at Harvard University 12 years ago: "Our policy is directed not against any country or doctrine, but against hunger, poverty, desperation, and chaos." Hunger, poverty, desperation, and chaos well described Latin American conditions. And we encouraged the Latin Americans to look almost exclusively to us for assistance.

We then proceeded to provide billions in aid to Europe and Asia. To Latin American pleas for assistance, we replied with advice that they should look to private investments and private enterprise as the principal channel for their funds. In 1956 Senator SMATHERS proposed an amendment to the Mutual Security Act to provide a special fund for loans for Latin America for health, education, and sanitation projects. This proposal met with resistance from the State Department on the grounds that private capital was doing a good enough job. I am happy to say that Congress passed the amendment in spite of State Department resistance.

The frequent reiteration that private capital would meet Latin American requirements insulted and irritated our neighbors. We Americans like our system of free enterprise. It has worked for us, although not in the simon-pure form that some people like to pretend. Latin Americans, on the other hand, have some sour memories of the robber-baron type investments, both domestic and foreign, which we ourselves have long since ceased to tolerate.

In addition to historical differences, the advice ignored the plain fact that private enterprise goes in to make a profit, and will hardly be attracted when the basic sinews of a national economy, such as roads, power, and sanitation facilities are lacking.

Moreover, over-dependence in private investment results in a piecemeal approach to economic development, as private funds haphazardly move into a mine here and a factory there. Latin Americans point out that in their urgent circumstances they cannot wait for the trickle-down theory to maybe work.

THE U.S. CHANGE OF HEART

It took the violent outbursts against Vice President NIXON to make us conscious of the gravity of the Latin-American situation. On March 10 last the Department of State announced a change of heart, as follows:

"Not only must account be taken of the private capital and technical know-how required to create employment for those who today are underemployed or unemployed but also of the need to create new jobs for an even larger number of workers. In addition to the expansion of industry and agriculture which this implies, very large additional amounts of public funds will be required for facilities which only governments can provide; for example, highways, sanitation facilities, hospitals and schools."

The recognition that Latin American growing pains differ from ours, and our consequent abandonment of inflexible doctrinaire principles, should open the way for better inter-American understanding.

Along the new guidelines, positive steps are in progress. The administration has finally announced that it will support an Inter-American Development Bank, something the Latin Americans have been urging for years and we have been resisting for years. We have agreed to consult with the Republics before making decisions which could affect their principal exports. We have indicated a willingness to take a fresh look at efforts to deal with instability and fluctuation in the commodity market. We have lent our support to the idea of regional markets within Latin America.

In short, we have recognized the magnitude of Latin America's problem and have agreed to cooperate with our neighbors in finding solutions.

A NINE-POINT PROGRAM FOR IMPROVING LATIN AMERICAN RELATIONS

Latin America, as population zooms, as industrial development spreads, and hope and impatience mingle, is going to be a cauldron of competing political ideologies. We should welcome this development, not fear it.

In no region of the world have we deeper historical traditions to build upon. It was with the Latin American Republics that we first developed the idea of regional cooperation. The bold idea of mutual cooperation to attack disease, illiteracy and poverty was born within the inter-American family. These are the people who wept unashamedly when Franklin Delano Roosevelt died.

Today in Latin America there are many leaders who understand and admire our democratic system and want to develop something comparable in their own countries. I know of an American who, while attending the inauguration last month of the democratically-elected President of Venezuela, was asked on three separate occasions by newly-elected Venezuelan congressmen how they could get hold of a copy of the "Jefferson Manual of Rules for the House of Representatives."

Our traditions of individual freedom and concern for ordinary human beings were once the cornerstone of our successful Latin-American policy. Now, to Latin Americans, these much admired beliefs seem to stop at the border. While we caution our neighbors about Communist activities and Communist infiltration, we appear peculiarly cold toward the Latin-American yearning to achieve genuine civil liberties.

The recent steps taken by the administration to repair our tottering Latin-American policy should be applauded. They are steps in the right direction, but they will not be enough if the escalator of history is going faster in the opposite direction. We must replace our massive indifference to Latin-American aspirations with massive cooperation.

The Latin-American situation cries out for imaginative, long-range planning, rather than the hurried, patch-up measures after an explosion has occurred.

A coordinated program on the order of the Marshall plan would give the Latin Americans new hope of attaining bread and freedom. The possibilities of such an effort should be explored carefully, not primarily as an anti-Communist strategem, but because it is good for Latin America and for the United States. We should not be ashamed of our humanitarian tradition. Nor should we be embarrassed if humanitarian and security objectives sometimes coincide in our national policy.

In conclusion, I should like to propose an eight-point program for improving United States-Latin American relations. I believe this program is realistic and workable and in harmony with the best interests of our country and of our 20 sister Republics.

First. The United States should increase the volume of its economic aid in support of Latin-American efforts to develop diversified and viable economies so they will not be dependent, as they now are, on a few commodities. Requests for loans from the Development Loan Fund and the Export-Import Bank should be dealt with expeditiously and sympathetically. We should cooperate fully with the new Inter-American Development

Institution. The proposed corps of technical experts within the Institute could help the smaller, inexperienced countries draw up coordinated development plans.

Second. The United States should accelerate and strengthen its program of technical assistance in agriculture, health, education, vocational training, and public administration. The time has come to recapture the original fervor of President Truman's "bold new program" which was widely hailed in Latin America when it was first announced a decade ago.

Third. The United States should support vigorously the current moves within Latin America to establish regional markets. The elimination of inter-American trade barriers would broaden markets for Latin-American products and make low-cost manufacturing feasible, both indispensable prerequisites to diversification and economic growth.

Fourth. The United States should review its trade and tariff policies as they affect imports from Latin America. It is self-defeating for us to provide economic assistance with one hand and take it away with the other by shortsighted trade restrictions. If policies designed to strengthen our trade with Latin America cause hardship to any domestic industry, the Government has a responsibility to aid those so affected. (I recently cosponsored an amendment in the Senate to the Area Redevelopment Act (S. 722) to make such aid possible, but unfortunately it did not pass the committee stage.)

Fifth. The United States should give wholehearted support to the health programs under the direction of the Pan American Sanitary Organization. Widespread disease which stalks Latin America is a tremendous economic drain as well as a human tragedy. Investment in health is perhaps the cheapest, most effective investment we can make in the future of the Western Hemisphere.

Sixth. The United States should develop a bold and imaginative program of student and cultural exchange.

We need to reexamine our methods of screening Latin American scholarship recipients. Too frequently the test has been the freiendliness of the recipient toward the United States. Young Latin Americans of so-called leftist tendencies have been excluded, when they are often the very ones who would benefit most from the program.

Seventh. The United States press, radio, and TV networks should be encouraged to give wider and better balanced news coverage of Latin American affairs. This, of course, is something our Government can do little about. But it is essential that the American people have a continuous report and interpretation of Latin American developments if they are to understand the magnitude of the problems in that region and what we are being asked to support. When news of revolutions and executions dominate our newspapers, it is hard for the American taxpayer to form an understanding of the underlying realities in the 20 American Republics, and of our interest in them.

Eighth. The United States should thoroughly reappraise its military assistance program in Latin America. What we have given one nation for hemispheric defense has often provoked demands by another for an equal amount of aid. Great care should be taken not to encourage this type of arms race, which Latin American governments can ill-afford. We should give greater attention to the coordination of military policy and strategy in the hemisphere. This might well result in a decrease in the requirements of national military establishments.

Further, our military assistance to certain dictatorial governments has raised the question of whose freedom those governments are defending. The use by Batista of U.S. supplied armaments against his own people, contrary to stipulations of our defense treaty, has greatly damaged U.S. prestige throughout Latin America. It makes little sense to speak of hemisphere defense while arming a tyrant who uses weapons to intimidate his own people.

Ninth. The United States should lend its support to the idea of regional arms control. Last year Costa Rica submitted such a plan to the Organization of American States and received nominal support from the U.S. delegation. Our Government should now press for the consideration of the Costa Rican plan or some similar project, at the eleventh Inter-American Conference to be held at Quito next year.

The quality of our overall policy toward Latin America will be determined not only by what we do, but by how we do it.

Unless we pursue our policies with a genuine interest in the welfare of our fellow human beings, they will do little to heal our wounded inter-American relations. The steps already taken by the Department of State, many of them complete reversals of former policy, will avail us little if they are done reluctantly and only under Latin American pressure.

We must, if we are to recapture the warm bonds of friendship which characterized the best days of the good neighbor policy, breathe into inter-American cooperation that intangible spirit which then characterized our relations—a deep-rooted conviction that the Western Hemisphere can, indeed it must, be a New World where freedom and opportunity flourish.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959—AMENDMENTS

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. On Monday last, just before the adjournment of the Senate, the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare was authorized to report the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959. I should like to inquire if the bill has been reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been reported.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Has it been made the unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not as yet.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I had hoped that it had been made the unfinished business.

In anticipation of its being made the unfinished business, I send to the desk 69 amendments to Senate bill 1555, and ask that they be printed and lie on the table. I inform my colleagues that there will be more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received, printed, and will lie on the table.

RENTAL OF COTTON ACREAGE ALLOTMENTS

Mr. JORDAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business, House bill 3293, be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 104, Senate bill 1455.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, will my colleague tell me the nature of the proposed legislation?

Mr. JORDAN. It is a bill to authorize the rental of cotton acreage allotments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 1455) to authorize the rental of cotton acreage allotments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I shall not object, but I shall vote against the measure. I should like to have a discussion of it, and I desire that there be a quorum call before the debate begins.

Mr. JORDAN. There will be a quorum call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JORDAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JORDAN. Mr. President, S. 1455 authorizes 1-year leases of upland cotton acreage allotments from farms having allotments of 10 acres or less to other farms in the same county if the combined allotments will not exceed 50 acres. In doing so it will accomplish the following purposes:

First. It will enable small farmers who have participated in the acreage reserve and cannot get back into cotton production immediately to obtain some return from their cotton allotments.

Second. It will provide lessees with allotments of such a size as will enable them to obtain needed credit and machinery and operate efficiently.

Third. It will permit counties to retain the cotton production necessary to their economies.

Fourth. It will alleviate the inefficiencies resulting from the present regulations under which many farmers plant small rented cotton acreages on a number of scattered farms.

The bill provides that increases resulting from the election of choice (b) under section 102 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 would be disregarded in applying the provisions of the bill, and the election of choice (a) or choice (b) by the operator of the farm on which the leased allotment is used would be applicable to the rented allotment. This would prevent the confusion which might arise if both choice (a) and choice (b) cotton were grown on the same farm.

The acreage history would be credited to the farm from which the allotment was rented just as though it had been planted on that farm.

Allotments rented under the bill would be adjusted to compensate for differences in normal yield between the farms involved.

The farm from which an allotment is leased would be required to reduce its acreage of crops requiring annual tillage by an acreage equal to the allotment transferred. This provision would be enforced by civil penalty equal to 150 percent of the rental for the allotment.

The bill would be applicable to the 1959, 1960, and 1961 crops.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. JORDAN. I yield.

Mr. STENNIS. As I understand, the Senator from North Carolina is the author of the bill. Do I correctly understand, further, that the bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

Mr. JORDAN. The Senator is correct. The bill was reported unanimously by the committee.

Mr. STENNIS. The bill, in effect, is a committee bill, which includes major committee amendments.

Mr. JORDAN. That is correct.

Mr. STENNIS. The amendments restrict the bill, so that the only farmers who can sell, under the provisions of the bill, are those who have small allotments of 10 acres or less.

Mr. JORDAN. That is correct.

Mr. STENNIS. That within itself restricts the bill to a relatively small amount of acreage, considering the total amount of acreage in the entire cotton belt.

Mr. JORDAN. That is correct.

Mr. STENNIS. A further restriction is that the farmer must be an operator on a small scale, so that the acreage which he produces plus what he may buy from anyone else will not total more than 50 acres.

Mr. JORDAN. That is correct.

Mr. STENNIS. The effect of the bill as a whole, comprising all the amendments which were submitted in the committee, affords a limited field of operation. Even though the bill will mean something to the individual farmer, the overall effect is that the total acreage which might be sold under the bill would be relatively small. Is that not correct?

Mr. JORDAN. That is correct. Furthermore, the provisions of the bill make it applicable only 1 year at a time. A farmer cannot lease his land for more than 1 year at a time, and the bill is applicable for not more than 3 years.

Mr. STENNIS. I commend the Senator from North Carolina for the work he has done on the bill. Its application will, I think, help some individual farmers. I do not see how it could hurt anyone or hurt the cotton program.

Mr. JORDAN. I thank the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JORDAN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Arizona and the Senator from California. The committee received a report from the administration on the Senate bill 545. Senators who are members of the subcommittee will bear out my statement that after that time the committee reduced considerably the amount provided in the bill. The administration contended that the bill would put the land in the hands of the big farmers. The committee remedied that situation so as to provide that land in excess of 50 acres cannot be transferred to anyone. Any cotton farmer knows that 50 acres is not a big farm. So we have tried to reduce the amount of acreage to the point where only the small farmer will be helped and the bill will not permit the land to get into the hands of big farmers, as the Department of Agriculture contended might happen.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. JORDAN. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I believe I understand what the Senators from the South are trying to do, but I am disturbed by the thought that the bill may not do precisely what they feel it will do. The report states:

> This bill authorizes 1-year leases of upland cotton acreage allotments from farms having allotments of 10 acres or less to other farms in the same county, if the combined allotments will not exceed 50 acres.

Does that mean 50 acres in the county or 50 acres to another farmer? In other words, could one farmer buy up ten 5-acre tracts and thus have 50 acres?

Mr. JORDAN. It means that the allotment to a farmer would always have to remain to the farmer. He could not sell it. He could lease it only 1 year at a time.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I appreciate that fact.

Mr. JORDAN. The upland counties of North Carolina, Georgia, South Carolina, and Mississippi have a large number of small farmers who have only 1, 2, 3, or 4 acres, which is not large enough for a farmer to operate economically. He can now lease the land under the law, but he has to operate on the farm where he is located. The bill would allow him to group the farms together in one place, not to exceed 50 acres, including the land he already owns.

Mr. GOLDWATER. In the same county?

Mr. JORDAN. In the same county.

Mr. GOLDWATER. But would it prevent a farmer having 50 acres in two contiguous counties from creating a farm of 100 acres out of excess or unused allotments?

Mr. JORDAN. I do not think it would prevent him from doing that. If he owned a farm in another county—which might be the case—I do not know of anything which would prevent him from doing the same thing in that county.

The fear of the Department of Agriculture has been that by so doing, many cotton barons might be created. A cotton baron cannot be made with 50 acres.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I agree with that statement. That is the point I was concerned about. The Senators who have made this proposal are trying to remedy the plight of the small cotton farmer, who is having a hard time in getting along, by allowing him to lease his unused allotments to a farmer who is in a position to or can afford to farm those allotments. I was concerned that instead of helping the small farmer we might, under the bill, actually be pushing him out of business.

Mr. JORDAN. No, because the allotment would have to stay with the farmer. He could not sell it. He must stay with the farm. I think the bill would be a help to the small farmer.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JORDAN. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. I wish to make it plain to the Senator from Arizona that the committee considered four bills which pertained to the same subject, some of which might have done harm by enabling farms to obtain more cotton acreage through leasing than might be desirable. The committee bill, however, limits the size to which an allotment may be increased through leasing to 50 acres.

A factor considered by the committee was that the condition making the enactment of this legislation necessary was brought about because of the acreage reserve program. Many small farmers who placed their cotton acreage in the acreage reserve program expecting the program to continue through 1959 are not now in a position to return to cotton. They need a little more time to plan and make adjustments. That was one reason why the bill was limited to production year by year, not to exceed 3 years. It will give farmers in that category a chance to make such arrangements as they see fit.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JORDAN. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I ask the attention of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] and the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL]. There are two items which, it seems to me, make the bill peculiarly equitable. The first has already been mentioned by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the chairman of the committee. Under the acreage reserve program of the land bank, a great many small farmers were eking out only the scantiest possible existence. They could not live on the few acres put in the soil bank. Their acreage has been out of cultivation, in some instances, for 2 years or more. They may be working in a nearby town, so it would be very uneconomical, difficult, and expensive for them to return to the farm and take advantage of their allotment by planting a little cotton farm again.

The bill will allow them to get a little value for their acreage by enabling them to lease the allotments which still belong to them.

Second, there can be no sound objection to the bill, based upon the standpoint of their building up huge acreage, not only for the reason that it cannot be built up into farms which will exceed 50 acres, including what the lessee had himself, and also that leased from his neighbors, but, also, it will not serve to build up additional production; because under present law if these small farmers could not plant, they would simply have to turn in their allotments to the county committees, which could reissue the allotments to others, and would do so. The only difference in production would be that the small farmers, whom we have been trying to protect by means of various laws, would lose any equity at all in the matter.

So it seemed to the committee, on which I served, that the real ends of equity were served by both the provisions I have mentioned and by others in the bill, without working any hardship on any cotton producer in either the traditional cotton-producing areas of the South or the cotton-producing areas of the West. I believe the committee, in reporting the bill, believed it had eliminated all provisions which could have done harm to the cotton industry, and had included all the provisions which would be helpful to the small cotton farmers.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me?

Mr. JORDAN. I yield.

Mr. TALMADGE. First of all, I desire to compliment the distinguished junior Senator from North Carolina for his efforts and endeavors to aid these producers, who need help more than any other group I know of in the Nation.

In many parts of the traditional cotton-producing area of the South, the average cotton allotment is 5 acres or less. For instance, in Georgia, 40-odd percent of the cotton allottments are of 5 acres or less. I believe the same statement applies to North Carolina, South Carolina, Alabama, Florida, and Tennessee. The Mississippi allotments are exceedingly small.

Under the present law, such farmers may already lease their cotton allotments. But under the present law, they have to transport their machinery, their equipment, and their labor, sometimes several miles, in order to cultivate 1, 2, or sometimes 4 acres of cotton. Certainly it is uneconomical for them to cultivate such small acreage on farms which are 2, 3, or 4 miles away.

This measure will entitle them to lease those allotments to grow cotton on their own farms, provided the total acreage is not more than 50.

Then, if there is a difference in the fertility of the soil, with the result that a greater amount of cotton is produced on the farms for which the allotments are leased, there is a factor which will reduce the cotton acreage by that ratio, in order that the total production of cotton may not be greater than it is under the present law.

This proposed legislation would enable many thousands of farmers in many of the States of the Southeast, who are eking out a meager, and sometimes a marginal existence, to secure additional allotments from their neighbors, many of whom have gone to work in industries, or have begun to operate stores, or are engaged in other ways; and thus this measure will enable those farmers to have an economic unit which they can cultivate adequately, and from which they can make a living for their families.

I would say that in many instances this measure will represent the difference between the necessity for such farmers to abandon their farms and move to town, there to compete with an already overabundant supply of labor for jobs, and the possibility for those farmers to continue on their own humble, little farms to make a living, by the sweat of their own labor, for themselves and their families.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me?

Mr. JORDAN. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I have no objection to the bill, as it has been explained; and I shall not vote against it.

However, I wish to take advantage of this opportunity—because I do not recall seeing present in the Chamber at any previous time so many distinguished Senators from the southern cotton-producing States—to propose a philosophical question, or perhaps an economic question. To me, this bill, and even the necessity to introduce it, indicates one of the weaknesses in the present agricultural program.

First, we had the soil bank; and the farmers participated in the soil bank. But the soil bank did not work; and then the farmers left it.

Now the farmers want to lease their allotments.

I am in perfect harmony with the intent of the proposed legislation. However, as I stand here, I wonder, as I have often wondered heretofore, whether it is right for us to have on the statute books legislation which will forever keep the cotton farmer tied to the 2-acre, 3-acre, 4-acre, or 5-acre farm? Are we making a mistake by more or less "hedging him in" as a farmer?

To think out loud for a moment—and I am asking this question of my southern friends: Would it not be better to have less restrictive legislation, so as to allow such farmers not only to sell their farms, if they wish to, but also to dispose of their allotments, and to allow large-scale cotton farming to develop in the areas of the South which my colleagues represent, as we have allowed large-scale cotton farming to develop in the West?

There may be geographical reasons why that could not be done in the South. But I recall the burley tobacco situation. When we began to deal with it, the average burley tobacco farm comprised 10 acres, which, I understand, was then considered a large burley tobacco farm. But now—because of the necessity of protecting the small farmers—we have achieved an average burley tobacco farm of less than 3 acres.

Are we really helping such farmers in the South, by year after year enacting legislation to take care of a situation which I doubt can ever be improved?

I shall welcome an answer from any of my colleagues from the South.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, if my colleague will yield to me, I believe I can state an answer.

Mr. JORDAN. I yield.

Mr. ERVIN. The chief problem in this field is fundamentally a human one rather than an economic one, although the two are intertwined. It is illustrated by the situation in my State. In North Carolina, approximately 48,000 cotton farmers have cotton acreages in the neighborhood of 4 acres or less. Many of them are Negroes who are advanced in years. Many of them are white persons who are advanced in years. Farming is the only thing they know how to do. They do not have enough capital to be able to farm on a large scale, and in many cases they have reached such an age that it is not possible for them to be reeducated for some other type of employment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, at this point will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The point my colleague has made fairly well reaches the meat of the matter. I understand that aspect of the situation, having spent part of my life in the South. But today can a farmer in the South really make it on a 2-acre or 3-acre or 4-acre cotton farm? Is such a farmer merely existing, at best; or is he able to make a living? For instance, is he able to send his children to school; is he able to purchase an automobile; is he able to have some of the better things of life?

Mr. ERVIN. His children are able to attend school, because in North Carolina the State supplies the textbooks for all schoolchildren. Furthermore, in most instances the school-lunch program, which is financed in part by the Federal Government, and other programs, furnish aid to his schoolchildren.

But I would say that the pending measure provides a practical way to aid small cottongrowers under present circumstances. My State is attempting to handle this situation by teaching farmers in this category to engage as much as possible in a form of agriculture whereby they will raise food crops. We have a very fine program under our State department of agriculture, whose farm demonstration agents are trying to teach these farmers ways to improve their status by raising food crops, poultry, and the like.

Most of them live in areas which are fundamentally agricultural, and there are no industries to take care of them, even if they were young enough to be educated to do industrial work. So it is a most serious problem, with which North Carolina is trying to deal, insofar as possible, by advocating, as proposed by Gov. Max Gardner, a live-at-home program, under which they would, insofar as possible, raise chickens, engage in truck gardening, and participate primarily in activities enabling them to secure food sufficient for their families on the farms.

As is true of growers of burley tobacco in some of our mountainous sections, cotton acreage allotments provide the only means by which farmers may receive a small amount of cash in order to buy coffee, sugar, and other commodities they cannot produce on the farm.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not want to prolong this discussion, because I realize it is one which could be debated day and night. In my own State of Arizona, in 1950 about 113,000 people were dependent upon agriculture. The latest estimate is that in 1958 about 86,000 to 87,000 people were dependent upon agriculture. Even with that rather sizable decrease in the number of people engaged in farming, income from farming has tripled. Without knowing much, as I have said, about the farming situation in the South, my thought was that if we allowed a continuation of the normal tendency which has existed in this country since its founding, that is, the drifting away from the small farm and the tendency to bigger farms, those affected might become more gainfully employed by working for the larger farmers, or by working as mechanics, for example.

Mr. ERVIN. I think the solution must be a long-range one. The problem is finding its solution, to a large extent, in the children of these farmers being educated and moving elsewhere, to the cities and towns where there is industrial employment. But the farmers who make the problem most acute are those who have reached a point in age where they are not really capable of learning a new vocation.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JORDAN. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. I desire to add one point to the question raised by the Senator from Arizona. This issue involves not only the man who is on the land today and who, it may be will have passed away by next year, but it involves the land itself and its future. Under the present law, if acreage is lost, it is lost forever. The issue involves the economy of a community and whether it can continue to exist.

Furthermore, I do not think there has been any determination made that we have any right, from a constitutional standpoint, to legislate this acreage out of existence as to an individual or as to future generations. Those questions are involved in this very minor bill, and they should be added to what the Senator has stated.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I agree with the Senator completely, but is that not in fact what we are doing when we try to say to a farmer—I care not whether he lives in Mississippi, Arizona, or California—"You can plant only X number of acres to cotton"? I have never felt that was in consonance with our concepts of freedom under the Constitution. Without knowing a great deal about the subject, I can say only that the southern cotton farmer has been hurt by cotton acreage allotments, just as the western farmer has been. Fortunately, in the West we are not limited to 2 or 3 or 4 acres. Our last allotment was 360,743.

A most important point has been made by the Senator from Mississippi. I doubt the constitutionality of Congress telling any man in this country what he can or cannot plant.

Mr. STENNIS. That is correct; but the lower the acreage allotment, the more the farmer is hurt.

Mr. GOLDWATER. It is pretty low now.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JORDAN. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I should like to ask the Senator some questions. First of all, with respect to the restriction of 50 acres, as I understand the provision, no transfer could be made to anyone whose total planting would be more than 50 acres. Is that correct?

Mr. JORDAN. That is correct. The total acreage, including his own planting and what he has leased, cannot exceed 50 acres.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I understand the purpose for which the provision was made—at least, I believe I do. In other words, it is to hold down additional acreage in order to prevent overproduction as much as possible, while, at the same time, giving some relief to the small farmer. I wonder if the weight of the argument is not, on the other side, that it is primarily farmers with larger acreages who are going to be interested in buying these leases, and if the small farmer would not be better served without the amendment, rather than with the amendment. I just wonder what the reasoning of the committee was.

Mr. JORDAN. I am glad the Senator has raised that question. The committee started out with a proposal of a much higher acreage. It seemed to be the consensus that what was decided on was as high an acreage as we could get the Department of Agriculture to accept. I may ask the chairman of the full committee if that is a correct statement.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. This proposal is made, then, in view of the opposition that has been shown by the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. JORDAN. We do not think the Department will oppose this bill as such.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It was the consensus of the committee that by proposing the acreage mentioned it was perhaps picking the only way which would furnish any hope of getting the legislation enacted.

Mr. JORDAN. I think that is correct.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Let me ask the distinguished Senator from North Carolina another question. The bill as it comes before the Senate covers 3 years, namely, 1959, 1960, and 1961. Of course, early in the year many of us proposed legislation in an effort to make the law effective for 1959. The Senator has no idea when the House will act on this measure, I presume.

Mr. JORDAN. No; I have not.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Is it likely that the bill could become law, let us say, earlier than May 1?

Mr. JORDAN. We will try our best.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The point I am trying to get at is this: Under the law as it stands—I do not know whether my statement applies to other commodities, but it applies to cotton—cotton farmers may release to their county committees for reallotment acreage they are not going to plant. The time limit for doing that in northern Alabama was April 1. For southern Alabama it was about March 20. I believe those are the correct dates. I presume that it is late all over the cotton area, not only from the standpoint of the time limitation in the bill, but from the time limitation imposed by the planting of the crop itself in the section of the State where I live. I presume cotton farmers in southern Alabama are already planting, and perhaps they are through planting. Within a week or 10 days, cotton farmers will be planting in the extreme northern area of Alabama.

The question I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from North Carolina is this: Does the Senator believe that any practical benefit can be derived by making the bill applicable to this year? Benefit could have been derived earlier in the year, but are we not past that time?

Mr. JORDAN. I believe the Senator is correct as to his State of Alabama, and as to Texas and Mississippi, where cotton has already been planted. I do not think it could possibly affect this year's planting.

Mr. SPARKMAN. There is not a great deal of cotton planted where I live, so I was gaging the whole area by the time limit. I am seeking advice on this matter. I wonder if it would not be better to change the dates, and to make the bill provide for 1960, 1961, and 1962.

Mr. JORDAN. I would have no objection to that.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, as chairman of the subcommittee let me say that this bill might help some people this year. If we want to provide another year, we have 2 more years in the future to consider that matter. The bill was reported with the years stated.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. The bill was reported March 18.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. March 18.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is nearly a month ago.

I would have agreed with the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee at that time. The question I am asking now is, will passage of the bill have any practical value at this time? Even though the provisions might be applicable to a few farmers, what will happen with regard to all the others?

For instance, in my State there has been a rather encouraging action on the part of the farmers who are not going to plant their acreage by their releasing acreage to the county committees. When the farmers release the acreage to the county committees they get nothing.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. SPARKMAN. May I complete this statement, please? The farmers get nothing for that. It seems to me if we keep "1959" in the bill there should be something to provide for going back and picking up those farmers who have released their acreage. Otherwise, we will have discrimination as among the planters, with respect to those to whom allotments have been given in one area as against another.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Alabama has raised a good question, and we should consider it well. At the same time, we are trying to protect the cotton acreage of the small farmer and trying to keep him from losing the historical record of his acreage. If some provision were incorporated in the bill to carry forward his history on the acreage, I think it would be all right. We should not let the farmer lose the history on his acreage for this 1 year.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I should like to ask the chairman a question on that very point.

I make the suggestion that under the law of today the acreage is protected through this year.

Mr. JORDAN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The only benefit which could possibly accrue to the farmer this year would be the privilege of leasing his property. The acreage is already protected, but the law expires this year.

Mr. JORDAN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If we should change the dates to 1960, 1961, and 1962 we would not only continue the protection against the loss of acreage but also would make it possible for the farmer to lease the unused acreage during those 3 years.

Mr. JORDAN. I have no objection to that procedure.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, if that sounds reasonable to the members of the committee I should like, at the proper time, to offer an amendment to make that change.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I hope the distinguished Senator will not offer such an amendment. My reason for making the statement is that we had a very long and involved discussion of this whole subject matter in the committee. We encountered opposition from members of the committee who come from the wheat-producing areas, from the corn-producing areas, and from other areas, with respect to this proposed legislation. The Department had turned down the proposal categorically in its original form. We endeavored to report the bill in some form on which we could get general agreement. We spent a long time on the matter.

I would be reluctant to have the bill changed, particularly in view of the fact that for the additional year of 1962 there is plenty of time for us to legislate, and in further view of the fact that we are trying an experiment to see how the proposed program will work and to see if we can help some of the very small farmers who need help.

I say to the Senator from Alabama, this is not the first time we have passed legislation after planting time. I remember one year when all of the Florida acreage—it is not a heavy acreage, only some 37,000 acres—had been planted before the legislation was passed. I think in that year an amendment was offered by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] to protect the small acreages. I do not remember the exact provision, but a provision was adopted too late to be of help to my State.

I think we will encounter a similar situation almost any year. I think the provisions apply to a sufficient acreage in the Carolinas, Tennessee, Virginia, north Alabama, the hill section of Mississippi, Arkansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, and Texas so that passage of the bill would be very helpful. I would dislike to see written into the bill a provision which would be regarded as a change in the coverage of the bill.

The members of the committee will recall that representatives of the Department of Agriculture were present when this matter was considered and we frequently asked for their opinions as to what they could recommend. We finally got those representatives to recommend what was worked out.

I am not going to oppose the amendment if the distinguished Senator offers it, because I well recognize his good objective, but I think he would be injecting a troublesome factor.

In view of the fact that there is so much time available to accomplish the inclusion of the additional year, if we find the program works out well, I hope the Senator will not offer the amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me for 1 minute?

Mr. JORDAN. I yield to my distinguished colleague from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I certainly do not propose to offer an amendment which is not generally acceptable to the committee, because I realize the committee members worked hard on the bill. Furthermore, I know that when the House considers the bill there will be an opportunity to make such a change if it seems necessary or helpful.

In answer to the point raised by the Senator from Florida, let us consider the cotton planters in my immediate area of Alabama. The farmers in my home county, in the southern part of the county, will start planting within the next 10 days. The cotton planting will continue pretty well through the middle of May.

Let us suppose this proposed legislation becomes law by the first of May. That would mean, I presume, those farmers who had not planted at that time could lease their land and be paid for it, whereas the farmers who prior to that time had released their land to the county committee would get nothing.

I should dislike very much to see something done which would create friction among the farmers themselves, and I certainly have no wish to project any amendment which might cause dissension in the committee. I know the committee has considered this matter carefully, and I realize that the House committee has time to consider a change if it should appear to them a change should be made. Therefore, I shall not propose the amendment.

Mr. JORDAN. I thank the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JORDAN. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, it is true that most of the cotton will be planted by the first of May, but I think every Senator who has lived on a farm knows that very often something happens to the cotton which has been planted and it does not come up properly, which makes necessary a replanting. Sometimes cotton has to be planted as late as June 1.

Therefore, under these circumstances I think there might be a great many cotton farmers who could dispose of some of the acreage, even if the bill should not be passed until late in May. I thought I would invite attention to that.

The bill will not affect too many farmers. A great many farmers have already planted and have already made preparations, but there are a few farmers who have not considered it economical to plant the 2 or 3 or 4 acres they have. Most of the farmers who will make use of the legislation have under 5 acres. Those who have 6 or 8 or 10 acres probably thought it economical to proceed to plant, and probably have already planted and are taking care of the acreage themselves. It is mostly the very small farmer who has 3 or 4 or 5 acres who needs this relief at the present time. It does not mean very much. The small farmer will probably lease 3 or 4 acres for approximately $10 an acre, and that is about all he can get out of it, to tide him over. Senators can see why he went into the soil bank when he was getting approximately one-third of a bale to the acre, which would mean $50, as contrasted with the $10 which they are getting at the present time. That is about what the ratio would be.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JORDAN. I yield.

Mr. ERVIN. I commend my able colleague the junior Senator from North Carolina on the fine work he has done in connection with this problem, and I assure him that in my judgment he has rendered a very substantial service to agriculture, not only in North Carolina, but in all other States having the same problem. I commend him for his very fine work.

Mr. JORDAN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JORDAN. I yield.

Mr. THURMOND. I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate and commend the distinguished and able junior Senator from North Carolina for introducing this bill. Several years ago I had the pleasure of joining the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] in supporting a similar bill, and I was pleased to join the distinguished Senator from North Carolina in cosponsoring this measure.

By introducing this bill, the able Senator from North Carolina has shown his deep interest in the small farmers of the Nation. He has manifested a commendable desire to help the class of people who are receiving the smallest income of any segment of our population.

We are all aware that farm productivity has increased materially in recent years as a result of the application of new and improved farm methods and machinery. The application of these new methods and machinery make it economically impractical and inefficient to operate a farm below a minimum acreage, the exact size of the minimum acreage being dependent on the crop and the soil fertility. Yet many of our small cotton farmers are now being allotted less than 10 acres, and in some cases, 2, 3, or even 1 acre. Such a program is responsible for the creation of what some mistakenly refer to as the marginal farmer. In reality, they are referring to the farmer who is forced to undertake an economically infeasible farming operation, and to depend on Government subsidy to remedy his assured loss. He has no choice. He is trained and experienced as a farmer, and his worldly goods are invested in a farm. On his training, experience, and investment depend his and his family's livelihood, be it ever so meager.

S. 1455 would allow a farmer with less than a 10-acre allotment to rent his acreage allotment to a neighbor. This is certainly a step in the direction of remedying this tragic situation. Under the provisions of this bill, a farmer with a small allotment could realize some income from the rental of his allotment, and at the same time, he could have his time free to supplement his rental income. His neighbor, now in the same tragic circumstances, could, under the terms of the bill, by renting other allotments, obtain sufficient acreage on which to conduct an efficient and profitable farming operation.

Since rentals are restricted by the bill to county units, in any one of which soil productivity is relatively equivalent, there will be little, if any, addition to the surplus of the crop. At the same time, this bill marks a slackening of pace in forcing inefficiency and ultimate extinction on the small farmer, while increasing his chances for averting abject poverty. Although the bill will certainly not solve all of his problems, it will be of immeasurable benefit to small cotton farmers. As one of the original cosponsors, I am proud of the opportunity to support this legislation.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I support the bill which the Agriculture and Forestry Committee has reported, authorizing the lease of cotton acreage for the years 1959, 1960, and 1961 on a year to year basis. I regret that limitations have been placed on the size of farms eligible for leasing allotments as this sharply narrows the objectives of this bill. However, even with these limitations, it would be of assistance to a great many small farmers.

Under present law, cotton allotments can in effect be leased to other farms. It is my understanding that this is being done in many areas and especially by farmers who critically need additional acreage to better use their land, labor, and machinery. It is my understanding that when farms are close together and the same labor and equipment can be used on both farms, the county committee has authority to even transfer the cotton allotment to another farm after the first year of a 3-year contract. All we are, in effect, asking for in this bill is to simplify the procedure whereby the small farmers can participate easier in leasing their allotments.

There are other ways which allotments can be transferred under present law from one farm to another under certain circumstances. For example, a cotton farmer who needs additional acreage can buy a farm with a cotton allotment, and with permission of the county committee can have the two farms combined. Under this arrangement the cotton allotment can be planted at any location on either farm.

Mr. President, cotton allotments released to the county committe can also be transferrd to other farms, but there is some hesitation on the part of farmers to release cotton allotments for reapportionment to other farms. Present law protects acreage history credits for 1957, 1958, and 1959 even though it is not planted. However, farmers would lose their history under other provisions of the law if they released their acreage to the county committee for 3 consecutive years.

S. 1455 would enable the very small farmer to accomplish the transfer of acreage to another farm with less red tape and confusion. It could be done on a much more efficient basis and would give these very small farmers an equal chance to participate. This bill would simply permit the owner of a farm having an allotment of 10 acres or less to lease his allotment to a neighbor or any other farmer in the county, provided the combined allotment would not exceed 50 acres. This would assist in returning some of our idle acres to production.

It is unlikely that this bill would pass in time to give any real benefits for the 1959 crop year. Therefore, I am hopeful that this bill will be amended to include the 3-year period of 1960, 1961, and 1962.

There is great concern in many areas of the Cotton Belt that cotton acreage that was placed in the soil bank will be left idle in future years. If this situation should come about, the unplanted acreage would materially reduce income in the county. S. 1455 would assist in getting much of this acreage planted and thereby make a greater contribution to the farmers involved as well as to the local economy.

The operation of the present law has reduced acreage allotments to such an extent that cotton farming in many cases is carried on on an inefficient basis. This bill, while not going as far as my original bill (S. 569) authorizing the leasing of acreage to all farmers within county lines for a period up to 5 years, it would assist the small farmer and it would assist in getting the maximum acreage of cotton to be planted within a county. Farmers who need more acreage for better utilization of their land, labor, equipment, and other resources could get additional acreage and thereby operate a more efficient and more economical unit. The owner would benefit by rentals, and leasing of allotted acreage would not add to the cost of the present program.

Mr. President, I hope that the Senate will give full approval to this bill. I congratulate the distinguished Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I am bound to observe that the Department of Agriculture has interposed objections to the bill, citizens of California oppose it and in voicing objection to it, let the record show I speak for my colleague [Mr. ENGLE] and myself.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I think the distinguished Senator is mistaken, because the objections which were originally made were to the first wording of the bill. The experts of the Department who sat with us stated to us that in the redrafted form they saw no objection to it.

Mr. KUCHEL. I have a few questions which I should like to ask my able colleague [Mr. JORDAN] the author of the bill. While I am doing so, I ask my friend from Florida to peruse the letter which I have received from the Department of Agriculture on this subject.

Is it the intention of the bill to permit a person who owns not more than 10 acres of land upon which there is a cotton allotment to lease the allotment to another cotton farmer who, when he leases the acreage, will still have a cotton allotment of not more than 50 acres?

Mr. JORDAN. Yes. That is what the bill provides. Including his own acreage, he can lease only enough acreage to make a total of 50 acres.

Mr. KUCHEL. I am interested in the citizen of the Senator's State who has 10 acres, and who has a cotton acreage allotment on those 10 acres. Am I to understand that he would have the right to plant his own acreage?

Mr. JORDAN. Yes; he would have the right to plant on his own land, but he would have to lease someone else's land if he were to plant more than 10 acres.

Mr. KUCHEL. On page 2 of the report of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I find the following language:

> Arguments advanced in support of the bills were as follows:
> 1. Small cotton farmers participated in great numbers in the acreage reserve program and substantially retired from cotton production. They are now not in a position to plant and will receive little or no benefit from their allotments unless this legislation is passed. Passage of this legislation would permit them an adjustment period until they could get back into cotton production.

I ask my friend, Does not that indicate that the farmer who could benefit by leasing his acreage allotment up to 10 acres does not now have the legal right to plant on his own land?

Mr. JORDAN. Yes——

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. The wording does not so indicate. It merely indicates that the man who has had his land fallow for 2 years, and has moved off the land to work in a cotton factory, a cotton mill, a store, or somewhere else, is not practically in a position this year to begin cultivating that little acreage of 10 acres or less. Practically, he cannot do it; but he does have the right to plant it. Otherwise, there would be nothing to lease.

Mr. KUCHEL. Let me ask the able Senator from Florida this question: Why can he not plant now, and receive a benefit from his allotment?

Mr. HOLLAND. Because he is working for someone in a job which he does not wish to give up. He is eking out a bare existence. Perhaps he has moved his wife to the little town nearby, and is working there as a wage earner. A great many of these people are people of most modest attainments. They work for wages. Many of them are colored people. They are not in a position to tear up their roots and go back and replant their land, consisting of 6, 8, or, at the most, 10 acres. It is not a practical thing for them to do.

Mr. KUCHEL. What was the incentive for that individual to get out of cotton farming?

Mr. HOLLAND. The land bank. The acreage reserve program of the land bank offered him the right to put his entire acreage, consisting of a small tract, into the acreage reserve program, and to receive what the Government estimated he could have made out of it if he had not done so.

The objective was, first, to diminish the total amount of production; and second, to take care of people in that unenviable position until they could get back on their feet.

As I see it, in many cases this is nothing more than an offer to help a little further in the readjustment which is under way.

In my own State much of the acreage in the classification we are discussing is being disposed of in one of two ways—first, by purchase by large timber companies who are foresting the land. Of course, no farmer with only a few acres can go into the forestry business.

Second, by purchase for grazing purposes. The same comment applies there. It requires a much larger acreage and a much greater investment of capital to go into that business. These people are being given a little more time to reorganize their lives and get started again.

Mr. KUCHEL. If the intent of the acreage reserve program legislation was to retire acreage from cotton production, is it fair to say that the intent of the proposed legislation is to put it back into production?

Mr. HOLLAND. It is not fair to draw the first premise. The intent was never, through the acreage reserve program, to take acreage out of any program. It was to make the land lie fallow, with the idea of cutting down production for the year involved. As compared with the conservation part of the soil bank, the acreage reserve program was always quite temporary, operating from year to year. A farmer could elect to put his small acreage in the program for the first year. If he did not like it, he could come back and pick up the tattered skeins and go to work again as a farmer. However, he could not extend it beyond the life of the acreage reserve program, which was itself a limited program.

Mr. JORDAN. The pending bill also provides that when a lease is made to another person the land must remain fallow. It is not possible to turn around and plant corn or any other crop which is protected under the farm program. It is not permitted to increase one crop when another is taken out of production. That is a provision in the bill. That is the reason for the penalty of 150 percent.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from North Carolina is correct. One of the objectives of the committee was to prevent the building of a program under which some other group, producing tobacco, corn, vegetables, or some other crop such as small grains, could come in and cultivate that same land.

Mr. KUCHEL. I should like to ask my friend from Florida, for whom I have the highest respect, particularly in this field, whether there will be a surplus of cotton in the United States this year.

Mr. HOLLAND. I have heard it expressed both ways. No one knows, because no one knows what the seasons will be. The chances are that there will be a limited production of cotton. I should like to say to my friend from California that, regardless of what is produced this year or in any year in the future, the purposes of the acreage reserve program, the land bank, were limited as to the years covered. The purposes have been completely fulfilled. They were, in the main, to cut down the production of cotton, which could be put under that part of the Soil Bank for the particular years in which the acreage was placed under the program.

Mr. KUCHEL. Has the Senator from Florida had an opportunity to look at the memorandum which I received from the Department of Agriculture? Is it fair to say, on the basis of the memorandum, which was sent to me with the covering letter of the Department of Agriculture of March 23, that the Department of Agriculture objects to the bill?

Mr. HOLLAND. It is fair to say that the memorandum sent by Mr. McLain points out the only objection which I consider a proper objection to the proposed legislation. The committee knew about it. The objection is that there will be a cutoff place. Of course, if we are to have a program of this kind, limited to helping the few people who are in the weakest position, it is necessary to have a cutoff place.

A farmer who has 12 or 15 acres of land does not need the help as badly as does a farmer who has less than 10 acres. The committee, in the best judgment it could exercise, and with the best motives, picked the 10-acre limitation as the one which should be used. Mr. McLain calls attention to the fact that it is an arbitrary cutoff place, with which I would not contend at all. That is the fact.

Mr. KUCHEL. I thank the Senator from Florida. I ask unanimous consent that the objections to the pending bill, S. 1455, as prepared by the Department of Agriculture, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMENTS ON S. 1455, A BILL TO AUTHORIZE THE RENTAL OF COTTON ACREAGE ALLOTMENTS

1. Cotton is in surplus supply at the present time and it appears that production during the 1959–60 marketing year is quite likely to exceed domestic consumption and exports. The bill would result in a certain portion of the cotton allotment being planted which otherwise would not be planted. To the extent this occurs, the bill would therefore increase our supply of cotton as well as the cost to the Government in carrying out the price support and surplus disposal programs.

2. Farm allotments are established to fix for each eligible farm its share of the national marketing quota. Generally, the size of the farm allotment is in relation to past cotton plantings on the farm. A farm allotment represents a right to plant cotton. The provision of the bill, which limits transfers of allotment from farms having allotments of 10 acres or less seems to imply that all farms in this size range constitute uneconomic cotton-producing units and are therefore entitled to additional preferential treatment over slightly larger cotton allotment farms. This arbitrary breaking point would undoubtedly lead to dissatisfaction among farmers having allotments over 10 acres, particularly in those counties where these farmers have had their allotments reduced sharply in the process of establishing minimum farm allotments for the 10-acre and less allotment farms.

3. The provisions of the bill which are designed to prevent a farmer from transferring his cotton allotment to another farm and then increasing his acreage of annually tilled crops would add a new type of restriction to a program that is already heavily burdened with complex procedures.

4. As pointed out in the report of Subcommittee No. 3 (p. 1 of S. Rept. 115 on S. 1455), present law provides several methods under which cotton allotment may be transferred from one farm to another. These methods appear adequate.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] is very much interested in the pending bill, and has prepared a speech on it for delivery on the floor of the Senate. He is detained in the Committee on Foreign Relations by important business, which is very demanding in its nature, and he has asked that his speech be printed in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that the text of his remarks be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR FULBRIGHT

I am very much in favor of the objectives of the pending bill to authorize rental of cotton acreage allotments. I am a cosponsor of S. 545, which is one of several plans studied by the Committee on Agriculture on this subject before it reported out the pending bill.

Under the present law, farmers are permitted to rent acreage allotments, but they must produce the crop on the farm to which the allotment was assigned. This naturally results in an uneconomic method of production, and there has been much agitation to permit the rented acreage to be grown on the lessor's farm. I have received many letters from Arkansas farmers in support of legislation along these lines. Several county farm bureaus have advised me of their support for this legislation. The Agricultural Council of Arkansas, composed of many cotton producers in the State, has favored this type of legislation.

The bill under consideration today is a modification in several respects of the bill introduced by Senator JORDAN, which I cosponsored. The bill limits the lease authorization to farmers having allotments of less than 10 acres and situations where the lessor's acreage combined with the lessor's own allotment does not exceed 50 acres. The transfer can only be made between farms in the same county.

Another important provision in the bill provides that the transferred allotment will be subject to the choice of the allotment and support plan originally elected by the lessor. In order to prevent a disruption of the historic basis for the allotment program, the bill provides that the rented acreage would still be credited to the farm from which the allotment was rented, as if it had been actually planted.

The rental provisions will be of substantial assistance in enabling cotton to be produced on the most economic farm units. Many small cotton farmers participated in the acreage reserve program and are not now in a position to plant. They will receive little benefit from their allotment unless this legislation is approved. The bill will protect these small farmers by preserving their current acreage history. The legislation will also result in a larger percentage of the total allotment being planted, since many small farmers do not plant their allotment and ultimately the farmer, the county, and the State lose this amount as acreage history.

The cotton planting season is now underway, and I cannot overstress the need for immediate action on this bill. The farmers must know as soon as possible whether they can plant rental acreage on their own farms.

I hope that the Senate will pass this bill today, and that the House will take it up for action at once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be offered, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 344 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection as follows:

"(o) (1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the owner or operator of a farm for which a farm acreage allotment for upland cotton of ten acres or less is established under the provisions of this section may rent, as provided in paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection, such allotment, or any portion thereof, to any other owner or operator of a farm in the same county for use in the same county on a farm for which the acreage allotment for upland cotton does not exceed fifty acres. As used in the foregoing sentence, the term "allotment" includes the allotment for the farm as increased by allotments rented under this subsection, but does not include any increase resulting from the election of choice (B) under section 102 of the Agricultural Act of 1949. When the operator of any farm on which a rented allotment is to be used has elected choice (A) or choice (B) with respect to any allotment for any year, that choice shall be applicable to all allotments used on all farms operated by him for such a year, without regard to any election made by the operator of the farm from which any such allotment was rented. If the operator of the farm on which a rented allotment is to be used shall not have notified the county committee of his election within the time prescribed for such notification for farms within the county, he shall be deemed to have chosen choice (A).

"(2) Any such rental agreement shall be made on such terms and conditions, except as otherwise provided in this subsection, as the parties thereto agree: Provided, That no such agreement shall cover allotments made to any farm for a period in excess of one crop year, renewable each year.

"(3) No rental agreement shall be effective until a copy of such agreement is filed with the county committee of the county in which the acreage allotment is made.

"(4) The rental of any acreage allotment, or portion thereof, shall in no way affect the acreage allotment of the farm from which such acreage allotment, or portion thereof, is rented or the farm to which said acreage allotment, or portion thereof, is rented; and the amount of acreage of the acreage allotment rented shall be considered for purposes of future State, county, and farm acreage allotments to have been planted on the farm from which said acreage allotment was rented in the crop year specified in the lease.

"(5) Any farm acreage allotment, or portion thereof, rented under this subsection shall be multiplied by the per centum which the normal yield of the farm from which the acreage allotment, or portion thereof, is rented is of the normal yield of the farm to which the acreage allotment, or portion thereof, is rented.

"(6) The average of crops requiring annual tillage on the farm from which any allotment is rented shall be reduced during the period covered by the rental agreement below the acreage normally devoted to such crops on such farm by an acreage equal to the acreage allotment transferred. The acreage normally devoted to such crops and the amount of the reduction therein required by this paragraph shall be determined by the county committee after taking crop rotation practices and other relevant factors into consideration, and the reduction shall be agreed to in writing by the owner and operator of the farm from which the allotment is rented before the rental agreement may be filed with the county committee. Any producer who knowingly and willfully harvests an acreage of crops requiring annual tillage in excess of that permitted by this paragraph shall be subject to a civil penalty equal to 150 per centum of the rental provided for by the rental agreement filed with the county committee. Such penalty shall be recoverable in a civil suit brought in the name of the United States.

"(7) This subsection shall apply to the crop years of 1959, 1960, and 1961 only.

"(8) The Secretary shall issue such regulations as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this subsection."

Mr. JORDAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. JORDAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DEFICIT FINANCING—ADDRESS BY SENATOR RUSSELL

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, the Georgia bankers' convention is being held today at Augusta, Ga. The principal speaker is my able and distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL]. One of the greatest problems confronting the Nation today arises from the fact that our Government is spending more money that it is taking in, in revenue.

The senior Senator from Georgia delivered an able speech in which he addressed himself primarily to the particular problem of deficit financing. I ask unanimous consent that his speech be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF SENATOR RICHARD B. RUSSELL DELIVERED TO GEORGIA BANKERS' CONVENTION AT AUGUSTA, GA., APRIL 15, 1959

It is a great and happy privilege for me to be the guest today of the Georgia Bankers Association.

This is the first opportunity I have had in several years to leave Washington while Congress is in session in order to be with you on the occasion of your annual convention. I must say I have looked forward to this event with a great deal of anticipation.

I am grateful for this opportunity to pay my respects and express my appreciation to the bankers of Georgia for the continuing contribution that you are making to the welfare and progress of our great State.

Your vital role in the commercial life of the State is too well known to require any reiteration from me. Suffice it to say that you provide the financial underpinning for our entire economy.

Happily, the role of Georgia bankers is not limited to the commercial sphere. You have always been in the forefront of the community and civic undertakings that make Georgia a better place to live and to work.

Indeed, I know of no group with any higher sense of community pride and public spirit that the bankers of Georgia. Our banks are looked upon as something a great deal more than commercial institutions where money is deposited and borrowed. They are as much a part of the everyday life of the community as the church and the school.

You have earned this high station in our society by your keen awareness of the needs and problems of the people and communities you serve and by the discharge of your responsibility in meeting them. As a result, you have gained the respect, trust, and confidence of all of our people.

Because you are trusted to handle the financial affairs of others, I know that many of you must be deeply concerned by the way the fiscal affairs of the Federal Government in Washington are now being handled.

There is certainly good reason why you should be concerned.

Federal spending during the current fiscal year will be exceeded only by the peak years of World War II when this country was engaged in a desperate struggle for survival. It will almost double the entire cost of the New Deal Recovery programs from 1933 to 1939.

The already staggering national debt appears likely to hit another alltime high as a result of the largest peacetime deficit in history. The Federal Government has wound up in the red in every year but five since 1930.

Inflation, fostered and encouraged to a large degree by Federal fiscal policies, continues to cheapen the value of the dollar. This threatens incalculable harm to the national economy.

These harsh facts of financial life constitute a constant menace to the soundness, solvency, and security of our Nation at a time when we are under dire threat of Communist tyranny from abroad.

The menace goes to the heart of our great American system. Unless we put our financial house in order—and do so quickly—we may wake up some morning to find that our system of free enterprise and individual freedom and initiative has been transformed into a system of State socialism.

Today—the last day for paying last year's Federal income taxes—seems an appropriate, if painful, time for taking stock of how far we have traveled down the bleak road of fiscal irresponsibility. History records that we have proceeded quite some distance.

Since 1930, the Federal budget has grown from a relatively modest $3.3 billion dollars to the current year's $80 billion. Federal spending did not climb into the $10 billion a year class until the approach of World War II in 1941.

During the same period, the national debt has skyrocketed from $16 billion in 1930 to about $285 billion this year. It is hard to believe that during the late 1800's, Presidents Arthur and Cleveland were troubled by surpluses rather than deficits.

This period of spectacular growth in Federal spending and the steep rise of the national debt has been one of continuous crisis, challenge, and change.

We have weathered wars, hot and cold, and depressions, big and little.

We have seen our population expand by leaps and bounds, and our people crowd into the cities from the farms.

We have seen the advent of the scientific age with its atomic bombs and nuclear power, its jet aircraft and intercontinental missiles, its earth satellites and moon rockets. We are even now standing on the threshold of man's first trip into space.

All these things, of course, have had a mighty impact on Government and on Government spending. They made some deficit financing of an emergency nature essential and unavoidable. There were exceptional circumstances that called for exceptional measures. But we should not have permitted deficit financing to become the rule rather than the exception.

There is a widespread belief that recent tremendous increases in Government spending have been due to the necessity of providing for national defense. This is not the case. The great increases in Federal spending have been in domestic and civilian programs.

In the 5-year period between 1954 and 1959, spending for domestic and civilian programs rose from $19.1 billion to $34 billion estimated for the current fiscal year. This is an increase of almost $15 billion or 78 percent.

By contrast, defense spending this year is only about $1 billion higher than in 1954. In the intervening years, defense spending was actually below the 1954 level. This includes spending for our own military programs, atomic energy, and foreign aid.

It is interesting to note that estimated spending this year for agriculture is about the equal of the entire Federal budget during most of the individual years of the great depression. In spite of this enormous spending, many of our farmers today are in the worst financial straits of any time since the depression.

If the present trend continues, one noted economist has predicted that total Federal spending will increase about $10 billion over the next 5 years. He foresees a budget of $88 billion by 1964.

The time has come to ask ourselves what this spending spree means for the future of ourselves, our families, and our country.

For one thing, it means there is little possibility for any real relief from our present tax burden so long as spending continues to rise. Indeed, the prospects are for higher and higher taxes to keep pace with expanding expenditures.

It is somewhat ironic that Great Britain, a country which we helped put on its feet with financial aid and loans after World War II, last week announced a major reduction in taxes.

The present trend is also certain to mean an ever increasing Federal debt which now amounts to about $1,680 for every man, woman and child in the Nation. Interest on the debt alone now takes about one-tenth of all Federal tax revenue.

It is also certain to lead to more and more inflation and a cheaper and cheaper dollar which is now worth only about 48 cents by 1939 standards. This could prove disastrous for persons with fixed incomes, for provident investment, for the frugal who have put their security in savings and for prudent business and sound financing.

It will mean the concentration of greater and greater powers in the hands of an already much too powerful Federal Government in Washington. It will further reduce the importance of State and local governments and will increase government controls and interference over private enterprise.

And finally, it will weaken our ability—if not our will—to resist the aggressive designs of the Communists who will never abandon their dream of world conquest.

Certainly, the grave perils inherent in runaway government spending are of immediate and vital concern to every American. All stand to be hurt—business, labor, farmers, professional people, the aged and retired, consumers and every other element of our population.

There is a great deal of talk in Washington about the need for bringing Federal spending into line and balancing the budget. The President has expressed his desire for a balanced budget. So have the responsible leaders in Congress of both political parties.

Unhappily, there has been too much talk and too little action.

To make matters worse, the problem has become heavily clouded by a pall of partisan politics for which both parties and the President are partly to blame.

In the first place, not all of the "spenders" are Democrats and not all the "budget balancers" are Republicans, as some would have you believe. Both parties have some of both.

There is as much difference in the fiscal views and the political philosophy of JAKE JAVITS and BARRY GOLDWATER in the Republican Party as there is between PAUL DOUGLAS and HARRY BYRD in the Democratic Party.

In the second place, the so-called "balanced budget" that President Eisenhower submitted to Congress for fiscal 1960 contains quite a few holes and a good deal of fast bookkeeping doubletalk.

It was based on the assumption that Congress would increase gasoline taxes and postal rates, neither of which is very likely to happen, and on some highly questionable estimates of receipts and expenditures during fiscal 1960.

The Administration has also tried to charge some spending against the current year's budget that rightfully should be charged against fiscal 1960. This is a transparent effort to preserve a theoretical balance in 1960 at the expense of a larger deficit in the current year budget, which is already hopelessly out-of-balance by around $13 billion or more.

I also believe that the President's 1960 budget puts emphasis on the wrong sort of spending. I cannot agree with him that we should cut back the manpower strength of our own military establishment and defer the necessary research of advanced missiles and other technological weapons in order to increase our foreign aid program.

Since World War II, we have lavished $65 billion in American resources in countries all over the globe. Though initially sound, I believe we reached the point of diminishing return from foreign aid spending several years ago.

The program is shot through with waste and mismanagement. A recent Congressional investigation revealed an instance in which a motor pool in one country had received 44 tires for every truck in a single year, while in another country, there was only one carburetor for a certain type truck for an entire army.

In still another country, an American-financed military repair installation was found to be building airplanes for the private use of officers of a foreign army. And in Pakistan, almost $1.5 million has been set aside since 1953 for grain storage elevators that have not yet been built.

I simply cannot agree with the President that "dollar for dollar" we will receive more security from our foreign aid program than we will from additional expenditures for our own defense establishment.

I believe this is an area in which a tremendous savings can be made to be applied toward our own military strength and toward balancing the budget.

Although the President's budget contains serious defects of judgment and sincerity, President Eisenhower at least has plans to achieve a balanced budget. That is more than can be said for some of the ultra-liberals in the Democratic Party.

Not only are they making no pretense at seeking a balanced budget, but they are urging all sorts of socialistic and social reform spendthrift schemes in the name of bolstering the economy.

This group certainly does not speak for me, nor, I believe, a majority of our party.

It is high time for the responsible leadership in this country to make clear to the American people the impossibility of getting something for nothing.

It will require great political courage on the part of the President and the Congress to restore fiscal responsibility. It will require a President who will first set the example by cutting the ever-increasing White House expenditures and then demand that his appointed heads cut the costs of every agency over which the Cabinet exercises administrative control.

It will mean that the Congress must have the courage to stand up against the pressure groups who demand new spending. It will necessitate self-restraint on the part of State and local governments and the many organizations throughout the country who have their pet projects which require Federal spending. They must recognize that many of the activities they press in Washington can be administered more economically by State and local governments.

I am aware that such a course of action sounds good in theory but would be most difficult to achieve in practice. It would necessarily result in the elimination and curtailment of many programs and projects that are immensely popular with various segments of the population.

Here we are up against the old story in trying to reduce Government spending. Everybody is in favor of cutting the other fellow's program, but not his own. Everybody agrees that nonessential spending should go, but nobody can agree on what is nonessential.

I have been amazed time and time again to see citizens justify some public works projects for their own communities with which they are familiar as being essential and, at the same time, apply the label of "pork barrel" to other projects in other communities.

This is an understandable human trait. But here is where the sacrifices must be made if we are to have meaningful reductions in Federal spending.

There is but one solution to the problem of balancing the budget. We must cut the garment to fit the cloth. Federal spending must be kept within available revenue.

In the painful cutting process, there must be one simple and inflexible principle of putting first things first. All spending proposals must be measured against the national interest. Those that do not measure up, must be postponed or abandoned.

The security and survival of our country must come first.

LOW PRICES FOR EGGS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to another instance of the hard times which come unexpectedly upon farmers and to the attitude of the Secretary of Agriculture toward their misfortune.

On April 1 I began to receive letters and telegrams and long-distance calls from egg producers in Minnesota informing me that grade A eggs were selling at prices far below the cost of production, and asking that I take action to get some assistance from the Department of Agriculture. I shall read one letter and one telegram as examples.

ELKTON, S. DAK., March 26, 1959.

Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Today when the egg truck picked up eggs they were paying 18 cents a dozen for large eggs and less for other grades.

I did not sell my eggs today. I could not afford to sell at that price. It cost me more than 18 cents to produce those eggs so I thought I would write to you so you will know what is going on in the egg market as they are very careful not to mention anything like this in news casts or market reports.

Thank you.

Mrs. VIRGIL PORTER.

Mr. President, I should like to have Senators who pay from 55 cents to 60 cents a dozen for eggs in Washington know that the farmers of my State are getting for grade A, top grade, large, fresh eggs, 18 cents a dozen.

The telegram reads as follows:

BENSON, MINN.,
March 31, 1959.

HUBERT HUMPHREY,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

Price of eggs in our area 20 cents a dozen for A large. Lots of chick cancellation. Market weak. Request greater school lunch purchases for the next 3 or 4 weeks.

BOB ANDERSON,
Manager, Benson Produce.

Mr. President, egg production is an important business in Minnesota, not only because we have large producers. Almost every Minnesota farmer is an egg producer to some extent. Minnesota is one of the major egg suppliers for the whole country. I think Minnesota is either the second or the third largest egg-producing State in the Nation.

Senators know that the Secretary has the authority to move quickly when a perishable agricultural commodity runs into price trouble. The law provides that a share of import duties, 30 percent is the amount, be made available to the Secretary for this purpose, among others. In past years, this program has provided emergency aid to many a producer of apples, poultry, eggs, and many other perishable commodities. Secretary Benson has used this program, although sparingly.

Therefore, in response to the many earnest requests, and following the usual channel for such action, I wrote to the Secretary of Agriculture asking that a shell-egg purchase program be put into effect, and urging that it be done at once, because when supplies of a product flood a market, the price to producers can fall very rapidly and very far. Often, merely the announcement that a section 32 purchase is to be made for the school lunch and welfare programs will have a strengthening effect on the market. Many times the purchase need not be large to get the desired effect.

I ask unanimous consent that my letter of April 2 to the Secretary and the press release which I issued on the subject be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and press release were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 1, 1959.

The Honorable EZRA TAFT BENSON,
Secretary of Agriculture,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Telegrams, telephone calls, and letters from egg producers in Minnesota and South Dakota indicate that the shell-egg market price has broken seriously. Farmers are receiving only 18 to 20 cents per dozen for grade A large eggs, a price appreciably below the cost of production. This means that a case of eggs that has cost the farmer $9 to produce is selling at $4 per case. Such a price loss can mean only disaster to egg producers.

As you know, the law is quite clear on this point. You have full authority to institute a purchase program for a non-price-supported perishable agricultural commodity under section 32 of Public Law 320. Time and again it has been proved that a purchase program that diverts even a small amount of a product from the regular market will strengthen the market price.

The producers of shell eggs are in price trouble. School-lunch programs are in need of additional protein foods. More than 5 million American citizens are receiving welfare assistance and surplus commodities such as cornmeal and flour. There are wide areas of growing unemployment and hunger in many States as unemployment-compensation benefits are exhausted. It is clear that a shell-egg diversion program put into action at this time could benefit many groups. There should be no delay on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture. You should move on this today.

I am quite aware that the Department of Agriculture has been purchasing quantities of dried eggs in recent weeks for the school-lunch program with section 32 funds. While dried eggs are a nutritious product, it is well known that this type of egg purchase has little, if any, effect on the market price of shell eggs.

Therefore, in this emergency situation, I strongly urge that you take immediate action to institute a shell-egg purchase program in the best interests of the Nation.

Sincerely yours,

HUBERT H. HUMPHREY.

SENATOR HUMPHREY URGES SECRETARY BENSON TO HALT EGG PRICE BREAK

Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, Democrat, of Minnesota, today urged Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Taft Benson to make immediate purchases of shell eggs in order to halt the price break in the egg market.

"Telegrams, telephone calls, and letters from egg producers in Minnesota and South Dakota indicate that the shell-egg market price has broken seriously," Senator HUMPHREY stated in a letter sent yesterday to the Agriculture Secretary.

"Farmers are receiving only 18 cents to 20 cents per dozen for grade A large eggs, a price appreciably below the cost of production. This means that a case of eggs that has cost the farmer $9 to produce, is selling at $4 per case. Such a price loss can mean only disaster to egg producers."

The Minnesota Senator pointed out to the Secretary that he had full authority to institute a shell-egg purchase program under section 32 of Public Law 320.

"Time and again it has been proved that a purchase program that diverts even a small amount of a product from the regular market will strengthen the market price. The producers of shell eggs are in price trouble. School-lunch programs are in need of additional protein foods.

"More than 5 million American citizens are receiving welfare assistance and surplus commodities such as cornmeal and flour. There are wide areas of growing unemployment and hunger in many States as unemployment benefits are exhausted. It is clear that a shell egg diversion program put into action at this time could benefit many groups. There should be no delay on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture. You should move on this today."

Senator HUMPHREY went on to say: "I am quite aware that the Department of Agriculture has been purchasing quantities of dried eggs for the school-lunch program in recent weeks. While this is a nutritious product, it is well-known that this type of egg purchase has little, if any, effect on the market price of shell eggs. Therefore, in this emergency situation, I strongly urge that you take immediate action in the best interests of the Nation."

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, in my letter, I point out that with large, grade A eggs selling at from 18 to 20 cents a dozen, a case of eggs, which costs the farmer $9 to produce, is selling at $4 a case. That is the economics of egg production.

As was probably to be expected, I did not hear from the Secretary. But I continued to hear from the egg producers of Minnesota. Their telegrams tell the story of what happened much more vividly than I can tell it.

I do not know whether the Department of Agriculture is short on stationery, short on telephones, or short on telegram allowances; but if it is, I plead with Senators to provide a little extra allowance for the Department, because it is very hard to get an answer from the Department when people are in trouble, as I have found from previous experience.

Let me read a few of the telegrams. Here is one from Willmar, Minn.:

I am sending this telegram on behalf of thousands of farmers in this community in regard to the price of eggs. It's been the lowest in dozens of years. Some farmers' eggs do not average 15 cents a dozen, and it comes at a time when the farmer needs this income the most.

By the way, Mr. President, when we buy ham and eggs, even though the price of pork is down, and the price of eggs is down, we find that, nevertheless, the price of ham and eggs is still up. I hope the wages of the waitresses have been raised; I hope someone is getting the benefit of the increased amount the consumers have to pay for ham and eggs.

I read further from the telegram:

When the new crop of grain is far away and the prices are uncertain and so is the weather, and the farmer and his wife depend on eggs to buy groceries, clothes, doctor bills, machinery repair, and also to buy seeds for the spring planting and feed for the livestock, and the farmer says at 15 cents a dozen for eggs it doesn't even pay the wear and tear let alone to keep a body alive.

In fact, Mr. President, it is really hardly worth the wear and tear on the hen.

I read further from the telegram:

As a small businessman have to face dozens of farmers every day and listen to their honest grievances. I would rather face 5,000 Republicans than watch a farm woman standing in some store unable to buy her meager needs for her family. I know, and you and millions of others know, that someone is going to make fat profit on this egg deal. As a member of Minnesota DFL and also known as the egg-eating, milk-drinking, butter-smearing, and the cow's best friend, I am speaking for millions of farmers. I urge you to drop everything you are doing and get on the egg wagon.

Very truly yours,
MORRIS CHARGO, WILLMAR PRODUCE.

By the way, Mr. President, that company is one of the finest and largest produce companies in my State.

I may add that although my constituents are gravely concerned over Berlin and over the crises in Iraq and over mutual security, they are also worried about the price of eggs. Even though the Foreign Relations Committee is meeting this afternoon—and I should like to be present at the meeting—I wish to say that as a U.S. Senator representing my constituents in Minnesota, I should like to obtain from the Secretary of Agriculture an answer about what he is going to do about the price of eggs. After we get the answer about eggs, we can consider the Berlin problem. Let us take little things first.

I read another telegram which I have received:

ROCHESTER, MINN., April 6, 1959.

Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

Our industry needs help badly. Egg market is way out of line compared to other foods. We appreciate any help that you could give us.

RAY HASLEY,
President, Baby Chick and Hatchery Association.

I read another telegram:

MONTEVIDEO, MINN., April 6, 1959.

Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY,
Washington, D.C.:

It is urgent that a support price be established immediately. Current low prices will ruin egg industry.

ALVIN OFFERMAN,
Director, Minnesota Hatchery Association.

Another telegram which I have received reads as follows:

BENSON, MINN., April 11, 1959.

Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY,
Wahington, D. C.:

Because the egg industry is important in Minnesota it is very urgent that some kind of temporary support be given the Minnesota egg producer. I would suggest promotion and buying for the Armed Forces and schools. Please reply.

ASTOR L. UNDERTHUN,
President, Minnesota Egg Producers Association.

Mr. President, these are only a few of hundreds of telegrams and letters I have received.

Here is another telegram:

LITCHFIELD, MINN.

HUBERT H. HUMPHREY,
U.S. Senator,
National Capitol, Washinton, D. C.:

It is urgent that a support program be established for eggs. Current low prices will force the Midwest egg producers out of business.

VERNE E. CARLSON,
President, Meeker County Egg Producers Association.
L. L. BAUGARTNER,
Executive Secretary, Minnesota Egg Producers Association.

Mr. President, the continuing flood of requests from egg producers impelled me to query again the Secretary of Agriculture, for I felt that no effort should be spared to make him realize the seriousness of the situation. So, on April 13—just 2 days ago—I sent him the following telegram:

APRIL 13, 1959.

Hon. EZRA TAFT BENSON,
Secretary of Agriculture,
Washington, D.C.:

With reference to emergency egg price situation in Midwest States, about which I wrote you April 2, what action have you taken or do you propose to take? Minnesota egg producers turn to their Government for assistance in absence of positive marketing legislation. Would appreciate courtesy of reply.

HUBERT H. HUMPHREY,
U.S. Senate.

Mr. President, that is where the situation stands today.

I have a great deal of faith in Western Union, and I really believe that Western Union delivered that telegram. I also have a great deal of faith, let me say, in the secretaries in the Department of Agriculture. But somewhere along the line either the Secretary of Agriculture did not answer the telegram or Western Union did not deliver it; and I think one of them should explain, because I have not received any response whatsoever.

I have not received any response from the Secretary of Agriculture, and the egg producers are going broke. The Department of Agriculture has taken no true price supporting action.

Mr. President, it is a sad thing for the farmers, when the Secretary of Agriculture is not on the job, and apparently does not have their best interests at heart. This afternoon I want to encourage the Secretary of Agriculture to do something. I ask him please to do something. If he wants low-priced eggs, I think some folks back home will be willing to give him some eggs. But we would like to have reasonable prices for eggs. I believe that it would be well for the consumers to know that in one of the largest egg-producing areas in the Nation, the farmers are being paid 19 cents a dozen for Grade A eggs. I would not want to state what pullet eggs are selling for; the price is almost an insult to the pullets.

So that is the situation our people are encountering.

Mr. President, do you know when they will obtain relief? Not until after a large number of farmers who are egg producers have "gone to the wall," have encountered the process of economic attrition. We have gone through this before; and I know when the action of the Department of Agriculture comes.

I am serving warning on the Department of Agriculture that I will be after it day after day, as I have been already; and I have directed my staff to be after the Department of Agriculture; and I have asked the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to be after the Department of Agriculture; until the funds which are available—they are not appropriated funds; they are tariff funds, section 32 funds, available funds—are used to support the egg market. This is the least that can be done.

Mr. President, my distinguished colleague, the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], is unavoidably absent from the Chamber at this time; he is attending another meeting. Earlier today I had hoped that we might participate in a colloquy on this matter, inasmuch as he wished to make a number of statements and to ask a number of questions. But since he had to attend to other official business, I suggested to him that he give me his statement, and that I would place it in the RECORD for him. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that his statement be printed at this point in the RECORD, following my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MCCARTHY

In February 1953, Mr. Benson made a major policy address in St. Paul before the Central Livestock Association. The Secretary of Agriculture said:

"This administration is unqualifiedly committed to price supports. The President, in his state of the Union address to Congress, renewed his pledges to farmers."

The Secretary then went on to quote the President to the effect that "this price-support legislation will expire at the end of 1954. * * * So we should begin now to consider what farm legislation we should develop for 1955 and beyond. Our aim should be economic stability and full parity of income for American farmers."

The agricultural market generally, and the egg market in Minnesota specifically, is far from reflecting "economic stability and full parity of income for American farmers."

The Senate recalls, I'm sure, that the Secretary of Agriculture also said:

"The development of modern agriculture which has made possible these great achievements, has placed the family farm in a vulnerable economic position because farm prices and income rise and fall more rapidly than farm costs. Hence, the guarding of farm levels of living requires a program of storage and price supports to help to assure stability of income. These supports should be designated not only to serve the welfare of farmers, but also, in the widest national interest, to prevent disaster to the farm producing plant and the national food supply."

Mr. Benson returned to this point in his speech, and asserted again: "Price supports should provide insurance against disaster to the farm producing plant."

My question is this: Does anyone know what level of parity Mr. Benson holds to be the disaster level? At one time, as I recall, he thought a drop below 80 percent of parity was dangerous. The egg market in Minnesota has been at about 42 percent of parity for several days. Is that a disaster level?

The Department of Agriculture during the past few weeks has been buying about 50,000 cases of processed eggs a week. Then, as a result of the emergency in the egg market, the Department doubled its purchases on April 2, I believe, and bought 108,000 cases for that week. The market price in Minnesota went up a cent for a few days, and then dropped back even lower than before. Last week the Minnesota farmers were getting 20 cents a dozen for top grade, 16 cents for medium, 14 cents for seconds. The response of the Department last Thursday was to drop back to the purchase of about 50,000 cases again. The parity price for eggs is 47.4 cents per dozen; and the Minnesota price 20 cents, which is 42 percent of parity. Should not that qualify as a disaster level?

Is it within the letter and the spirit of the law for the Secretary of Agriculture to initiate an immediate program to support the egg market with section 32 funds? Last July 1 the Department had about $535 million in section 32 funds—and that $150 million of that has been spent so far this fiscal year. That leaves around $385 million. The use of a relatively small percentage of this fund to stabilize the egg market would be justified.

Mr. Benson spoke at the annual convention of the Associated Retail Bakers of America, last Monday, at the Sheraton-Park. He said he "called on Congress to heed the voice of the American farmer for more freedom to act and less Government interference."

The telegrams we have received during the past 2 weeks from the various officers of the State and county egg producer's associations and the State officers of the Minnesota Hatchery Association, reflect in some way the voice of the Minnesota farmer. The letters, telegrams, and telephone calls request not less Government interference, but a program of action.

Mr. Benson asserted that the "administration's opponents cannot agree on a constructive solution for the problems of artificial prices, farm surpluses and Government control."

Setting aside for the moment the larger question of the farm programs of Congress which twice have been vetoed in the past 6 years, it is my opinion that the Congress acted with clear purpose and responsibility when it provided section 32 funds to help level off disasterous price drops.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order No. 172, Senate bill 1555, introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] for himself and other Senators, and reported by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare with amendments.

Mr. KENNEDY obtained the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN].

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I send forward an amendment to the pending bill, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table preceding its being called up for consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield to the majority leader.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Am I to understand that the amendment which the Senator from North Carolina plans to discuss is with regard to title 6?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes. If the amendment were adopted, it would strike out title 6. It would remove from the bill some amendments of the Taft-Hartley Act which are not relevant to a bill dealing exclusively with malpractices in the internal affairs of unions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does the Senator have the amendment in the form in which he desires it?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I wonder if the Senator will ask the clerk to read it, and call it up, so it will be the pending question. We will not have any votes on it, but the Senator will have his rights protected.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Has the so-called labor-management reform bill been made the unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Is it before the Senate at the present time? If it is not, it will require unanimous consent to take it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been made the order of business.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Senate bill 1555 has been made the order of business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senate bill 1555 is before the Senate.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment which I have just sent forward to the desk be made the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I would think the request was out of order. Under the rules, of course, the committee amendments would come first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, if there is no objection to the committee amendments, that the Senator from North Carolina may offer his amendment and that it may be the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I would have no objection, except I think it is a rather summary way of disposing of the committee amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I did not dispose of them. Let us dispose of them, so the Senator from North Carolina can offer his amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. To that I have no objection. Of course, I think the ranking minority member of the committee should be here.

Mr. President, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. As I understand, we are considering a clean bill, and there is no committee amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? As I understand, a clean bill was reported yesterday. It is not the bill on the desk. As I unstand the situation, the bill reported yesterday by the committee was a clean bill.

That is what I asked the Parliamentarian about earlier, because I wondered about the propriety of the bill being taken up, since it is a different bill from the bill which was previously printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill was reported. The bill was introduced March 25, 1959, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. The bill was reported yesterday with amendments.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The bill was reported yesterday with amendments, or as amended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I wonder if we can act on the committee amendments, since I understand there is no controversy about them. Then the amendment of the able Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], can be offered. If not, we can get unanimous consent for the Senator from North Carolina to offer his amendment. I want to accommodate the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be considered and agreed to en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The committee amendments agreed to en bloc are as follows:

On page 3, line 21, after the word "organizations", to strike out "employees" and insert "employers";

On page 15, line 22, after the word "be", to strike out "constructed" and insert "construed";

On page 16, line 21, after the word "any", to strike out "person" and insert "person,";

On page 17, line 9, after the word "such", to strike out "labor organization or by such employer" and insert "person";

On page 30, line 9, after the word "subordinate", to insert "labor";

On page 37, line 12, after the word "other", to strike out "recordings" and insert "records";

On page 41, line 6, after the word "by", to strike out "this title or its own constitution or bylaws" and insert "its own constitution or bylaws except as otherwise provided by this title";

On page 44, line 17, after the word "and", to strike out "expenditures" and insert "expenditure";

On page 47, line 23, after the word "of", to strike out "this" and insert "the";

On page 49, after line 6, to strike out "tion to an employee except that as used in provisions of this Act subjecting employers to any requirement, liability, prohibition, administrative sanction, or punishment, 'employer' shall not include the United States or any wholly owned Government corporation or any State or political subdivision of a State." and insert "tion to an employee but does not include the United States or any corporation wholly owned by the Government of the United States or any State or political subdivision thereof.";

On page 51, line 14, after the word "the", where it appears the second time, to strike out "Railroad" and insert "Railway"; and

On page 59, line 5, after the word "in", to strike out "the unit described in the petition" and insert "an appropriate unit".

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959".

Declaration of findings, purposes, and policy

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that, in the public interest, it continues to be the responsibility of the Federal Government to protect employees' rights to organize, choose their own representatives, bargain collectively, and otherwise engage in concerted activities for their mutual aid or protection; that the relations between employers and labor organizations and the millions of workers they represent have a substantial impact on the commerce of the Nation; and that in order to accomplish the objective of a free flow of commerce it is essential that labor organizations, employers, and their officials adhere to the highest standards of responsibility and ethical conduct in administering the affairs of their organizations, particularly as they affect labor-management relations.

(b) The Congress further finds, from recent investigations in the labor and management fields, that there have been a number of instances of breach of trust, corruption, disregard of the rights of individual employees, and other failures to observe high standards of responsibility and ethical conduct which require further and supplementary legislation that will afford necessary protection of the rights and interests of employees and the public generally as they relate to the activities of labor organizations, employers, labor relations consultants, and their officers and representatives.

The Congress, therefore, further finds and declares that the enactment of this Act is necessary to eliminate or prevent improper practices on the part of labor organizations, employers, labor relations consultants, and their officers and representatives which distort and defeat the policies of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, as amended, and the Railway Labor Act, as amended, and have the tendency or necessary effect of burdening or obstructing commerce by (1) impairing the efficiency, safety, or operation of the instrumentalities of commerce; (2) occurring in the current of commerce; (3) materially affecting, restraining, or controlling the flow of raw materials or manufactured or processed goods into or from the channels of commerce, or the prices of such materials or goods in commerce; or (4) causing diminution of employment and wages in such volume as substantially to impair or disrupt the market for goods flowing into or from the channels of commerce.

(c) It is declared to be the policy of the United States to advance the objectives and protect the national interests referred to in subsection (a), and correct the evils referred to in subsection (b) by (1) requiring labor organizations, employers, labor relations consultants, and their officers and representatives engaged in industries affecting commerce to file with the Secretary of Labor (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary") certain reports and information concerning their administrative practices and financial transactions, which shall be public information, (2) encouraging the faithful observance of fiduciary responsibilities by officers and representatives of labor organizations through a requirement that such officers and representatives shall file reports, which shall be public information, on transactions in which there may be a conflict between their interests as individuals and their responsibilities as officers or representatives of labor organizations and on all expenditures for community welfare, educational or charitable purposes, loans and other transactions involving union funds, (3) regulating the appointment of trustees or receivers by labor organizations engaged in industries affecting commerce to administer the affairs of subordinate labor organizations, (4) providing that labor organizations engaged in industries affecting commerce shall elect their officers periodically either directly by secret ballot or through delegates chosen by secret ballot, (5) encouraging voluntary action by labor organizations and employers engaged in industries affecting commerce, through the adoption of codes of ethical practices and suitable implementation and publication thereof, to eliminate and prevent improper activities in the administration of their affairs, their financial transactions, and their relations with each other, and (6) providing procedures for preventing acts and omissions of labor organizations, employers, labor relations consultants, and their officers and representatives, which are detrimental to the right and interests of individual employees and the public, and imposing criminal penalties for willful violations of provisions of this Act.

TITLE I—REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE

SEC. 101. (a) Every labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall file with the Secretary a copy of its constitution and bylaws and a report, both signed by its president and treasurer or corresponding principal officers, containing the following information:

(1) the name of such labor organization and address of its principal place of business and, if different, the address where its books and records are kept;

(2) the names and titles of its constitutional officers (including its principal financial officer);

(3) the initiation fee or fees which are required by new or transferred members by the constitution, bylaws, or other governing rules of the reporting labor organization on becoming members of such labor organization;

(4) the regular dues or fees which are required of members by the constitution and bylaws or other governing rules of the reporting labor organization in order to remain members in good standing of such labor organization; and

(5) through means of a detailed statement, or by reference to provisions of its constitution and bylaws or other governing documents, procedures followed with respect to (i) qualifications for or restrictions on membership, (ii) election of officers and stewards, (iii) discipline or removal of officers or agents, (iv) calling of regular and special meetings, (v) levying of assessments, (vi) imposition of fines, (vii) authorization for bargaining demands, (viii) ratification of contract terms, (ix) authorization for strikes, (x) authorization for disbursement of union funds, (xi) audit of union financial transactions, (xii) participation in insurance or other benefit plans, and (xiii) imposition of fines, suspensions, and expulsions of members, including the grounds upon which such action may be taken and any provision made for notice, hearings, judgment on the evidence, and appeal procedure. Any change in the information required by this subsection shall be reported to the Secretary at the time the reporting labor organization files with the Secretary the annual financial report required by subsection (b).

(b) Every labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall file annually with the Secretary a financial report signed by its president and treasurer or corresponding principal officers containing the following information in such detail as may be necessary accurately to disclose its financial condition and operations for the preceding fiscal year:

(1) assets and liabilities at the beginning and end of the fiscal year;

(3) receipts of any kind and the sources thereof;

(3) salary, allowances, and other direct or indirect disbursements (including reimbursed expenses) to each officer and also to each employee who received more than $10,000 in the aggregate from such labor organization and any other labor organization affiliated with the same international labor organization.

(4) direct and indirect loans aggregating in excess of $250 to any officer, employee, or member, together with a statement of the purpose, security, if any, and arrangements for repayment;

(5) direct and indirect loans to any business enterprise, together with a statement of the purpose, security, if any, and arrangements for repayment; and

(6) other disbursements made by it including the purposes thereof:

all in such categories as the Secretary may prescribe.

(c) Every labor organization required to submit a report under this title shall make available the information required to be contained in such report to all of its members in such form and manner as the Secretary shall by regulation prescribe.

(d) The Secretary may exempt from the requirements of subsection (b) for such definite or indefinite periods as he may determine any labor organization or class thereof having fewer than two hundred members and having gross annual receipts of less than $20,000, including all sums paid over as dues or per capita tax to a parent or affiliated labor organization (excluding payments received by trustees under section 302(c) (5) or (6) of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended), if he finds that the exemption of such labor organization or class thereof would not interfere with the attainment of the objectives of this Act.

(e) Subsections (f) and (g) of section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, are hereby repealed.

(f) Clause (i) of section 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the following: "and has at the time the agreement was made or within the preceding twelve months received from the Board a notice of compliance with sections 9 (f), (g), (h)".

SEC. 102. (a) Every officer of a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce, and every employee of such a labor organization (other than a clerical employee, as defined by the Secretary) who received wages, salary, expenses or other allowances in excess of $5,000 during the preceding fiscal year from labor organizations, shall file with the Secretary a signed report listing and describing for the preceding fiscal year—

(1) any stock, bond, security, or other interest, legal or equitable, which he or his spouse or minor child directly or indirectly held in, and any income or any other benefit with monetary value which he or his spouse or minor child derived directly or indirectly from, an employer whose employees such labor organization represents or is actively seeking to represent, except payments and other benefits received as a bona fide employee of such employer;

(2) any transaction in which he or his spouse or minor child engaged directly or indirectly, involving any stock, bond, security, or loan to or from, or other legal or equitable interest in the business of an employer whose employees such labor organization represents or is actively seeking to represent;

(3) any stock, bond, security, or other interest, legal or equitable, which he or his spouse or minor child directly or indirectly held in, and any income or any other benefit with monetary value which he or his spouse or minor child directly or indirectly derived from, any business a substantial part of which consists of buying from, selling or leasing to, or otherwise dealing with, the business of an employer whose employees such labor organization represents or is actively seeking to represent;

(4) any stock, bond, security, or other interest, legal or equitable, which he or his spouse or minor child directly or indirectly held in, and any income or any other benefit with monetary value which he or his spouse or minor child directly or indirectly derived from, a business any part of which consists of buying from, or selling or leasing directly or indirectly to, or otherwise dealing with such labor organization;

(5) any direct or indirect business transaction or arrangement between him or his spouse or minor child and any employer whose employees his organization represents or is actively seeking to represent, except work performed and payments and benefits received as a bona fide employee of such employer and except purchases and sales of goods or services in the regular course of business at prices generally available to any employee of such employer; and

(6) any payment of money or other thing of value received directly or indirectly from any employer or any person who acts as a labor relations expert, adviser, or consultant to an employer except payments of the kinds referred to in section 302(c) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended.

(b) The provisions of paragraphs (1), (2), (3), (4), and (5) of subsection (a) shall not apply to securities traded on a securities exchange registered as a national securities exchange under the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 or to shares in an investment company registered under the Investment Company Act of 1940, or to securities of a public utility holding company registered under the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935, or to any income derived therefrom.

(c) Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to require any officer or employee of a labor organization to file a report under subsection (a) unless he or his spouse or minor child holds or has held an interest, has received income or any other benefit with monetary value or a loan or has engaged in a transaction described therein.

SEC. 103. (a) Every employer engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall file with the Secretary a report, signed by its president and treasurer or corresponding principal officers, listing and describing for the preceding fiscal year—

(1) Any expenditure in connection with any agreement or arrangement with a labor relations consultant or other independent contractor by which such person undertakes activities where an object thereof, directly or indirectly, is to persuade employees to exercise or not to exercise, or persuade employees as to the manner of exercising, the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, or undertakes to supply such employer with information concerning the activities of employees or a labor organization in connection with a labor dispute, except information for use solely in conjunction with a judicial, administrative, or arbitral proceeding;

(2) Any expenditure, during the fiscal year, where an object thereof, directly or indirectly, is to persuade employees to exercise or not to exercise, or persuade employees as to the manner of exercising, the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, or is to obtain information concerning the activities of employees or a labor organization in connection with a labor dispute: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as applying to: (i) changes in wages, working conditions, or employee benefits; (ii) expenditures incurred in connection with the publication by such employer in his own name of a newpaper, newsletter, or similar house organ or other letter, communication, or advertisement; (iii) expenditures to obtain information for use solely in conjunction with a judicial, administrative, or arbitral proceeding;

(3) Any payment or loan, direct or indirect, of any money or other thing of value, or any promise or agreement therefor, to any labor organization or any officer or employee of any labor organization except (i) payments pursuant to a collective bargaining agreement the terms of which have been fully disclosed to the employees in the bargaining unit, (ii) compensation paid to an officer or employee of a labor organization for, or by reason of, his services as an employee of such employer, (iii) payments or loans made by any national or State bank, credit union, insurance company, savings and loan association, or other credit institution, and (iv) payments of the kind referred to in section 302 (c) of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended;

(4) Any payment, expenditure, loan, transaction, or arrangement involving such employer, of which a report is required from an officer or employee of a labor organization under the provisions of section 102(a) (1), (2), (5), and (6).

(b) Every person who pursuant to any agreement or arrangement with an employer engaged in an industry affecting commerce undertakes activities where an object thereof is, directly or indirectly—

(A) to persuade employees to exercise or not to exercise, or persuade employees as to the manner of exercising, the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing;

(B) to supply an employer with information concerning the activities of employees or a labor organization in connection with a labor dispute, except information for use solely in conjunction with a judicial, administrative or arbitral proceeding, shall file annually a report with the Secretary, signed by its president and treasurer or corresponding principal officers, containing the following information:

(1) the name under which such person is engaged in doing business and the address of his principal place of business;

(2) receipts of any kind from employers on account of labor relations advice or services, designating the sources thereof;

(3) disbursements of any kind, in connection with such services and the purposes thereof; and

(4) a detailed statement of the terms of such agreement or arrangement;

all in such categories as the Secretary may prescribe.

(c) Nothing in this section shall be construed to require any employer or other person to file a report covering the services of such person by reason of his giving or agreeing to give advice to such employer or representing or agreeing to represent such employer before any court, administrative agency, or tribunal of arbitration or engaging or agreeing to engage in collective bargaining on behalf of such employer with respect to wages, hours, or other terms or conditions of employment or the negotiation of an agreement or any question arising thereunder.

(d) Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to require an employer to file a report under subsection (a) unless he has made expenditures, payments, or loans of the kind described therein. Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to require any other person to file a report under subsection (b) unless he was a party to an agreement or arrangement of the kind described therein.

(e) Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to require any regular officer, supervisor, or employee of and employer engaged in an industry affecting commerce to file a report in connection with services rendered to such employer, nor shall any employer in an industry affecting commerce be required to file a report covering expenditures made to any regular officer, supervisor, or employee of an employer as compensation for service as a regular officer, supervisor, or employee of such employer.

SEC. 104. (a) The contents of the reports and documents filed with the Secretary pursuant to sections 101, 102, and 103 shall be public information, and the Secretary may publish any information and data which he obtains pursuant to the provisions of this title. The Secretary may use the information and data for statistical and research purposes and compile and publish such studies, analyses, reports, and surveys based thereon as he may deem appropriate.

(b) The Secretary shall by regulation make reasonable provision for the inspection and examination, on the request of any person, of the information and data contained in any report or other document filed with him pursuant to section 101, 102, or 103.

(c) The Secretary may by regulation provide for the furnishing by the Department of Labor of copies of reports or other documents filed with the Secretary pursuant to this title, upon payment of a charge based upon the cost of the service: Provided, That the Secretary shall make available without payment of a charge, or require any person to furnish, to such State agency as is designated by law or by the Governor of the State in which such person has his principal place of business or headquarters, upon request of the Governor of such State, copies of any reports and document filed by such person with the Secretary pursuant to section 101, 102, or 103 or of information and data contained therein: Provided further, That no person shall be required by reason of any law of any State to furnish to any officer or agency of such State any information included in a report filed by such person with the Secretary pursuant to the provisions of this title, if a copy of such report, or of the portion thereof containing such information, is furnished to such officer or agency. All moneys received in payment of charges fixed by the Secretary pursuant to this subsection shall be deposited to the credit of the appropriation of the agency of the Department of Labor rendering such service and may be used, in the discretion of the Secretary, and notwithstanding any other provision of law, for the ordinary expenses of such agency.

SEC. 105. Every person shall make, keep, and preserve for such periods and under such conditions as the Secretary shall prescribe, such records and accounts of financial transactions as may be necessary to prepare and verify the financial reports required by sections 101, 102, and 103.

SEC. 106. (a) Initial reports required to be filed under this Act shall be filed not later than January 1, 1960: Provided, That initial reports required by sections 101(b) and 103 shall be required to cover only the period between the date of enactment and January 1, 1960, and the second report shall be required to cover only the period between January 1, 1960, and the beginning of the next fiscal year of the person filing such report.

(b) The Secretary shall have authority to issue, amend, and rescind rules and regulations prescribing the form, time of filing, and publication of reports required to be filed under this Act and such other reasonable rules and regulations (including rules prescribing reports concerning building funds, trusts, or enterprises financed by a labor organization) as he may find necessary to prevent the circumvention or evasion of such reporting requirements. In exercising his power under this section the Secretary shall prescribe by general rule simplified reports for labor organizations or employers for whom he finds that by virtue of their size a detailed report would be unduly burdensome: Provided, That the Secretary may revoke such provision for simplified forms of any labor organization or employer if he determines, after such investigation as he deems proper, that the purposes of this section would be served thereby. The Secretary may exempt from the requirements of section 101 for such definite or indefinite periods as he may determine, any labor organization or class thereof temporarily convened either for the sole purpose of negotiating a labor agreement or for carrying out educational activity.

(c) The Secretary shall have power and is directed when he believes it necessary in order to determine whether any person has violated or is about to violate any provision of this Act or any rule or regulation authorized by this Act (except amendments made by this Act to other statutes), to make an investigation and in connection therewith he may enter such places and inspect such records and accounts and question such persons as he may deem necessary to enable him to determine the facts relative thereto. The Secretary may report to interested persons or officials concerning the facts required to be shown in the report and concerning the reasons for such failure or refusal to file or any other matter which he deems to be appropriate as a result of such investigation.

SEC. 107. (a) No labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall make directly or indirectly any loan or loans to any officer or employee of such organization which results in a total indebtedness on the part of such officer or employee to the labor organization in excess of $1,500.

(b) No labor organization or employer shall directly or indirectly pay the fine, or pay or advance the costs of defense, of any officer, agent, employee, or representative indicted for or convicted of any violation of any provision of this Act: Provided, That upon acquittal such person may be reimbursed by his principal for expenditures necessarily incurred in his defense.

SEC. 108. (a) Any person who willfully violates or fails to comply with any provision of this title or the rules or regulations issued by the Secretary thereunder shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

(b) Any person who makes a false statement or representation of a material fact, knowing it to be false, or who knowingly fails to disclose a material fact, in any document, report or other information required under the provisions of this title or the rules or regulations issued thereunder shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

(c) Any person who willfully makes a false entry in or willfully conceals, withholds, or destroys any books, records, reports, or statements required to be kept by any provision of this title shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

(d) Each individual required to sign reports under sections 101 and 103 shall be personally responsible for the filing of such reports and for any statement contained therein.

SEC. 109. (a) Any person who embezzels, steals, or unlawfully and willfully abstracts or converts to his own use or the use of another any of the moneys, funds, securities, property, or other assets of a labor organization of which he is an officer or by whom he is employed directly or indirectly shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.

(b) When any officer or employee of any labor organization has been convicted of embezzling, stealing, or unlawfully and willfully abstracting or converting to his own use or the use of another any money or property of the labor organization in violation of the provisions of subsection (a), and the labor organization or its governing board or officers refuse or fail to sue to recover such money or property or the value of the same within six calendar months after being requested to do so by any member of the labor organization, any member of the labor organization may sue the convicted officer or employee in any district court of the United States or in any State court of competent jurisdiction to recover such money or property or the value thereof for the benefit of the labor organization. No such proceeding shall be brought except upon leave of the court obtained upon verified application and for good cause shown, which application may be made ex parte. The trial judge may allot a reasonable part of the recovery in any action under this subsection to pay the fees of counsel prosecuting the suit at the instance of the member of the labor organization and to compensate such member for any expenses necessarily paid or incurred by him in connection with the litigation. Nothing in this subsection shall reduce or limit the responsibilities of any officer or employee of a labor organization under any other law of the United States or the law of any State, and nothing in this subsection shall take away any right or bar any remedy to which members of a labor organization are entitled under any such law.

SEC. 110. (a) There shall be in the Department of Labor a Commissioner of Labor Reports, who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall receive compensation at the highest rate established for grade 18 of the General Schedule of the Classification Act of 1949, as amended, and shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by the Secretary or required by law. The Secretary may authorize the performance by the Commissioner of Labor Reports of any functions of the Secretary under this Act.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to make such expenditures and, subject to the civil service laws and the Classification Act of 1949, as amended, to appoint and fix the compensation of such personnel, including attorneys, as may be necessary to perform the functions imposed on him by this Act. Attorneys appointed under this section may appear for and represent the Secretary in any litigation, but such litigation shall be subject to the direction and control of the Attorney General.

(c) The Secretary, whenever it shall appear that any person has violated or is about to violate any of the provisions of this title, or any rule or regulation of the Secretary promulgated hereunder, may bring an action in a district court or other court of the United States for such relief as may be appropriate including, but without limitation, injunctions to restrain any such violations and to compel compliance with this title, and with rules and regulations issued thereunder. Any such action against a labor organization may be brought in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia or in the district court or other court of the United States where the violation occurred.

SEC. 111. Subsections (a), (b), and (c) of section 302 of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended, are amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 302. (a) It shall be unlawful for any employer or any person who acts as a labor relations expert, adviser, or consultant to an employer or who acts in the interest of an employer to pay, lend, or deliver, or agree to pay, lend, or deliver, any money or other thing of value—

"(1) to any representative of any of his employees who are employed in an industry affecting commerce, or

"(2) to any labor organization, or any officer or employee thereof, which represents, seeks to represent, or would admit to membership, any of the employees of such employer who are employed in an industry affecting commerce, or

"(3) to any employee or group or committee of employees of such employer employed in an industry affecting commerce in excess of their normal compensation for the purpose of causing such employee or group or committee directly or indirectly to influence any other employees in the exercise of the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, or

"(4) to any officer or employee of a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce with intent to influence him in respect to any of his actions, decisions, or duties as a representative of employees or as such officer or employee of such labor organization.

"(b)(1) It shall be unlawful for any person to request, demand, receive, or accept, or agree to receive or accept, any payment or delivery of any money or other thing of value prohibited by subsection (a).

"(2) It shall be unlawful for any labor organization, or for any person acting as an officer, agent, representative, or employee of such labor organization, to demand or accept from the operator of any motor vehicle (as defined in part II of the Interstate Commerce Act) employed in the transportation of property in commerce, or the employer of any such operator, any money or other thing of value payable to such organization or to an officer, agent, representative, or employee thereof as a fee or charge for the unloading, or in connection with the unloading, of the cargo of such vehicle: Provided, That nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to make unlawful any payment by an employer to any of his employees as compensation for their services as employees.

(3) It shall be unlawful to carry on picketing on or about the premises of any employer for the purpose of, or as part of any conspiracy or in furtherance of any plan or purpose for, the personal profit or enrichment of any individual (except a bona fide increase in wages or other employee benefits) by taking or obtaining any money or other thing of value from such employer against his will or with his consent.

"(c) The provisions of this section shall not be applicable (1) in respect to any money or other thing of value payable by an employer to any of his employees whose established duties include acting openly for such employer in matters of labor relations or personnel administration or to any representative of his employees, or to any officer or employee of a labor organization, who is also an employee or former employee of such employer, as compensation for, or by reason of, his services as employee of such employer; (2) with respect to the payment or delivery of any money or other thing of value in satisfaction of a judgment of any court or a decision or award of an arbitrator or impartial chairman or in compromise, adjustment, settlement, or release of any claim, complaint, grievance, or dispute in the absence of fraud or duress; (3) with respect to the sale or purchase of an article or commodity at the prevailing market price in the regular course of business; (4) with respect to money deducted from the wages of employees in payment of membership dues in or other periodic payments to a labor organization in lieu thereof: Provided, That the employer has received from each employee, on whose account such deductions are made, a written assignment which shall not be irrevocable for a period of more than one year, or beyond the termination date of the applicable collective agreement, whichever occurs sooner; (5) with respect to money or other thing of value paid to a trust fund established by such representative, for the sole and exclusive benefit of the employees of such employer, and their families and dependents (or of such employees' families, and dependents jointly with the employees of other employers making similar payments, and their families and dependents): Provided, That (A) such payments are held in trust for the purpose of paying, either from principal or income or both, for the benefit of employees, their families and dependents, for medical or hospital care, pensions on retirement or death of employees, compensation for injuries or illness resulting from occupational activity or insurance to provide any of the foregoing, or unemployment benefits or life insurance, disability and sickness insurance, or accident insurance; (B) the detailed basis on which such payments are to be made is specified in a written agreement with the employer, and employees and employers are equally represented in the administration of such fund, together with such neutral persons as the representatives of the employers and the representatives of employees may agree upon and in the event the employer and employee groups deadlock on the administration of such fund and there are no neutral persons empowered to break such deadlock, such agreement provides that the two groups shall agree on an impartial umpire to decide such dispute, or in event of their failure to agree within a reasonable length of time, an impartial umpire to decide such dispute shall, on petition of either group, be appointed by the district court of the United States for the district where the trust fund has its principal office, and shall also contain provisions for an annual audit of the trust fund, a statement of the results of which shall be available for inspection by interested persons at the principal office of the trust fund and at such other places as may be designated in such written agreement; and (C) such payments as are intended to be used for the purpose of providing pensions or annuities for employees are made to a separate trust which provides that the funds held therein cannot be used for any purpose other than paying such pensions or annuities; or (6) with respect to money or other thing of value paid by any employer to a trust fund established by such representative for the purpose of pooled vacation, holiday, severance or similar benefits, or defraying costs of apprenticeship or other training programs: Provided, That the requirements of clause (B) of the proviso to clause (5) of this subsection shall apply to such trust funds."

SEC. 112. (a) Every officer of a labor organization and every employer shall file annually at the beginning of each fiscal year with the Secretary an affidavit meeting all the requirements of subsection (b) of this section and not found by any court to be false. For the purposes of this section only, the term "employer" shall mean the officers and directors of an employer organized in the corporate or unincorporated association form or partners or individual proprietors.

(b) Each affidavit executed pursuant to the requirements of this section shall state that the affiant is not, and during the preceding twelve-month period has not been, a member of the Communist Party, or affiliated with such party, and that neither the affiant nor any organization of which he is a member or which he supports, or of which he has been a member or which he has supported during the preceding twelve-month period, believes in or teaches the overthrow of the United States Government by force or by any illegal or unconstitutional method. The provisions of section 1001 of title 18 of the United States Code shall be applicable to such affidavits.

(c) The provisions of the preceding subsections shall not apply to officers of labor organizations and employers within the meaning of this section who have not filed a petition under section 9 or a charge under section 10 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, during the twelve months preceding the date upon which they would otherwise be required to file such affidavit.

(d) Section 9(h) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is hereby repealed.

TITLE II—TRUSTEESHIPS

SEC. 201. (a) Every national or international labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce which has or assumes trusteeship over any subordinate labor organization shall file with the Secretary within thirty days after the date of the enactment of this Act or the imposition of any such trusteeship and, semiannually thereafter, a report, signed by its president and treasurer or corresponding principal officers, as well as by the trustees, containing the following information: (A) the name and address of the subordinate organization; (B) the date of establishing the trusteeship; (C) a detailed statement of the reason or reasons for establishing or continuing the trusteeship; (D) the nature and extent of participation by the membership of the subordinate organization in the selection of delegates to represent such organization in regular or special conventions or other policy-determining bodies and in the election of officers of such national or international labor organization.

(b) The provisions of sections 101(c), 104, 105, and subsections (b) and (c) of section 106 of title I shall be applicable to reports filed under this title.

(c) Any person who willfully violates or fails to comply with any provisions of this section or the rules or regulations issued thereunder shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

(d) Any person who makes a false statement or representation of a material fact, knowing it to be false, or who knowingly fails to disclose a material fact, in any report required under the provisions of this section or the rules and regulations issued thereunder, or willfully withholds, conceals, or destroys any documents, books, records, reports, or statements upon which such report is based, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

(e) Each individual required to sign a report under this section shall be personally responsible for the filing of such report and for any statement contained therein.

(f) Every labor organization required to submit a report under this title shall make available the information required to be contained in such report to all of its members in any subordinate organization involved in such form and manner as the Secretary shall by regulation prescribe.

SEC. 202. Trusteeships shall be established and administered by a national or international labor organization over a subordinate body only in accordance with the constitution of such organization and for the purpose of correcting corruption or financial malpractice, assuring the performance of collective bargaining agreements or other duties of a bargaining representative, restoring democratic procedures, or otherwise carrying out the legitimate objects of such labor organization.

SEC. 203. (a) During any period when a subordinate body of a labor organization is in trusteeship, it shall be unlawful (1) to count the vote of delegates from such body in any convention or election of officers of the labor organization unless the delegates have been chosen by secret ballot in an election in which all the members in good standing of such subordinate body were eligible to participate, or (2) to transfer to such organization any current receipts or other funds of the subordinate body except the normal per capita tax and assessments payable by subordinate bodies not in trusteeship: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the distribution of the assets of a labor organization in accordance with its charter or constitution and bylaws upon the bona fide dissolution thereof.

(b) Any person who shall willfully violate the provisions of this section shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

SEC. 204. (a) Upon the written complaint of any member or subordinate body of a labor organization alleging that such organization has violated the provisions of section 202 or 203, the Secretary shall investigate the complaint and if the Secretary finds probable cause to believe that such violation has occurred and has not been remedied he shall, without disclosing the identity of the complainant, bring a civil action in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the labor organization to prevent and restrain such violation and for such other relief as may be appropriate.

(b) For the purpose of actions under this section, district courts of the United States shall be deemed to have jurisdiction of a labor organization (1) in the district in which such organization maintains its principal office, or (2) in any district in which its duly authorized officers or agents are engaged in conducting the affairs of the trusteeship. Such organization may be sued as an entity. The service of summons, subpena, or other legal process of any court of the United States upon an officer or agent of a labor organization in his capacity as such shall constitute service upon the labor organization.

(c) In any proceeding pursuant to this section a trusteeship established by a labor organization in conformity with the procedural requirements of its constitution and bylaws and authorized or ratified after a fair hearing either before the executive board or before such other body as may be provided in accordance with its constitution or bylaws shall be presumed valid for a period of eighteen months from the date of its establishment and shall not be subject to attack during such period except upon clear and convincing proof that the trusteeship was not established in good faith for a purpose allowable under section 202. After the expiration of eighteen months the trusteeship shall be presumed invalid in any such proceeding and its discontinuance shall be decreed unless the labor organization shall show by clear and convincing proof that the continuation of the trusteeship is necessary for a purpose allowable under section 202. In the latter event the court may dismiss the complaint or retain jurisdiction of the cause on such conditions and for such period as it deems appropriate.

SEC. 205. The Secretary shall submit to the Congress at the expiration of three years from the date of enactment of this Act a report upon the operation of this title.

SEC. 206. Nothing contained in this title shall be deemed to authorize any suit in any court of the United States except upon complaint of the Secretary. The rights and remedies provided by this title shall be in addition to any and all other rights and remedies at law or in equity: Provided, That upon the filing of a complaint by the Secretary the jurisdiction of the district court over such trusteeship shall be exclusive and the final judgment shall be res judicata.

TITLE III—ELECTIONS

SEC. 301. (a) Every national or international labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce, except a federation of national or international labor organizations, shall elect the officers named in its constitution and the members of its executive board or similar governing body not less often than once every five years either by secret ballot among the members in good standing or at a convention of delegates chosen by secret ballot and in accordance with its constitution and bylaws.

(b) Every local labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall elect the officers named in its constitution and the members of its executive board or similar governing body not less often than once every three years by secret ballot among the members in good standing and in accordance with its constitution and bylaws. Such labor organization and its officers shall not discriminate in favor of or against any candidate with respect to the use of lists of members and shall comply with all reasonable requests of any candidate to distribute by mail or otherwise at the candidate's expense campaign literature in aid of such person's candidacy to all members in good standing of such labor organization. Adequate election safeguards to insure a fair count of the ballots shall be provided, including the right of any candidate to have an observer at the polls and at the counting of the ballots.

(c) Officers of intermediate bodies, such as general committees, system boards, joint boards, joint councils, or other associations of labor organizations as defined, shall be elected not less often than once every four years by secret ballot among the members in good standing or by union officers representative of such members who have been elected by secret ballot and in accordance with the labor organization's constitution and bylaws.

(d) In any election required by this section to be held by secret ballot a reasonable opportunity shall be given for the nomination of candidates and every member in good standing shall be eligible to be a candidate and to hold office (subject to reasonable qualifications uniformly imposed) and shall have the right to vote for or otherwise support, the candidate or candidates of his choice, without being subject to penalty, discipline, or improper interference or reprisal of any kind by such organization or any member thereof. Not less than fifteen days prior to the election notice thereof shall be mailed to each member at his last known home address, unless the election is held at the regular time specified in the constitution and bylaws of such organization on file with the Secretary of Labor. Each member in good standing shall be entitled to one vote. No member whose dues have been withheld by his employer for payment to such organization pursuant to his voluntary authorization provided for in a collective bargaining agreement shall be declared ineligible to vote or be a candidate for office in such organization by reason of alleged delay or default in the payment of dues. The votes cast by members of each local union shall be counted and the results shall be published separately. The election officials designated in the constitution and bylaws or the secretary, if no other official is designated, shall preserve for one year the ballots and all other records pertaining to the election. The election shall be conducted in accordance with the constitution and bylaws of such organization insofar as they are not inconsistent with the provisions of this title.

(e) When officers are chosen by a convention of delegates elected by secret ballot, the convention shall be conducted in accordance with the constitution and bylaws of the labor organization insofar as they are not inconsistent with the provisions of this title. The officials designated in the constitution and bylaws or the secretary, if no other is designated, shall preserve for one year the credentials of the delegate and all minutes and other records of the convention pertaining to the election of officers.

(f) No moneys received by any labor organization by way of dues, assessment, or similar levy, and no moneys of an employer shall be contributed or applied to promote the candidacy of any person in an election subject to the provisions of this title. Such moneys of a labor organization may be utilized for notices, factual statements of issues, and other expenses necessary for the holding of an election.

(g) If the Secretary, upon application of any member of a local labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce, finds that the constitution and bylaws of such labor organization do not provide an adequate procedure for the removal of an elected officer guilty of serious misconduct, such officer may be removed for cause shown and after notice and hearing by the members in good standing voting in a secret ballot conducted by the officers of such labor organization in accordance with its constitution and bylaws insofar as they are not inconsistent with the provisions of this title.

(h) The Secretary shall promulgate rules and regulations prescribing minimum standards and procedures for determining the adequacy of the removal procedures to which reference is made in subsection (g).

SEC. 302. (a) A member of a labor organization—

(1) who has exhausted the remedies available under the constitution and bylaws of such organization and of any parent body, or

(2) who has invoked such available remedies without obtaining a final decision within three calendar months after their invocation, may file a complaint with the Secretary of Labor within one calendar month thereafter alleging the violation of any provision of section 301 (including violation of the constitution and by laws of the labor organization pertaining to the election and removal of officers). The challenged election shall be presumed valid pending a final decision thereon (as hereinafter provided) and in the interim the affairs of the organization shall be conducted by the officers elected or in such other manner as its constitution and bylaws may provide.

(b) The Secretary shall investigate such complaint and, if he finds probable cause to believe that a violation of this title has occurred and has not been remedied, he shall, within sixty days after the filing of such complaint, bring a civil action against the labor organization as an entity in the district court of the United States in which such labor organization maintains its principal office to set aside the invalid election, if any, and to direct the conduct of an election or hearing and vote upon the removal of officers under the supervision of the Secretary and in accordance with the provisions of this title and such rules and regulations as the Secretary may prescribe. The service of summons, subpena or other legal process of a court of the United States upon an officer or agent of a labor organization in his capacity as such shall constitute service upon the labor organization. The court shall have power to take such action as it deems proper to preserve the assets of the labor organization.

(c) If, upon a preponderance of the evidence after a trial upon the merits, the court finds—

(1) that an election has not been held within the time prescribed by section 301, or

(2) that the violation of section 301 may have affected the outcome of an election, the court shall declare the election, if any, to be void and direct the conduct of a new election under supervision of the Secretary and, so far as lawful and practicable, in conformity with the constitution and bylaws of the labor organization. The Secretary shall promptly certify to the court the names of the persons elected and the court shall thereupon enter a decree declaring such persons to be the officers of the labor organization. If the proceeding is for the removal of officers pursuant to subsection (g) of section 301, the Secretary shall certify the results of the vote and the court shall enter a decree declaring whether such persons have been removed as officers of the labor organization.

(d) An order directing an election, dismissing a complaint, or designating elected officers of a labor organization shall be appealable in the same manner as the final judgment in a civil action, but an order directing an election shall not be stayed pending appeal.

SEC. 303. No labor organization subject to the provisions of this title shall be required by law to conduct elections of officers with greater frequency or in a different form or manner than is required by its own constitution or bylaws except as otherwise provided by this title. Existing rights and remedies to enforce the constitution and bylaws of a labor organization with respect to elections prior to the conduct thereof shall not be affected by the provisions of this title. The remedy provided by this title for challenging an election already conducted shall be exclusive.

SEC. 304. The provisions of this title shall become applicable—

(1) ninety days after the date of enactment of this Act in the case of a labor organization whose constitution and bylaws can lawfully be modified or amended by action of its constitutional officers or governing body, or

(2) where such modification can only be made by a constitutional convention of the labor organization, not later than the next constitutional convention of such labor organization after the date of enactment of this Act, or two years after such date, whichever is sooner. If no such convention is held within such two-year period, the executive board or other governing body empowered to act for such labor organization between conventions is empowered to make such interim constitutional changes as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

SEC. 305. (a) No person shall serve as an officer, director, trustee, member of any executive board or similar governing body, business agent, manager, organizer, or other employee of a labor organization (other than an employee performing exclusively clerical or custodial duties) engaged in an industry affecting commerce, if within five years preceding such service he served any part of a prison term resulting from his having been convicted of: robbery, bribery, extortion, embezzlement, grand larceny, burglary, arson, violation of narcotics law, murder, rape, assault with intent to kill, or assault with intent to inflict grievous bodily injury, or conspiracy to commit any of such crimes, unless his citizenship rights, having been revoked as a result of such conviction, have been fully restored, or unless the Secretary determines that such person's service in such capacity would not be contrary to the purposes of this Act. Prior to making such a determination the Secretary shall hold an administrative hearing and shall give notice of such proceeding by certified mail to the State, county, and Federal prosecuting officials in the jurisdiction or jurisdictions in which such person was convicted. The Secretary's determination in any such proceeding shall be final.

(b) No person who, after a hearing on a written record, is determined by the Secretary to have failed to file any information required by title I or title II, after written notice by the Secretary directing him to file and no person who has been convicted of any violation of title I or title II shall serve as an officer, director, trustee, member of any executive board or similar governing body, business agent, international representative, manager, paid organizer, or other paid employee of a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce for a period of five years after such determination by the Secretary or such conviction. No labor organization or officer thereof shall knowingly permit any person to assume or hold any office or paid position in violation of this subsection.

(c) Any person who violates this section shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

(d) For the purposes of this section any person shall be deemed to have been "convicted" and under the disability of "conviction" from the date of the judgment of the trial court or the date of the final sustaining of such judgment on appeal, whichever is the later event.

TITLE IV—CODES OF ETHICAL PRACTICES

SEC. 401. (a) The Congress hereby declares that it is in the national interest that—

(1) national and international labor organizations and nationwide and industry-wide associations of employers engaged in industries affecting commerce shall voluntarily adopt or subscribe to codes of ethical practices obligating such labor organizations or employers, as the case may be, to adhere to principles and procedures which, with due regard to their traditions and background and their customary forms and procedures, will effectively eliminate and prevent improper and unethical activities in the administration of their affairs, in the use and expenditure of their funds, and in their relations with each other;

(2) codes of ethical practices for the administration of the affairs and the use and expenditure of the funds of a national or international labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall contain provisions to safeguard the democratic rights and privileges of members and to eliminate and prevent improper and unethical activities on the part of labor organizations or their subordinate bodies or organizations, or any officer or representative thereof, and measures and procedures to assure effective implementation and enforcement of such provisions;

(3) codes of ethical practices for the conduct of the business and the use and expenditure of funds of an employer engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall contain provisions to promote harmonious relationships between such employer and labor organizations which represent or seek to represent such employer's employees and to eliminate and prevent improper and unethical activities by the employer, or any officer or representative thereof in derogation of the rights of employees under section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, or the Railway Labor Act, as amended, and measures and procedures to assure effective implemention and enforcement of said provisions; and

(4) codes of ethical practices shall contain appropriate provisions for the publishing of the provisions thereof to employers and employees in the industry affected and to the public.

(b) Codes of ethical practices shall not authorize or sanction any conduct on the part of labor organizations or employers, or officers or representatives thereof, which violates any Federal, State, or local law.

SEC. 402. (a) There is hereby established an Advisory Committee on Ethical Practices (hereinafter referred to as the "Committee") to advise the Secretary in the administration of this Act.

(b) The Committee shall be composed of fifteen members appointed by the Secretary, of whom five shall be chosen from a panel nominated by national or international labor organizations, which are affected and by national federations of labor organizations, five shall be chosen from a panel nominated by employer associations industrywide or national in scope, and five shall represent the public. Three members shall be appointed for a term of one year, three members for a term of two years, three members for a term of three years, three members for a term of four years, and three members for a term of five years, and thereafter appointment shall be for a term of five years, except that members appointed to fill vacancies occurring prior to the expiration of the terms of their predecessors shall be appointed only for the remainder of such terms. The terms of office of not more than one member representing labor organizations, one member representing employer associations, and one member representing the public shall terminate in any one year. The Committee shall meet at the request of the Secretary, but in any case not less frequently than four times each year, and whenever at least one-third of the members request a meeting. The members of the Committee shall receive compensation while attending meetings and performing work of the Committee at the rate of $50 a day, and shall receive necessary travel and other expenses incurred in connection with the work of the Committee.

(c) The Secretary shall provide such data and information, clerical assistance and other services and facilities as may be necessary for the Committee.

SEC. 403. The Secretary shall report to Congress not later than three years from the date of enactment of this Act on the progress achieved by labor organiaztions and employers in the elimination, through the voluntary adoption of self-policing codes of ethical practices, of improper activities in the administration of their affairs and the use and expenditure of their funds and shall include in such report such recommendations as he deems appropriate, based upon the experience of labor organizations and employers in adopting and implementing codes of ethical practices, pursuant to this title. The Secretary is authorized to file interim reports on these matters as part of his annual reports to Congress, pursuant to the provisions of section 9 of the Act entitled "An Act to create a Department of Labor", approved March 4, 1913 (5 U.S.C. 620).

TITLE V—DEFINITIONS AND MISCELLANEOUS

SEC. 501. As used in titles I (except section 111), II, III, IV, and V of this Act—

(a) "Commerce" means trade, traffic, commerce, transportation, transmission, or communication among the several States or between any State and any place outside thereof. For the purposes of this subsection, "State" includes any State of the United States, the District of Columbia, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, Guam, Wake Island, the Canal Zone, and Outer Continental Shelf lands defined in the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act (ch. 345, 67 Stat. 462).

(b) An activity or industry "affecting commerce" means any activity or industry in commerce or in which a labor dispute would hinder or obstruct commerce or the free flow of commerce, and includes any activity or industry "affecting commerce" within the meaning of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, as amended, or the Railway Labor Act, as amended, except as hereafter provided.

(c) "Person" includes one or more individuals, labor organizations, partnerships, associations, corporations, legal representatives, mutual companies, joint-stock companies, trusts, unincorporated organizations, trustees, trustees in bankruptcy, or receivers.

(d) "Employer" means any employer or any group or association of employers which is an employer within the meaning of any law of the United States relating to the employment of any employees or which may deal with any labor organization concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work, and includes any person acting directly as an employer or indirectly as an agent of an employer in relation to an employee but does not include the United States or any corporation wholly owned by the Government of the United States or any State or political subdivision thereof.

(e) "Employee" means any individual employed by an employer, and includes any individual whose work has ceased as a consequence of, or in connection with, any current labor dispute or because of any unfair labor practice.

(f) "Labor dispute" includes any controversy concerning terms, tenure, or conditions of employment, or concerning the association or representation of persons in negotiating, fixing, maintaining, changing, or seeking to arrange terms or conditions of employment, regardless of whether the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee.

(g) "Trusteeship" means any receivership, trusteeship, or other method of supervision or control whereby a labor organization suspends the autonomy otherwise available to a subordinate body under its constitution or bylaws.

(h) "Labor organization" means any organization of any kind, any agency, or employee representation committee, group, association, or plan, in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours, or other terms or conditions of employment.

(i) "Labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce" includes a labor organization which—

(1) is the certified representative of employees under the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, or the Railway Labor Act, as amended; or

(2) although not certified, is recognized or acting as the representative of employees of any employer or employers engaged in an industry, business, or activity affecting commerce; or

(3) has chartered a local labor organization or subsidiary body which is representing or actively seeking to represent employees of employers within the meaning of paragraphs (1) or (2); or

(4) has been chartered by a labor organization representing or actively seeking to represent employees within the meaning of paragraphs (1) or (2) as the local or subordinate body through which such employees may enjoy membership or become affiliated with such labor organization; or

(5) is a conference, joint board, joint council, or other association or aggregation of labor organizations, as heretofore defined, subordinate to a national or international labor organization other than a State or local central body.

(j) "Secret ballot" means any secret written, referendum, or voting machine ballot.

SEC. 502. Nothing contained in titles I, II, III, IV, or V of this Act shall be construed to supersede or impair or otherwise affect the provisions of the Railway Labor Act, as amended, or any of the obligations, rights, benefits, privileges, or immunities of any carrier, employee, organization, representative, or person subject thereto; nor shall anything contained in said titles of this Act be construed to confer any rights, privileges, immunities, or defenses upon employers, or to impair or otherwise affect the rights of any person under the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

SEC. 503. For the purpose of any investigation provided for in this Act, the provisions of sections 9 and 10 (relating to the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents) of the Federal Trade Commission Act of September 16, 1914, as amended (15 U.S.C. 49, 50), are hereby made applicable to the jurisdiction, powers, and duties of the Secretary of Labor or any officers designated by him.

SEC. 504. In order to avoid unnecessary expense and duplication of functions among Government agencies, the Secretary may make such arrangements or agreements for cooperation or mutual assistance in the performance of his functions under this Act and the functions of any such agency as he may find to be practicable and consistent with law. The Secretary may utilize the facilities or services of any department, agency, or establishment of the United States or of any State or political subdivision of a State, including the services of any of its employees, with the lawful consent of such department, agency, or establishment; and each department, agency, or establishment of the United States is authorized and directed to cooperate with the Secretary and, to the extent permitted by law, to provide such information and facilities as he may request for his assistance in the performance of his functions under this Act. The Attorney General or his representative shall receive from the Secretary for appropriate action such evidence developed in the performance of his functions under this Act as may be found to warrant consideration for criminal prosecution under the provisions of this Act or other Federal law, and the Secretary may refer to any governmental agency any evidence obtained by him which may tend to show violation of a statute administered by that agency.

SEC. 505. The provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act shall be applicable to the issuance, amendment, or rescission of any rules or regulations authorized or required pursuant to the provisions of this Act.

SEC. 506. (a) It shall be unlawful for any labor organization, its officers, agents, representatives, or employees, to fine, suspend, expel, or otherwise discipline any of its members for exercising any right to which he is entitled under the provisions of this Act.

(b) It shall be unlawful for any person through the use of force or violence, or threat of the use of force or violence, or by economic reprisal or threat thereof, to restrain, coerce, or intimidate, or attempt to restrain, coerce, or intimidate any member of a labor organization for the purpose of interfering with or preventing the exercising by such member of any right to which he is entitled under the provisions of this Act.

(c) Any person who shall willfully violate the provisions of this section, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

SEC. 507. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to impair or diminish the authority of any State, as that term is used in section 501(a), to enact or enforce its own criminal laws.

SEC. 508. Every labor organization required to comply with the provisions of this Act shall inform all of its members concerning the provisions of the Act and the rights guaranteed members thereunder in a manner prescribed by the Secretary.

SEC. 509. If any provision of this Act, or the application of such provision to any person or circumstances, shall be held invalid, the remainder of this Act or the application of such provision to persons or circumstances, other than those as to which it is held invalid, shall not be affected thereby.

TITLE VI—AMENDMENTS TO THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT OF 1947, AS AMENDED

SEC. 601. (a) Section 14 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by adding the following:

"(c)(1) The National Labor Relations Board shall assert, either directly or as hereinafter provided by this subsection, jurisdiction over all cases to which this Act applies. The Board may enter into an agreement with any agency of any State which is authorized by the law of such State to enter into and carry out such agreement whereby such agency is designated as the agent of the Board for the purpose of the exercise of jurisdiction within such State over classes of cases which are within the jurisdiction of the Board but with respect to which the Board finds that, because such classes of cases are essentially local in character, the impact thereof on commerce is not significant. Any such agreement shall (A) provide for the delegation by the Board to the State agency of such of the powers and duties of the Board as may be necessary or appropriate to enable the State agency to exercise such jurisdiction, (B) require that, in exercising such jurisdiction, the State agency shall apply and enforce the provisions of this Act as interpreted by the Federal courts and the Board, and (C) provide that such agreement may be suspended or terminated by the Board at any time if the Board finds that there has been a failure on the part of the State agency to comply with the provisions of such agreement or with regulations promulgated by the Board with respect to the carrying out of such agreement. The processes and orders issued by any such State agency in the exercise of such jurisdiction shall be enforced by the Board, and shall be reviewable, in the Federal courts and in the same manner and to the same extent as are the processes and orders of the Board. Whenever a State agency shall refuse to issue a complaint under section 10(b) or refuse to proceed with a petition filed pursuant to section 9(c), the party requesting the issuance of such complaint or filing such petition may, within such time and in such manner as the Board may by regulations prescribe, appeal the action of such State agency to the Board, and the State agency shall dispose of the matter in accordance with the decision of the Board upon such appeal. No State agency shall petition any district court of the United States for temporary relief or for a restraining order in any case without first having obtained the consent of the Board. In giving such consent the Board shall be guided by the same criteria as are applied in similar cases adjudicated by the Board itself. As used in this subsection, the term 'State' includes 'Puerto Rico' and the 'Virgin Islands'. With the consent and cooperation of those agencies charged with the administration of the Act the National Labor Relations Board may, notwithstanding any other provision of law, reimburse such agencies and their employees for services rendered for such purposes.

"(2) Nothing contained in sections 3, 4, 5, and 6 of this Act shall be construed to apply to any State agency with which the Board has entered into an agreement under this subsection."

(b) Section 10(a) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by repealing the proviso thereto.

SEC. 602. (a) After section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, insert the following new subsection:

"(e) It shall not be an unfair labor practice under subsections (a) and (b) of this section for an employer engaged primarily in the building and construction industry to make an agreement covering employees engaged (or who, upon their employment, will be engaged) in the building and construction industry with a labor organization of which building and construction employees are members (not established, maintained, or assisted by any action defined in section 8(a) of this Act as an unfair labor practice) because (1) the majority status of such labor organization has not been established under the provisions of section 9 of this Act prior to the making of such agreement, or (2) such agreement requires as a condition of employment, membership in such labor organization after the seventh day following the beginning of such employment or the effective date of the agreement, whichever is later, or (3) such agreement requires the employer to notify such labor organization of opportunities for employment with such employer, or gives such labor organization an opportunity to refer qualified applicants for such employment, or (4) such agreement specifies minimum training or experience qualifications for employment or provides for priority in opportunities for employment based upon length of service with such employer, in the industry or in the particular geographical area: Provided, That nothing in this subsection shall set aside the final proviso to section 8(a)(3) of this Act: Provided further, That any agreement which is valid solely by reason of clause (1) of this subsection, shall not be a bar to a petition filed pursuant to section 9(c) or 9(e)."

(b) Nothing contained in the amendment made by subsection (a) shall be construed as authorizing the execution or application of agreements requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment in any State or Territory in which such execution or application is prohibited by State or Territorial law.

SEC. 603. Section 9(c)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the second sentence thereof.

SEC. 604. Section 2(11) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by adding a proviso at the end thereof, as follows: ": Provided, That this term shall not be construed to include service assistants in the communications industry."

SEC. 605. Paragraph (4) of subsection 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(4) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection, the Board through its designated representative, if there is reasonable cause to believe that a question of representation affecting commerce exists, may call an informal conference of the parties upon due notice. If at such conference no agreement is reached for a consent election, and there are no substantial issues of fact or law which should be resolved by a preelection hearing, the Board, through its designated representative, may conduct an election in an appropriate unit but not before the expiration of thirty days following the date of the petition. Any party aggrieved by such proceeding may file a motion for hearing with the Board, but such motion shall not, unless specifically ordered by the Board, operate as a stay of the election. Unless such motion is granted prior to the election or is withdrawn, the Board shall afford the moving party an opportunity for hearing prior to certifying the results of such election."

SEC. 606. Section 3(d) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by adding after the period at the end thereof the following: "In case of a vacancy in the office of the General Counsel the President is authorized to designate the officer or employee who shall act as General Counsel during such vacancy, but no person or persons so designated shall so act (i) for more than forty days when the Congress is in session unless a nomination to fill such vacancy shall have been submitted to the Senate, or (ii) after the adjournment sine die of the session of the Senate in which such nomination was submitted."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill as amended will be regarded as the original text for the purposes of amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I did not hear the statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendments have been agreed to; and, without objection, the bill as amended will be regarded as the original text for the purpose of amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is fine.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment which I have sent to the desk be made the pending question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that unanimous consent is not now required.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Unanimous consent is not now required, but the Senator is asking that the amendment be made the pending question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out title VI, which begins on line 14 on page 54 and ends on line 25 on page 59.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN].

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Chair.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today we begin debate on S. 1555.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the morning hour on Monday the time on the pending amendment be limited to 3 hours, to be controlled, respectively, by the Senator from North Carolina, proponent of the amendment, and by the majority leader, opponent of the amendment; and that it be understood there be no vote until after the morning hour on Tuesday.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my friend from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator said "3 hours." Does the Senator not mean 3 hours to each side?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Three hours to each side. Three hours to be controlled by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] and 3 hours to be controlled by the majority leader, with the understanding there will be no vote until Tuesday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous consent request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I wish to address a question to the majority leader.

It is my understanding, as a practical matter, that the remainder of the week will be devoted to debate, that there will be no votes of any kind on the bill this week, and that the first vote will be on the Ervin amendment to strike title VI, which vote will be taken on Tuesday. There is to be allotted 3 hours to a side, or a total of 6 hours, beginning after the morning hour on Monday.

Mr. GOLDWATER. On Tuesday.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Beginning after the morning hour on Monday.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. There would be no vote until Tuesday. The Senator is eminently correct. Monday, following the morning hour, the time limitation will take effect. At that time we will begin using the six hours of debate, but obviously we will recess early enough so as not to consume all of the six hours, so that we will have the vote Tuesday following the morning hour.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the only thing the Senator from Arizona is concerned about is that he was the only person on the floor earlier today who was conversant with this subject, and he told a number of Senators on both sides of the aisle that he could visualize no possibility of any vote being taken on Monday.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No vote will be had on that day.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I might have made a false statement to some Senators who wanted to speak on the pending amendment, and who may find themselves coming back to the Senate Tuesday without time to speak on the amendment. I cannot recall, off hand, any Senator who might be interested, nor can I think of anyone at the moment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Why do we not reserve a part of the time until Tuesday—say, at least one hour—to take care of any contingencies such as the Senator mentions.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That would be agreeable, because I do not want to be placed in a position of having made a false statement to any colleague whom I told in perfect honesty there would be no vote until Tuesday.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am very anxious to follow the suggestion of the Senator, and I assure the Senator that I will move to recess the Senate Monday in ample time to have at least one hour minimum, and perhaps more, to be used on Tuesday.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. In the event that additional time is needed, if I understand the parliamentary situation correctly, on Tuesday the pending amendment would be subject to an amendment, as to which there would be no limitation of debate, unless this unanimous-consent agreement is modified.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think we got an agreement to vote on the Ervin amendment, and that would include all amendments thereto.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. It might have been intended to get such an agreement, but I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. As the unanimous-consent agreement was agreed to, did it include any amendments to the amendment, or would any amendments be in order with no limitation of debate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The agreement on which unanimous consent was obtained makes no reference to amendments.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Therefore, an amendment offered to the amendment would be subject to unlimited debate; is that correct?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That would vitiate the whole agreement.

Mr. MUNDT. May I suggest, Mr. President, that the majority leader modify his unanimous-consent request so as to include this type of circumstance.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I was going to suggest that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I give the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] my assurance that he will have a minimum of 1 hour, or more if he desires, on Tuesday, because I will move to recess early enough Monday for that to be done.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I merely want to protect the Senators whom I told in all honesty I did not think we would take any action on Monday.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understand.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the morning hour on Monday there be 3 hours allotted to the proponents and 3 hours to the opponents of the Ervin amendment, and that at the conclusion of 6 hours a vote be taken on the Ervin amendment and any amendments thereto, with the further understanding that there will be no yea and nay votes until after the morning hour on Tuesday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the conclusion of the morning hour, or morning business?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. After morning business on Tuesday.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I have no intention of offering any amendment to the Ervin amendment, but in the event that such an amendment should be offered, it seems to me there should be at least 10 minutes on a side for discussion of the amendment to the amendment. We should not be caught at the last minute if an amendment were offered to the Ervin amendment without opportunity for a brief explanation. I do not contemplate offering any such amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from North Carolina thought 30 minutes on his amendment would be sufficient. We have arranged for 6 hours, 3 hours to a side, and to have no vote until Tuesday. I believe we have allowed ample leeway. What we are trying to do is to indicate to Senators when we anticipate the first vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I am entirely in agreement with what the Senator is trying to do. I have no intention of offering an amendment to the Ervin amendment, but I believe, for the sake of orderly procedure, it would be well, in the event such an amendment were offered, not to preclude the opportunity to make a brief explanation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In that event I shall be glad to ask unanimous consent to allow whatever time is necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, in order that we may thoroughly understand the unanimous consent agreement, 3 hours to a side have been allotted. I have assured Senators that I shall move that the Senate take a recess early enough on Monday so that there will be at least an hour left on Tuesday. There will not be a yea-and-nay vote until after morning business is concluded on Tuesday.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the Ervin amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the majority leader. I should like to know whether or not, under the circumstances, a Saturday session is contemplated.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Not unless some Senator desires to speak on Saturday. If he does, there will be a Saturday session. Otherwise, the Senate will recess or adjourn on Friday evening.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I thank the majority leader.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today, it stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today we begin debate on S. 1555, the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959. Before we proceed to a discussion of the provisions of this bill and to a debate on its merits, I would like to review very briefly for the Senate the background of this measure.

More than 2 years ago, the Senate by resolution established a bipartisan select committee to look into improper activities in the labor or management field. The select committee—popularly known as the McClellan committee—was established because of recurring reports of abuses of power on the part of both labor and management to the detriment of the welfare of employees, employers, and the public. For more than 2 years now, under the able leadership of the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], this committee has looked into various situations which have been brought to its attention in an effort to spotlight problems requiring legislative action. It scarcely needs to be said that the Congress and the American people owe a deep debt of gratitude to Senator MCCLELLAN, the other members of his committee, and his staff for the workmanlike job which they have done over these past 2 years.

In addition to the work done by the select committee, the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, in the 85th Congress and again this year, has devoted many weeks hearing testimony on various legislative proposals which have been offered to eliminate some of the abuses which have been disclosed during the hearings of the McClellan committee. Many of the Nation's most qualified and objective experts in this field have devoted considerable time without compensation advising me and other members of the committee in this extremely complex field.

During the hearings last year, the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare took over 1,500 pages of testimony and heard many witnesses who addressed themselves to the bills which were pending at that time. Again this year, between January and the early part of March, the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare heard witnesses whose testimony covers over 815 pages. Between this and the previous session of Congress, every effort has been made to perfect legislative proposals pursuant to suggestions which were made by labor, management and the public. And so we finally come to the floor of the Senate with a bill which I believe by any test deserves to be called a comprehensive, strong, and effective measure to stamp out the abuses disclosed by the McClellan committee. The bill which is before us has received more extensive and concentrated attention by a larger number of people than any recent legislative proposal with which I am familiar. It has been subjected to critical scrutiny both within the Government and without. It has been criticized by those who are friendly to labor and those who are not friendly to it. It has been examined carefully by those who have a direct stake in it and by many who have no interest except the preservation of the common good.

It represents, it should be recalled, a bill which was:

First. Originally drafted by two members of the McClellan committee in 1958 to carry out its report—former Senator Ives, Republican of New York, and myself;

Second. Then modified by the amendments of the Senate Labor Committee, after exhaustive hearings;

Third. Further improved by amendments on the Senate floor last year, where it passed the Senate by a vote of 88 to 1;

Fourth. Still further improved by redrafting prior to its reintroduction this year, with the cosponsorship of two other members of the McClellan committee, Senators ERVIN and CHURCH, along with other Senators; and Fifth. Finally, following further hearings, perfected still further by 46 amendments adopted in the careful line-by-line deliberations of the Senate Labor Committee, which reported the final version to this body by a vote of 13 to 2, Republican Senators JAVITS and COOPER being added as cosponsors.

In short, Mr. President, the bill which is before the Senate today is a most carefully drafted and effective piece of legislation. It is a bipartisan bill on a nonpartisan subject. It covers all of the outstanding recommendations of the McClellan committee including provisions to insure full reporting of union financial and administrative practices, standards and procedures for the conduct of secret union elections, standards, and procedures for the imposition of trusteeships upon subordinate bodies by national or international unions, controls on the activity of management middlemen and provisions to eliminate the no man's land in labor-management relations. I should like to call attention at this point to a 45-item summary of the provisions of this bill which appears in the committee report beginning on page 1 and I ask unanimous consent that this summary be reprinted in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the summary may be printed in the RECORD, as requested.

Mr. KENNEDY. In its present form, as reported by the committee, this bill represents a sound basis for obtaining effective labor reform legislation this year. In its present form, it is capable of receiving the support of members of both Houses from both parties, the administration and the responsible leaders of both labor and management. In its present form, this bill can and should become law in 1959—and the Jimmy Hoffas and their ilk will be on their way out.

But if we embark upon a series of amendments—some wanting to change this provision, some another, some feeling that it is too soft and some that it is too tough, some wanting more Taft-Hartley amendments added and some wanting more of them deleted—once we begin on that course, there is no certainty as to where we will emerge, no certainty that we will still have a broadly acceptable, workable bill, and no certainty that we will in the end have any bill at all that will become law in 1959.

I respect the sincere concern of those who seek further amendments, additions or deletions. This is a subject matter on which every Senator is bound to have his own ideas, his own favorite amendments and his own approach to the problem. But this measure has been carefully worked out, drafted and redrafted a hundred times by those closest to the problem. Whatever complaints may be raised, whatever imperfections may occur to some, we know that this bill will do the job. I say let us pass this bill and do that job—or stand in danger of letting it go undone for another critical year, or in fact, forever, because this represents our last opportunity to secure passage of an effective labor reform bill.

The most fertile field for amendment—by way of either addition or deletion—is, of course, the Taft-Hartley Act. The most difficult decision facing the committee in its deliberations was where to draw the line between those Taft-Hartley amendments which could properly be included in this bill, and those Taft-Hartley amendments which should properly await the recommendations of our panel of 12 experts established for this very purpose. Some of the Taft-Hartley amendments considered were directly related to racketeering, some only indirectly or not at all. Some were extremely controversial and threatened to bog down the entire bill—others were not controversial at all. Some were approved by the Senate last year—others were new, and more likely to delay action on the bill. Taking into consideration these factors, the requests of the administration and the testimony of expert witnesses and spokesmen for labor and management, the committee proceeded to draw this line—and, in my opinion, drew it wisely and well. I earnestly urge the Senate to support the committee in its determination as to where the line should be drawn. The alternative, in my opinion, could lead to chaos, confusion, and finally no bill at all.

No one who examines S. 1555 can doubt that the measure before us is a strong and effective deterrent to the abuses perpetrated by a relatively few in labor and management. All can agree that the standards prescribed by this bill will lead to more democratic and honest procedures in all trade unions and will create an atmosphere for harmonious labor-management relations. The provisions of this bill insure, as far as it is possible to do so by statute, that the internal affairs of unions and management are conducted honestly and that criminals and racketeers will be denied positions of power and trust in trade unions.

As I see it, the solution of our problems in the labor-management area has three distinct facets.

First. There is the problem of more effective enforcement of criminal law at the local and State level. Scarcely a single abuse in the labor or management field has come to the attention of the McClellan committee which did not have associated with it some violations of the criminal law. The crimes of violence, arson, assault, and so forth with which we are all familiar, are essentially problems of enforcement of criminal laws at the local level. Correction of this kind of activity is and should remain a function of police authorities at the local and State level. I do not believe, and I think this opinion is shared by my colleagues in the Senate, that the Federal Government should get into the business of exercising the police power which has traditionally and properly been the function of local authority. I regret to say that in many cases local police officials and law-enforcement authorities have not been as diligent as they might have been in apprehending and punishing those who have committed barbarous, antisocial acts. Society cannot tolerate the continued use of violence and force in labor-management relations. Therefore, I submit that State and local law enforcement authorities have a duty to step up the prosecution of those who in the name of trade unionism indulge in the most heinous criminal activity.

The second aspect of labor-management abuse which can be distinguished is the area of labor-management relations which is regulated basically by the National Labor Relations Act and the Railway Labor Act. Both of these statutes prescribe certain standards and procedures for the resolution of disputes between labor and management. The National Labor Relations Act which is our basic statute regulating labor-management relations has not been changed in any significant degree since its passage more than 12 years ago. Certainly any legislation of this type after 12 years needs to be revised in the light of changing conditions. In recognition of this fact and the many abortive attempts which have been made by the Congress to legislate in this complex area in the last decade, the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare has established an advisory panel of distinguished experts in the labor law field to advise it concerning appropriate revisions in the statute. This advisory panel has been working assiduously since its appointment early in February at its task of making suggested revisions in the act. I might say at this point that the Senate and the people of the United States owe a debt of gratitude to the men who are serving on this panel for the diligent effort which they have put into developing recommendations for the Senate Labor Committee. I am confident that based upon their recommendations, the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare will be able to report legislation to the Senate which will correct defects in the Taft-Hartley Act, but I emphasize that revisions in the Taft-Hartley Act are but one aspect of the problem of labor-management abuse.

S. 1555 contains six amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act. With but one exception these changes in the act have been recommended by the administration and were debated on the floor of the Senate last year. Each represents a modification of the act upon which there is broad consensus. None would radically affect the balance between labor and management.

These amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act either, first, modify the law to adjust it to existing and long established practice—as for example the building trades amendment; second, are responsive to the recommendations of the McClellan committee, the no man's land amendment, section 602, or third, make it possible to administer the act more easily—the Acting General Counsel amendment and the prehearing election amendment.

All of these amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act are necessary; all will contribute to more effective and expeditious handling of labor disputes and will contribute to industrial stability.

Because the prehearing election issue precipitated sharp debate in the Senate last year, I would like to point out that the amendment in S. 1555 dealing with this problem is entirely new. It was worked out very carefully with management and labor attorneys and after careful and painstaking debate in the committee was put into the bill by a unanimous vote.

As it stands in the bill now this provision would permit a representation election 30 days after a petition is filed by either management or labor if there are no substantial issues of fact or law which require a hearing by the NLRB. The full rights of all parties to due process are protected and even after an election is held a full hearing may be had before the Board on any unresolved issues. The 30-day waiting period is an additional safeguard against rushing employees into an election where they are unfamiliar with the issues.

All of the other provisions of title VI are fully discussed in the analysis which I will insert in the RECORD at the close of these remarks and are treated in the committee report. I single out this amendment because of the interest which the Senate showed in it last year and because I believe it typical of the salutary changes which have been made in this legislation since it was debated here last year.

The third front on which an attack can and should be made on abuses in the labor-management field is that which is treated in the bill before us. This bill deals essentially with the internal problems of trade unions and with the correction of certain abuses within management. It is not a bill dealing with labor-management relations per se which are governed by the National Labor Relations Act—the Taft-Hartley Act, although as I have pointed out above there are some Taft-Hartley amendments in it. It is essential in my view to draw this distinction. Long and critical study of this measure has been given by the Senate Labor Committee. The committee spent over 3 weeks in reviewing line by line the bill before us. Over 150 amendments were considered by the committee during this time. Some 46 of them were accepted and in most cases the amendments which were adopted strengthened the bill in some particular or another. After this careful consideration the bill was reported by a bipartisan 13 to 2 vote.

Finally, Mr. President, as we begin debate on this bill I want to remind the Senate of the history of legislation in the labor-management field. There has scarcely been a session of Congress in the last decade that there have not been proposals to correct abuses in the labor or management fields. Voluminous hearings have been compiled and extensive debates have been held, all to no avail. Why? Primarily because short-sighted persons on both sides of the issue have not been satisfied with making measurable progress—have not been content with taking major steps forward. In many cases, if their special interests or problems were not treated in exactly the way they wanted—they killed perfectly sound legislation. This can happen to this bill. I sincerely hope that it will not, for I believe that we owe it to working men and women and the public at large to enact a strong internal reform bill. If we load it down with ill-considered amendments, hastily devised on the floor of the Senate we run a grave risk of scuttling this bill. This would be a tragedy as the New York Times noted in an editorial on April 10.

But the public interest, and labor's too, clearly calls for the passage of S. 1555. Its defeat would set labor reform back on its heels in the present session of Congress. It would be a calamity for the Senate to turn it down merely because it doesn't go far enough.

I ask unanimous consent that this entire editorial be reprinted in the RECORD following these remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the editorial may be printed in the RECORD as requested.

Mr. KENNEDY. We have a sound and effective bill in S. 1555. I believe that the debate which will follow will demonstrate this fact beyond any shadow of a doubt.

The spotlight of public opinion shines brightly on us. The alternatives are clear. Either we move forward and act on the labor-management reform bill, S. 1555, thereby taking a major step forward in the eradication of corruption and racketeering in labor and management. Or we embark on a spree of attaching unworkable and unwise amendments onto a sound bill. The latter course can only result in dismal failure and the frustration of the hopes and desires of millions of our fellow citizens.

I am confident that the Senate will pursue the former course.

Mr. President, in order that the Members of the Senate may be fully informed as to the content of this measure, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the body of the RECORD at this point a detailed, section-by-section analysis of the pending measure, S. 1555.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF THE BILL

Section 1: Contains the short title of the bill: "Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959."

Section 2: Contains the congressional findings, purposes, and policy.

TITLE I. REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE

Section 101(a): Requires every labor organization engaged in an industry affecting interstate commerce to file with the Secretary of Labor a copy of its constitution and bylaws and a report containing specified information with respect to its name and address, names and titles of its constitutional officers, initiation fees and dues, and internal procedures. Both the constitution and bylaws and the report must be signed by the organization's president and treasurer or corresponding principal officers. Any changes in this information occurring during a year are to be reported at the time the organization files its next annual financial report with the Secretary.

Section 101(b): Requires every labor organization engaged in an industry affecting interstate commerce to file annually with the Secretary a comprehensive and detailed report of the union's financial operations. This report must be signed by the organization's president and treasurer or corresponding principal officers.

Under section 9 (f) and (g) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, reports on their internal procedures and financial transactions are required only of unions that desire to use the processes of the National Labor Relations Board. Under section 101 of the committee bill, unions that represent, seek to represent, charter subordinate bodies to represent, or are chartered by a union that represents or seeks to represent, or otherwise engage in collective bargaining on behalf of, employees of employers engaged in an industry affecting interstate commerce must file reports, regardless of whether or not they desire to utilize the processes of the Board. The information to be reported under the committee bill comprehends all the information required to be reported under present law. The committee bill, in addition, requires certain information to be reported that does not have to be specifically detailed under present law.

For example, under section 101(a), unions must report procedures followed with respect to discipline or removal of officers, and provisions made for notice, hearings, judgment on the evidence and appeal procedures in cases involving imposition of fines, suspensions, or expulsion of members. Under section 101(b), the salary, allowance and other direct or indirect disbursements, including reimbursed expenses, paid to every officer and to every employee who received more than $10,000 in the aggregate during the year from the union and any other body affiliated with the same international union must be listed. Loans aggregating in excess of $250 made to union officers, employees, or members, as well as loans in any amount made to business enterprises, must also be listed.

The committee bill gives the Secretary of Labor authority to prescribe the categories in which the financial information required by section 101(b) shall be reported.

Section 101(c): Provides that unions required to file reports under the bill shall make available the information required to be contained in such reports to all their members. The Secretary of Labor is given authority to issue regulations prescribing the form and manner in which this obligation shall be carried out.

Section 101(d): Authorizes the Secretary of Labor to exempt any labor union or class thereof from the financial reporting requirements of section 101(b) (but not from the obligation to file reports on their internal procedures contained in sec. 101(a)), if he finds that the exemption of such union or class thereof would not interfere with the attainment of the objectives of the bill. The committee's purpose in including this provision in the bill is to provide a means of easing the financial and administrative burdens of compliance in small unions and to concentrate attention on unions with significant funds. To be exempted a union must (1) have fewer than 200 members and (2) have gross annual receipts of less than $20,000. For purposes of the second of these two tests, dues, per capita taxes, and other sums to be paid over to a parent or affiliated organization are specifically included as part of the union's gross receipts. The test of inclusion is whether local officers or employees receive the funds. Payments from an employer directly to a separate welfare or pension fund under section 302(c) (5) or (6) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended, are specifically excluded.

Section 101(e): Repeals sections 9 (f) and (g) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. Under the committee bill, compliance by unions with the reporting requirements of the bill is enforced by criminal penalties, and is no longer a condition of union access to the representation and unfair labor practice procedures of the National Labor Relations Board.

Section 101(f): Makes a technical change in section 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, required by the repeal of sections 9 (f), (g), and (h) of such act provided for in sections 101(e) and 112(d). The effect of this change is to eliminate the present requirement that a union must have received from the National Labor Relations Board a notice that it is in compliance with sections 9 (f), (g), and (h) of the act in order to be eligible to negotiate a union-shop agreement under section 8(a)(3) of the act.

Section 102(a): Provides that every officer of a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce, and every employee of such organization, other than clerical employees, as defined by the Secretary of Labor, who received more than $5,000 in wages, salary, expenses, or other allowances during the preceding fiscal year is required to submit to the Secretary of Labor a report listing and describing any of six specified types of financial transactions presenting conflicts of interest situations in which he may have been involved during the preceding fiscal year. These transactions include the following: (1) any legal or equitable interest, income or other benefit with monetary value in a business whose employees the labor organization represents or is actively seeking to represent; (2) any transaction involving any legal or equitable interest in, or a loan to or from, any business whose employees the union represents or actively seeks to represent; (3) any legal or equitable interest, income or other benefit with monetary value derived from a business a substantial part of which consists of buying from, selling or leasing to or otherwise dealing with a business whose employees the union represents or is actively seeking to represent; (4) any legal or equitable interest, income or other benefit with monetary value derived from a business any part of which consists of buying from, selling or leasing to or otherwise dealing with the union; (5) any business transaction or arrangement with an employer whose employees the union represents or is actively seeking to represent, except wages and benefits received as a bona fide employee of such employer and goods and services purchased and sold in the regular course of business at generally available employee discounts; and (6) any money or other thing of value received from any employer or any person acting as a labor relations expert, adviser or consultant to an employer, except payments of the kinds described in section 302(c) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended.

The types of transactions which must be reported under this section encompass both direct and indirect dealings of an officer or employee, his spouse, or minor children. Under section 102(c), however, a report must be made by a union officer or employee only if he has been involved during the preceding fiscal year in any transaction of the types enumerated in section 102(a).

By requiring reports on such transactions and by requiring other types of reporting under other sections of the bill, the committee is not to be construed as necessarily condemning the matters to be reported if they are not specifically declared to be improper or made illegal under other provisions of the bill or other laws. Reports are required as to matters which should be public knowledge so that their propriety can be explored in the light of known facts and conditions.

Section 102(b): Provides that the reporting requirements contained in paragraphs (1), (2), (3), (4), and (5) of section 102(a) shall not apply to publicly traded securities and other securities that are publicly regulated. This provision has been included in the bill because the committee believes that the holding of publicly traded or regulated stock can hardly lead to conflicts of interest because of the unlikelihood that such holdings will amount to a substantial or controlling interest. Existing public regulation of such securities held in such quantities provide sufficient safeguards of disclosure.

Section 102(c): As noted above in discussion of section 102(a), provides that a union officer or employee who is not involved in any transactions of the types enumerated in section 102(a) is not required to file any report under this section.

Section 103(a): Requires every employer engaged in an industry affecting interstate commerce to submit to the Secretary of Labor a report listing and describing specified expenditures in connection with labor-management relations during the preceding fiscal year. The report must be signed by the employer's president and treasurer or corresponding principal officers.

The expenditures which employers must report are as follows: (1) any expenditure pursuant to an agreement or arrangement with a labor relations consultant or other independent contractor by which such person undertakes any activities of which an object, directly or indirectly through employees, groups or committees of employees, or other persons, is to persuade employees to exercise or not to exercise, or persuade employees as to the manner of exercising, the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, or undertakes to supply such employer with information concerning the activities of employees or a union in connection with a labor dispute; expenditures for information for use solely in conjunction with a pending judicial, administrative, or arbitration proceeding, however, would not have to be reported; (2) any expenditure by the employer himself having an object, direct or indirect, similar to any of those listed and described in paragraph (1); here again, certain expenditures would not have to be reported, as follows: (i) changes in wages, working conditions, or employee benefits, (ii) publication by such employer in his own name of a newspaper, newsletter, or similar house organ, letter, communication, or advertisement, and (iii) obtaining information for use solely in conjunction with a pending judicial, administrative, or arbitration proceeding; (3) any direct or indirect payment or loan, or any promise or agreement to pay or loan, money or other thing of value to any union or any officer or employee of any union, except the following: (i) payments made pursuant to a collective bargaining agreement the terms of which have been fully disclosed to the employees in the bargaining unit covered by the agreement, (ii) compensation paid for or by reason of service as an employee, (iii) payments or loans made by any National or State bank, credit union, insurance company, savings and loan association, or other credit institution, and (iv) payments of the kind referred to in section 302(c) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended; and (4) any payment, expenditure, loan, transaction, or arrangement involving such employee of which a report is required of a union officer or employee under paragraphs (1), (2), (5), or (6) of section 102(a).

Section 103(b): Requires reports from every person who has an agreement or arrangement with an employer engaged in an industry affecting interstate commerce to undertake activities of the types listed and described in the discussion of paragraph (1) of section 103(a). These reports must be filed annually with the Secretary and must be signed by the reporting concern's president and treasurer or corresponding principal officers. They must contain full information about the person's business, receipts from employers on account of labor relations advice or services, disbursements of any kind in connection with such services, and a detailed statement of the agreement or arrangement between such person and an employer. As in the case of reports by unions under section 101(b), the committee bill gives the Secretary of Labor the authority to prescribe the categories in which the information required by section 103(b) shall be reported.

The committee in drafting section 103 was particularly desirous of requiring reports from middlemen masquerading as legitimate labor relations consultants. The committee believes that if unions are required to report all their expenditures, including expenses in organizing campaigns, reports should be required from employers who carry on, or engage such persons to carry on, various types of activity, often surreptitious, designed to interfere with the free choice of bargaining representatives by employees and to provide the employer with information concerning the activities of employees or a union in connection with a labor dispute.

Section 103(c): Provides that no employer nor any other person shall be required to file a report covering the giving of advice by such person to such employer, representing the employer before any court, administrative agency, or arbitration tribunal, or engaging in collective bargaining on behalf of such employer. The committee did not intend to have the reporting requirements of the bill apply to attorneys and labor relations consultants who perform an important and useful function in contemporary labor relations and do not engage in activities of the types listed in section 103(b).

Section 103(d): Provides that employers and other persons are not required to file any report under this section unless they have made expenditures, payments, or loans or have been parties to agreements or arrangements of the kinds described in subsection (a) or (b), respectively. Thus most employers who maintain normal collective bargaining relations with their employees will not have to file reports under this bill.

Section 103(e): Provides that regular officers, supervisors, or employees are not required to file any report in connection with services rendered by them to their employer. Employers are not required to file any report concerning expenditures in the form of compensation for the services of any of their regular officers, supervisors, or employees.

Section 104(a): Specifies that the contents of reports and documents filed under sections 101, 102, and 103 shall be public information and authorizes the Secretary of Labor to publish and use such information for statistical and research purposes, and to compile and publish studies and surveys based on the data contained in reports required to be filed under these sections.

Section 104(b): Authorizes the Secretary of Labor to prescribe regulations permitting the inspection and examination, on the request of any person, of the information contained in reports and documents filed under sections 101, 102, and 103.

Section 104(c): Authorizes the Secretary of Labor to furnish copies of reports or other documents filed under title I upon payment of a charge based on the cost of the service. It is provided, however, that copies of reports or other documents filed by any union or employer are to be made available by the Secretary without charge, or the Secretary may require such persons to furnish copies of such reports or documents, to designated State agencies upon request of the Governor of any such State. No person is to be required, however, by virtue of any State law to furnish any State officers or agency any information contained in a report filed under this title with the Secretary if a copy of such report, or the portion thereof containing such information, is furnished to such offices or agency. Money received in payment of charges fixed by the Secretary under this subsection is to be deposited to the credit of the appropriation of the agency of the U.S. Department of Labor which is charged with the responsibility of rendering this service provided for in this subsection and may be used, in the Secretary's discretion, for the ordinary expenses of such agency, notwithstanding any other provision of law.

Section 105: Requires unions, union officers and employees, employers and other persons who are required to file reports under sections 101, 102, or 103 to keep and preserve records and accounts of financial transactions necessary to verify such reports for such periods of time as the Secretary of Labor shall prescribe. Because of lack of experience in examining and analyzing reports of the types required by this title, the committee believes that the Secretary should have discretion in determining how long financial and other records should be kept by those who are required to report. The committee anticipates that in issuing regulations pursuant to this section the Secretary will minimize the burden of retaining records for unduly long periods of time.

Section 106(a): Requires that the first reports required under the bill shall be filed not later than January 1, 1960. Initial financial reports by unions under section 101(b) and reports by employers and other persons under section 103 will have to cover only the period between the date of the bill's enactment and January 1, 1960, and the second such reports will have to cover only the period between January 1, 1960, and the beginning of the next fiscal year of the person filing such reports. Under section 106(b) the Secretary of Labor is given the authority to issue regulations prescribing the time when annual reports must thereafter be filed.

Section 106(b): Authorizes the Secretary of Labor to issue rules and regulations prescribing the form, time of filing (as has already been noted) and publication of reports and other reasonable rules and regulations (including rules prescribing reports concerning building funds, trusts or enterprises financed by unions) which he finds necessary to prevent circumvention or evasion of the bill's reporting requirements.

The committee expects that, in exercising his rulemaking power under this subsection, the Secretary of Labor will be vigilant in making sure that all types of special funds shall be reported. At the same time, it is expected that the Secretary will make every effort to reduce the cost and administrative burden of reporting. For this reason, the Secretary is directed to prescribe by general rule simplified reports by unions or employers for whom he finds that by virtue of their size a detailed report would be unduly burdensome, subject, however, to revocation if the Secretary determines, after investigation, that the purposes of this section would be served thereby. The Secretary may, in addition, exempt from the requirements of section 101 for definite or indefinite periods as determined by him, any union or class thereof, including conferences, joint boards or councils, associations or other aggregations of unions, that are transitory in character and that are formed solely to negotiate a labor agreement or to carry out educational activity. By including this discretionary exemption provision in the bill, the committee does not intend to imply that other labor organizations which do not exist for the purpose, in whole or in part, of engaging in collective bargaining with employers are required to file reports under the bill. Whether or not any such organization is required to report depends upon whether they are covered by sections 101 and 501 (h) and (i) of the bill, without regard to anything contained in this subsection.

Section 106(c): Provides that the Secretary of Labor has power and is directed, when he believes it is necessary in order to determine whether any person has violated any provision of the bill or any rule or regulation authorized by the bill (except amendments made in other statutes, such as the National Labor Relations Act or the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947), to make an investigation, enter places and inspect records and accounts and question persons deemed necessary to enable him to ascertain the facts. The Secretary is also authorized to make a report to interested persons or officials concerning the facts required to be shown in a report and the reason for any failure or refusal to file a report or any other matter he deems appropriate as a result of his investigation.

Section 107(a): Prohibits any union engaged in an industry affecting interstate commerce from making any direct or indirect loans to any of its officers or employees resulting in a total indebtedness on the part of such officer or employee to the union in excess of $1,500.

Section 107(b): Prohibits both unions and employers from directly or indirectly paying the fine, or paying or advancing the costs of defense, of any of their officers, agents, employees, or representatives who is indicted for or convicted of any violation of any provision of the bill. In the event any such person is acquitted, however, he may be reimbursed for expenditures necessarily incurred in his defense.

Section 108(a): Prescribes a fine of up to $10,000 or imprisonment for up to 1 year, or both, for willfully violating or failing to comply with any provision of title I or the rules or regulations issued by the Secretary of Labor thereunder.

Section 108(b): Prescribes a fine of up to $10,000 or imprisonment for up to 1 year, or both, for willful false statements or misrepresentations of material facts or failure to disclose material facts in reports, documents, or other information required under this title or the rules and regulations of the Secretary issued thereunder.

Section 108(c): Prescribes a fine of up to $10,000 or imprisonment for up to 1 year, or both, for willfully making a false entry, or willfully concealing, withholding, or destroying any books, records, reports, or statements required to be kept by this title.

Section 108(d): Assigns personal responsibility to the union or employer officers or other persons required to sign reports under sections 101 and 103 for the filing and the accuracy of statements in such reports.

Section 109(a): Makes the embezzlement of union funds or assets by any officer or employee a Federal crime punishable by a fine of up to $10,000 or imprisonment for up to 5 years, or both.

Section 109(b): Provides that when a union officer or employee has been convicted of embezzlement of union funds or property in violation of subsection (a) and the union or its governing board refuses or fails to sue to recover such money or property within 6 calendar months after being requested to do so by any member of the union, any of the union's members may sue the convicted officer or employee in any Federal district court to recover such money or property for the benefit of the union. Such actions may be brought only upon leave of court obtained upon verified application and for good cause shown which application may be ex parte. In his order the trial judge may allot a reasonable part of the recovery to pay fees of counsel representing the union member in the action and to compensate such member for expenses incurred by him in connection with the litigation. It is provided that nothing in this subsection shall reduce or limit the responsibilities of any union officer or employee under any other law of the United States or any State and that nothing in this subsection shall take away any right or bar any remedy to which union members are entitled under any such law.

Section 110(a): Provides that there shall be in the U.S. Department of Labor a Commissioner of Labor Reports appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Commissioner shall receive compensation at the highest rate established for grade 18 of the general schedule of the Classification Act of 1949, as amended, and shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Labor or required by law and the Secretary may authorize him to perform any functions of the Secretary under the bill.

Section 110(b): Authorizes the Secretary of Labor to make expenditures subject to the civil service laws and the Classification Act of 1949, as amended, and appoint and fix compensation of personnel including attorneys necessary to perform his functions under the bill. Attorneys appointed under this subsection may appear for and represent the Secretary in any litigation, but all such litigation shall be subject to the direction and control of the Attorney General.

Section 110(c): Authorizes the Secretary of Labor to bring injunction actions in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia or in the district court or other court of the United States having jurisdiction of the actions sought to be enjoined to restrain violations of the provisions of this title or any rule or regulation of the Secretary thereunder and to compel compliance with this title and such rules and regulations.

Section 111: Amends sections 302 (a), (b), and (c) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended, primarily for the purpose of clarifying an ambiguity which presently exists. Under present law it is illegal for an employer to pay or deliver anything of value to a representative of his employees. The amendments contained in this section would remove any doubt that all forms of bribery and extortion which might escape the provisions of existing law would be prohibited under pain of criminal penalties for conviction thereof. The intent of these amendments to sections 302 (a) and (b) is to forbid any payment or bribe by an employer of anyone who acts in the interest of an employer whether technically an agent or not and to forbid the receipt of any such bribe by any person, whether an individual an officer or employee of a labor organization or a committee representing employees. Payment to and receipt of such payments by any union officer or employee having the intent of influencing such officer or employee in respect to any of his actions, decisions, or duties as a representative of employees or as such union officer or employee would also be made a criminal offense.

This section also amends section 302(b) to make unlawful the demand or acceptance of improper loading fees from interstate truckers. The proviso makes clear that this prohibition is not intended to make unlawful, however, any payment by an employer to any of his employees as compensation for their services as employees. It would also make it a criminal offense for a labor organization to conduct "shakedown" picketing, i.e., picketing with no legitimate purpose but which is to force an employer to buy off the union official involved. The subsection bans picketing to exact from the employer a payment for the enrichment of an individual as distinguished from bona fide picketing, the purpose of which is improvement in wages and working conditions of employees. This is an abuse documented by the McClellan committee. This section also provides that the general ban in section 302 upon employer payments to unions is not to apply to money deducted from the wages of employees pursuant to a collective bargaining agreement in the form of periodic payments to a union in lieu of membership dues, nor to employer payments to trust funds for pooled vacation, holiday, severance or similar benefits, or apprentice or other employee training programs.

Section 112(a): Provides that every union officer and every employer shall file annually at the beginning of each fiscal year with the Secretary of Labor an affidavit meeting the requirements of section 112(b) not found by any court to be false. It is specified that for the purpose of this section only the term "employer" means the officers and directors of an employer organized in the corporated or unincorporated association form or partners or individual proprietors. Under the provisions of section 112(c), however, the obligation to file such affidavits does not apply to any union officer or employer who has not filed a petition under section 9 or a charge under section 10 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, during the preceding 12 months.

Section 112(b): Provides that the affidavits required by subsection (a) shall state that the affiant is not and during the preceding 12 months has not been a member of the Communist Party or affiliated with such party and that neither the affiant nor any organization of which he is a member, of which he is or has supported during the preceding 12 months believes in or teaches the overthrow of the U.S. Government by force or any illegal or unconstitutional method. Section 1001 of title 18 of the United States Code is made applicable to such affidavits.

Section 112(c): As has already been noted, exempts from this section union officers and employers who have not filed a petition under section 9 or a charge under section 10 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, during the 12 months preceding the date upon which they would otherwise be required to file an affidavit.

Section 112(d): Repeals section 9(h), the non-Communist affidavit provision, of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

TITLE II. TRUSTEESHIPS

Section 201(a): Requires reports by national or international unions to the Secretary of Labor on trusteeship established by such union over subordinate organizations. These reports must be filed within 30 days after the date of enactment of this bill in the case of trusteeships in existence on such date, and within 30 days following the imposition of any trusteeship over a subordinate organization after such date, and semiannually thereafter. Such reports must be signed by the president and treasurer or corresponding principal officers of the national or international union and by the trustee or trustees designated to exercise supervision over any subordinate organizations in trusteeship.

The reports must show (A) the union in trusteeship, (B) the date trusteeship was established, (C) a detailed statement of the reason for establishing or continuing the trusteeship, and (D) the nature and extent of voting by members of the subordinate organization in trusteeship for convention delegates and national or international union officers.

Section 201(b): Provides the Secretary of Labor with the same powers with respect to the reports on trusteeships required by subsection (a) that he has with respect to reports required by title I under sections 101(c), 104, 105, and 106 (b) and (c) of such title.

Section 201(c): Prescribes a fine of up to $10,000 or imprisonment for up to 1 year, or both, for willfully violating or failing to comply with this section or rules or regulations issued thereunder by the Secretary of Labor.

Section 201(d): Prescribes a fine of up to $10,000 or imprisonment for up to 1 year, or both, for false statements, misrepresentation of material facts or failure to disclose material facts in any report required under this section or the rules and regulations issued thereunder, or for willfully withholding, concealing, or destroying any books, records, reports, or statements upon which such report is based.

Section 201(e): Assigns personal responsibility to the union officers and trustees who are required to sign reports under subsection (a) for the filing and the accuracy of any statements contained in such reports.

Section 201(f): Provides that every union required to submit a report under title II shall make the information required to be contained in such report available to all of the members of the subordinate organization to which the report applies in such form and manner as the Secretary of Labor shall by regulation prescribe.

Section 202: Requires that trusteeships shall be established and administered only in accordance with the constitution and bylaws of the particular national or international union involved and for any one of the following purposes: correction of corruption or financial malpractice, assuring the performance of collective bargaining agreements or other duties of a bargaining representative, restoring democratic procedures, or otherwise carrying out the legitimate objects of the union.

The committee recognizes the difficulty of ascertaining and defining what ought to be regarded as proper purposes or trusteeships so as to permit useful and desirable trusteeships while preventing and minimizing abuses. It is not the intention of the committee to interfere in any way with the recognized authority and responsibility of a union to require compliance by subordinate organizations with all lawful and proper provisions of the union's constitution and bylaws. In part, the difficulty is resolved in the committee bill by the provisions for shifting the burden of proof contained in section 204.

Section 203(a): Makes it unlawful during trusteeship (1) to count members' votes for convention delegates or national or international officers if not by secret ballot in which all members in good standing could participate, or (2) to transfer to parent organization any funds of the trusteed union except regular per capita and assessments payable by nontrusteed unions. It is provided that upon dissolution of the trusteeship, assets may be distributed in accordance with the charter, constitution, or bylaws. The committee recognizes that in some unions persons who have retired or moved into supervisory positions; i.e., who are either no longer part of the bargaining unit or who have no active status in the union are nevertheless considered "members in good standing." It is not the committee's intention that such persons be given a right to vote by section 203(a)(1).

Section 203(b): Makes violation of subsection (a) punishable by a maximum $10,000 fine or imprisonment for 1 year, or both.

Section 204(a): Provides that upon the written complaint of a member or subordinate union alleging violation of section 202 or 203, the Secretary shall investigate and if he finds an unremedied violation, he may petition the appropriate Federal district court to enjoin and dissolve the trusteeship and for other appropriate relief.

Section 204(b): Provides for place and manner of bringing suit.

Section 204(c): This subsection provides that a trusteeship established by a labor organization (1) in conformity with the procedural requirements of its constitution and (2) authorized or ratified after a hearing before the union's executive board or such other body as may be provided for in the union's constitution and bylaws, shall be presumed valid for a period of 18 months. This presumption may be rebutted by clear and convincing proof that the trusteeship was not established for the purposes allowable under section 202. After the expiration of 18 months there will be a presumption that the trusteeship is invalid in any proceeding brought by the Secretary to remove the subordinate union from the trusteeship unless the labor organization can show by clear and convincing proof that the continuation of the trusteeship is necessary for a purpose allowable under section 202. If the labor organization can so show, the court may dismiss the complaint or retain jurisdiction of the cause on such conditions and for such period of time as it deems appropriate.

Section 205: Requires a report within 3 years by the Secretary of Labor on the operation of this title.

Section 206: Makes clear that Federal suits under title II are possible only upon suit initiated by the Secretary of Labor. All other rights and remedies at law or in equity are specifically preserved except that when the Secretary files a complaint under this title, the Federal court's jurisdiction is to be exclusive and the result res judicata.

TITLE III. ELECTIONS

Section 301(a): Provides that every national and international labor organization engaged in an industry affecting interstate commerce shall elect the officers named in its constitution and the members of its executive board or similar governing body at least once every 5 years by secret ballot or at a convention of delegates elected by secret ballot and in accordance with its constitution and bylaws.

Section 301(b): Provides that every local labor organization engaged in an industry affecting interstate commerce shall elect the officers named in its constitution and the members of its executive board or similar governing body at least once every 3 years by secret ballot and in accordance with its constitution and bylaws. Local unions and their officers are forbidden to discriminate in favor of or against any candidate for union office with respect to the use of the union's list of members in good standing and are required to comply with all reasonable requests of any candidate for distribution of his campaign literature by the unions, but at the candidate's expense, to members in good standing on the union's roster of members. Adequate election safeguards must also be assured by every local union to insure that the ballots cast in its elections are fairly counted; these safeguards are to include the right of any candidate to have an observer present on his behalf at the polls and at the counting of the ballots.

Section 301(c): Provides that officers of any intermediate body such as a general committee, system board, joint board, joint council or other association of labor organizations as defined in section 501(h) shall be elected at least once every 4 years by secret ballot or by union officers representative of the members who have been elected by secret ballot and in accordance with the union's constitution and bylaws.

Section 301(d): Requires that in any union election required by this section to be held by secret ballot, a reasonable opportunity shall be given for the nomination of candidates. Every member in good standing is to be eligible to be a candidate for, and hold, union office, subject, however, to reasonable qualifications uniformly imposed, and the right to support and vote for the candidate or candidates of his choice without being subject to penalty, discipline, or improper interference or reprisal at the hands of the union or any union member. Fifteen days' notice of an election is to be mailed to members unless the election is held at the regular time specified in the union's constitution and bylaws on file with the Secretary of Labor. Every member shall have one vote, and a member whose dues are checked off with his voluntary authorization provided for in a collective bargaining agreement is not to be disqualified from voting or being a candidate for union office for alleged dues default. The votes cast by members of each local union in national or international union election are to be counted and the results published separately. Ballots and election records are to be preserved for 1 year. The union's constitution and bylaws are to govern any election to the extent that they are not inconsistent with the provisions of title III.

Section 301(e): Provides that when union officers are chosen in a convention, the convention shall be conducted in accordance with the union's constitution and bylaws to the extent that they are not inconsistent with title III, and delegate credentials, minutes, and convention records pertaining to the election of officers are to be preserved for 1 year after the election.

Section 301(f): Provides that neither union funds nor funds of an employer are to be used to promote the candidacy of any person in union elections subject to title III; union funds, however, may be used for notices, factual statements of issues, or other expenses necessary for the conduct of the election.

Section 301(g): Provides that if the Secretary of Labor, upon application of any member of a local labor organization engaged in an industry affecting interstate commerce finds that the union's constitution and bylaws do not provide an adequate means for removing from office elected officers guilty of serious misconduct, such officers may be removed, for cause shown and after notice and hearing, by the members in good standing voting by secret ballot in an election conducted by the union's officers. The election must be held in accordance with the union's constitution and bylaws to this extent that they are not inconsistent with title III.

Section 301(h): Authorizes the Secretary of Labor to prescribe minimum standards and methods for determining the adequacy of the procedures for the removal of union officers contained in union constitution and bylaws as specified in subsection (g).

Section 302(a): Provides for the filing of complaints with the Secretary of Labor by a union member alleging violation of section 301, including violation of the union's constitution and bylaws pertaining to the election and removal of officers, but only if he has (1) exhausted his remedies under the union's constitution and bylaws or (2) invoked such remedies without obtaining a final determination within 3 months. The election is to be presumed valid, however, pending a final decision, and in the interim the union's affairs are to be conducted by the officers elected or in office or in the manner provided in the union's constitution and bylaws.

Section 302(b): Provides that the Secretary must investigate complaints meeting the requirements of subsection (a), and if he has probable cause to believe that a violation of section 301 has occurred and has not been remedied, he shall, within 60 days of the filing of such complaint, institute an action in the U.S. district court for the district where the union has its principal offices to set aside the election and obtain an order directing a new election or, if the complaint involves an alleged inadequacy of procedure for the removal of a union officer guilty of serious misconduct, an order directing a hearing before and a secret ballot vote by the members, under the supervision of the Secretary in accordance with the provisions of title III and such rules and regulations as the Secretary may prescribe. Service of summons, subpena or other legal process of the court upon any union official or agent in his capacity as such is to be deemed service on the union for purposes of this section. The court shall have power to take any action it deems proper to conserve the assets of the union when proceedings are instituted and actions brought under this section.

Section 302(c): Provides for a trial of the issues in proceedings or action brought under this section by the district court. If the court, upon a preponderance of this evidence, finds that (1) an election was not held within the time prescribed by section 301, or (2) a violation of section 301 did or reasonably could have been expected to affect the result of an election, the court is to declare the election void and direct the holding of a new election under supervision of the Secretary of Labor. So far as may be lawful and practicable, such election is to be conducted in conformity with the union's constitution and by-laws. The Secretary is to certify the names of any person or persons elected in such election promptly to the court, and the court shall thereupon enter a decree declaring such person or persons to be an officer or officers of the union.

It is further provided in this subsection that if the proceeding before the court involves the removal of officers pursuant to section 301(g) the Secretary is to certify the results of the vote, and the court shall thereupon enter a decree declaring whether such persons have been removed from office in the union.

Section 302(d): Provides that an order of a Federal district court directing an election, dismissing any complaint filed under title III or designating certain persons to be the elected officers of a union are appealable in the same manner as the final judgment in a civil action. Orders directing elections, however, shall not be stayed pending appeal.

Section 303: Provides that no labor organization is to be required by law to conduct elections of officers more frequently or in a different form or manner than is required by title III of its own constitution or bylaws. Existing rights and remedies under a union's constitution and bylaws or under State or local law to enforce such union's constitution and bylaws with respect to elections are preserved if they are invoked prior to the conduct of an election, but under the provisions of section 303, the remedy available under title III for challenging an election that has already been conducted is exclusive.

Section 304: Provides that the election provisions of title III are to become effective—

(1) Ninety days after the date of enactment of the bill for any union whose constitution and bylaws can be modified to conform with the requirements of title III by its officers or governing body, such as its executive board or council; or

(2) where the modifications necessary to conform with the requirements of title III are such that they can only be made by a constitutional convention of the union, not later than the union's next constitutional convention after the date of enactment of the bill or 2 years after such date, whichever is the earlier date. In situations where a constitutional convention is not held within 2 years, the union's executive board or other governing body empowered to act for the union between conventions is empowered, notwithstanding any provision of the union's constitution or bylaws to the contrary, to make any necessary interim changes in the union's constitution and bylaws to carry out the provisions of the bill. It is expected that any constitutional changes made between conventions would be ratified at the union's next convention.

Section 305(a): Prohibits any person who has within the preceding 5 years served part of a prison term as a result of having been convicted of any one of the following specified crimes, namely: robbery, bribery, extortion, embezzlement, grand larceny, burglary, arson, violation of narcotics law, murder, rape, assault with intent to kill, assault with intent to inflict grievous bodily injury, or conspiracy to commit any such crime, from serving as a union officer, director, trustee, executive board or similar governing body member, business agent, manager, organizer or other employee, other than as an exclusively clerical or custodial employee, unless: (1) his citizenship rights, having been revoked as a result of such conviction, have been fully restored or (2) the Secretary of Labor determines, after a hearing of which notice has been given to Federal, State, and local prosecuting officials in any jurisdiction where such conviction took place, that such person's service in any such capacity would not be contrary to the purposes of this bill. In making any such determination, the Secretary's decision shall be final.

This provision in the bill is not conceived by the committee as additional punishment for the crimes mentioned in the section. The punishment of these kinds of crimes and the enactment of laws relating to them are and should be the province of the States. This provision is designed to further protect union members' and the public interest by establishing certain standards for persons holding union office—a matter within the purview of the Federal Government.

The committee is of the opinion that, in the interests of justice and effective law enforcement, a reasonable fixed time limit should be placed on the length of time a convicted person should be disqualified from holding union office or employment. Within this time limit, furthermore, means should be provided whereby convicted persons may obtain relief from the operation of this section if their ctizenship rights, having been revoked, are fully restored or they are able to demonstrate to the Secretary of Labor, on the basis that the nature of the offense of which they were convicted or their conduct subsequent to their having been imprisoned was such, that granting them such relief would not be contrary to the purposes of the bill.

Section 305(b): Prohibits any person who has been found by the Secretary of Labor, after a hearing on a written record, to have failed to file, after written notice by the Secretary directing him to do so, any information required by title I or title II, or who has been convicted of any violation of title I or title II from serving as a union officer, director, trustee, executive board or similar governing body member, business agent, international representative, manager, paid organizer or other paid employee for a period of 5 years after such determination by the Secretary or such conviction. Union and union officers are prohibited from knowingly permitting any such person to take or hold union office or employment in violation of this subsection.

Section 305(c): Prescribes a fine of up to $10,000 or imprisonment for up to 1 year, or both, for violation of this section.

Section 305(d): Stipulates that a person shall be deemed to have been "convicted" and under the disability of "conviction" for purposes of section 305 from the date of the judgment of the trial court or the date on which such judgment is sustained finally on appeal, whichever is the latter date.

TITLE IV. CODES OF ETHICAL PRACTICES

Section 401: Declares that it is in the national interest that national and international labor organizations and nationwide and industrywide associations of employers engaged in industries affecting commerce shall voluntarily adopt or subscribe to codes of ethical practices obligating such labor organizations or employers, as the case may be, to adhere to principles and procedures of conduct which will effectively eliminate and prevent improper and unethical activities in the administration of their affairs, in the use and expenditure of their funds and in their relations with each other. It is recognized in this subsection that due regard should be paid in the formulation of codes of ethical practices to the traditions and background and customary forms and procedures of the labor organizations and employers to which the particular codes apply.

Subsection (a) also declares that codes of ethical practices applicable to national and international labor organizations shall contain provisions which will safeguard the democratic rights and privileges of members and which will eliminate and prevent improper and unethical activities on the part of labor organizations or their subordinate locals or any officer or agent thereof. This subsection also declares that codes of ethical practices applicable to employers shall contain provisions which will promote harmonious relationships between such employers and the labor organizations which represent or seek to represent their employees and which will eliminate and prevent improper and unethical activities by such employers and their officers, agents, or representatives in derogation of the rights of employees to self-orgaization collective bargaining and other concerted activities guaranteed by section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. Codes of ethical practices applicable to both labor organizations and employers should contain methods and procedures to assure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions of such codes.

Finally, under subsection (a) codes of ethical practices shall contain appropriate provisions for publication of the provisions of the codes so that employers and employees in the industies affected and the public will be fully apprised as to the provisions of the codes.

Section 401(b): Provides that codes of ethical practices shall not authorize or sanction any conduct on the part of any labor organization or employer or any officer, agent, or representative thereof which violates any Federal, State, or local law. This subsection has been included in the bill to make clear that no private agreement or arrangement by or among labor organizations or employers or their officials, agents, or representatives is authorized by the bill if such arrangement or agreement would in any way conflict with any Federal, State, or local law.

Section 402 (a), (b), and (c): Establishes an Advisory Committee on Ethical Practices to advise the Secretary on the administration of this act, including the provisions of titles I, reporting and disclosure; title II, trusteeships; and title III, union elections; as well as title IV. Under subsection (b) the Committee will be composed of 15 members appointed by the Secretary, of whom 5 are to be chosen by a panel nominated by national or international labor organizations and by national federations of labor organizations, 5 are to be chosen from a panel nominated by nationwide or industrywide associations of employers, and 5 are to represent the public. Three members of the Committee are to be appointed for a term of 1 year, three members for a term of 2 years, three members for a term of 3 years, three members for a term of 4 years, and three members for a term of 5 years, and thereafter appointment is to be for a term of 5 years. It is specified in subsection (b) that the terms of office of not more than one member representing labor organizations, one member representing employer associations, and one member representing the public shall terminate in any one year. The Committee would meet at the request of the Secretary but in no case less frequently than four times each year. One-third of the members could request a meeting of the Committee. The members of the Committee would receive compensation while attending meetings and performing work of the Committee. Under subsection (c) of section 402 the Secretary is to provide necessary data, information, clerical assistance and other services and facilities for the Committee.

Section 403: Provides that not later than 3 years from the date of enactment of the bill the Secretary shall report to Congress on the progress achieved by labor organizations and employers engaged in industries affecting commerce in the elimination of improper activities in the administration of their affairs and the use and expenditure of their funds with particular reference to the significance of the voluntary adoption of self-policing codes of ethical practices in achieving such results. The Secretary shall include in his report such recommendations as he deems appropriate based upon the experience of labor organizations and employers in adopting and implementing codes of ethical practices pursuant to title IV. The Secretary would be authorized to include in his annual report to Congress, pursuant to title V, United States Code, section 620, interim reports on the subject matter dealt with in this title.

TITLE V. DEFINITIONS AND MISCELLANEOUS

Section 501: Contains definitions of terms as used in title I (except sec. 111), II, III, IV, and V of the bill.

Section 501(a): Defines "commerce" in substantially the same terms as does the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and "State" as including any States of the United States, the District of Columbia, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, Guam, Wake Island, the Canal Zone, and Outer Continental Shelf lands defined in the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act.

Section 501(b): Defines activity or industry "affecting commerce" as meaning any activity or industry in interstate commerce or in which a labor dispute would hinder or obstruct commerce or the free flow of commerce, and as including any activity or industry "affecting commerce" within the meaning of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended, or the Railway Labor Act, as amended, except as hereafter provided.

Section 501(c): Defines "person" in the same terms as does the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

Section 501(d): Defines "employer" as meaning any employer or group or association of employers which is an employer within the meaning of any law relating to employment of employees or which bargains collectively with any union concerning wages, working conditions, or other conditions of employment. The term includes any person who acts directly as an employer or indirectly as an agent of an employer in relation to an employee. The term does not include the United States or any wholly owned Government corporation or any State or political subdivision of a State.

Section 501(e): Defines "employee" as meaning any individual employed by an employer and including any individual whose work has ceased as a consequence of, or in connection with, any current labor dispute or because of any unfair labor practice.

Section 501(f): Defines "labor dispute" in the same terms as does the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

Section 501(g): Defines "trusteeship" as including all methods by which a national or international union takes supervision or control and conducts the affairs of a subordinate body under its constitution and bylaws.

Section 501(h): Defines "labor organization" in the same terms as does the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. The scope of the term as used in the bill, however, is broader than under the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, since the definitions of "employer" and "employee" which are used in defining the term do not contain any of the exclusions, such as those for employers and employees subject to the Railway Labor Act, employers of agricultural labor, employers of public employees (except as provided in subsection (d)), which are provided for in the act. Hence, the definition of "labor organization" included in the bill includes labor organizations representing such employees.

Section 501(i): Defines "labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce" in broad terms so as to cover all unions which represent, seek to represent, charter subordinate bodies to represent, or are chartered by a union representing or seeking to represent employees of employers subject to the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, or the Railway Labor Act, as amended, i.e., within the full scope of the commerce power. The definition includes all forms and levels of labor organization and combinations of labor organizations which exist for or carry on collective bargaining with employers, from internationals through locals and including conferences, joint boards and joint councils. This definition, like others in this section, is intended to provide comprehensive coverage of labor organizations engaged in any degree in the representation of employees or administration of collective bargaining agreements.

Section 501(j): Defines "secret ballot" as meaning all forms and methods of voting in secret.

Section 502: Makes clear that titles I, II, III, IV, and V are not intended and are not to be construed as superseding or impairing or otherwise affecting the Railway Labor Act, as amended, nor any obligation, right, benefit, privilege, or immunity of any carrier, employee, organization, representative, or person subject to that act. These titles likewise are not intended and are not to be construed as conferring any right, privileges, immunity, or defense upon any employer, nor as impairing or otherwise affecting the rights of any person under the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

Section 503: Gives the Secretary of Labor, for the purpose of making any investigation authorized by the bill, the same subpena powers as are vested in the Federal Trade Commission Act.

Section 504: Authorizes the Secretary of Labor to enter into arrangements or agreements for cooperation with other Government agencies in the performance of their respective functions, with a view toward avoiding unnecessary expenses and duplication of functions and to utilize the facilities or services, including the services of employees, of any department, agency, or establishment of the United States or any State or political subdivision, with the lawful consent of such department, agency, or establishment. Every Government department, agency, or establishment is directed to cooperate with the Secretary and, to the extent permitted by law, provide such information and facilities as he may request for his assistance in performing his functions under the bill.

This section further provides that the Attorney General is to receive from the Secretary evidence developed in the performance of his functions under the bill which may be found to warrant consideration and a basis for criminal proceedings under the bill or any other Federal law. The Secretary is authorized to refer to any governmental agency any evidence obtained by him which may tend to show violation of a statute administered by that agency.

Section 505: Makes the Administrative Procedure Act applicable to the issuance, amendment or rescission of rules or regulations authorized or required by the bill.

Section 506(a): Makes it unlawful for any union or its officers, agents, representatives, or employees to fine, suspend, expel, or otherwise discipline any member because he exercises any right to which he is entitled under this bill.

Section 506(b): Prohibits the use or threat of force or violence, or any economic reprisal or threat of such reprisal, to restrain, coerce, or intimidate, or attempt to restrain, coerce, or intimidate, any union member for the purpose of interfering with or preventing him from exercising any right to which he is entitled under the bill.

Section 506(c): Prescribes a fine of up to $10,000 or imprisonment for up to 2 years, or both, for willful violations of this section.

The committee believes that if the bill is to achieve its maximum value in preventing corruption in the labor and management field and in safeguarding democratic practices with respect to union elections and trusteeships, any improper interference with or reprisals against union members who are exercising rights guaranteed them by the bill must be severely punished. For this reason, any such interference or reprisal has been made subject to a maximum 2-year prison term, a maximum $10,000 fine, or both.

Section 507: Safeguards the authority of the States to continue to enact and enforce their own general criminal laws.

This section is designed to make clear that section 109(a), making embezzlement of union funds a Federal crime, and the references to certain crimes in section 305 of the bill are not intended to bar the States from continuing to enact and enforce, in the exercise of their general police powers, criminal statutes dealing with the particular crimes mentioned in the bill. The bill is not intended in any way to impair or diminish State authority to enact and enforce such general criminal statutes.

Other sections of this bill refer specifically to the respective responsibilities of State and Federal Governments with regard to the subject matter covered by the bill. Nothing in this section is to be construed as altering these divisions of governmental responsibility as therein defined.

Section 508: Requires every labor organization to which the bill applies to inform all of its members concerning the provisions of this bill and their rights they are guaranteed thereunder. The Secretary of Labor is given authority to prescribe the manner in which this obligation shall be effectuated.

Section 509: Contains the usual separability clause.

TITLE VI. AMENDMENTS TO THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT OF 1947, AS AMENDED

Section 601(a): Adds a new subsection (c) to section 14 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, which is designed to eliminate the so-called no man's land to which the McClellan committee called attention in its interim report. This subsection provides procedures through State agencies under agreement with the National Labor Relations Board for dealing with classes of cases which are within the jurisdiction of the Board but with respect to which the Board finds that, because such classes of cases are essentially local in character, the impact thereof on interstate commerce is not significant.

Paragraph (1) of the new section 14(c) of the act provides that the Board shall assert, either directly or through the procedures authorized by this subsection, jurisdiction over all cases to which this act applies. With respect to classes of cases that are essentially local in character, the Board is authorized to enter into an agreement with any authorized State agency whereby such agency will be designated as the agent of the Board to exercise jurisdiction over such classes of cases in such State. Any such agreement is to (a) provide for delegation by the Board to the State agency of such of the Board's powers and duties as may be necessary or appropriate to enable such State agency to exercise such jurisdiction, (b) require that, in exercising such jurisdiction, the State agency shall apply and enforce the act as interpreted by the Board and the Federal courts, and (c) provide for suspension or termination of such agreement by the Board if the Board finds that the State agency has failed to comply with the provision of the agreement or with regulations of the Board with respect to the carrying out of such agreement.

It is further provided in paragraph (1) that processes and orders of State agencies under such agreements are to be enforced exclusively by the Board, and are to be reviewable, in the Federal courts in the same manner and to the same extent as directly administered processes and orders of the Board. Appeals from a refusal by a State agency to issue a complaint of unfair labor practice under section 10(b) of the act or a refusal by such agency to process a representation petition under section 9(c) are to be taken, within such time and in such manner as the Board shall by regulation prescribe, to the Board, where they are to be disposed of in the same manner as if they were appeals from decisions of regional directors of the Board. The State agency is to be bound by the Board's decisions upon such appeal.

Paragraph (1) preserves the exclusive jurisdiction of the Board with respect to petition for temporary relief or restraining orders in the Federal courts. No State agency is to prevent any such petition in any case without having first obtained the consent of the Board, and in giving such consent the Board is to be guided by the same criteria as are applied in similar cases adjudicated by the Board itself.

With the consent and cooperation of agencies charged with administration of the act, under agreements made pursuant to this subsection, the Board may, notwithstanding any other provision of law, reimburse such agencies and their employees for services rendered for such purposes. As used in this subsection, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands are deemed to be States for purposes of entering into agreements of the types provided for in this subsection.

Paragraph (2) of the new section 14(c) of the act makes clear that the provisions of sections 3, 4, 5, and 6 of the act, which deal with the organizations and rulemaking functions of the Board, are not to apply to any State agency with which the Board has entered into an agreement pursuant to paragraph (1). The manner in which State agencies are to carry out such agreements is left to the States within the framework of such agreements.

Section 601(b): Repeals the proviso to section 10(a) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, as no longer needed or appropriate under the terms of the new subsection (c) that would be added to section 14 of the act by section 601(a).

Section 602(a): Makes clear that it is not an unfair labor practice for an employer primarily engaged in the building and construction industry to enter into agreements with labor organizations of which building and construction employees are members without the union's majority status having been established in the particular manner provided for under section 9 of the act. Representation elections in a large segment of the industry are not feasible to demonstrate such majority status due to the short periods of actual employment by specific employers. The section also permits the union shop provisions of such a contract to take effect within 7 days of hiring, also in recognition of the brief periods of employment characteristic of the industry. No other change is made in union security limitations now in the law. The section permits an agreement providing for an exclusive referral system based upon objective criteria for referral; such a referral system must be conducted without discrimination in regard to union membership (as now provided by law) but the order of referral may be governed by objective standards such as those set forth in the section. It is specifically provided that a contract permitted by this section would not be a bar to a representation or decertification election if without the authorization of the section it would not be a bar to such an election.

Section 602(b): To remove all doubt, it is specifically provided that the union security provisions of agreements permitted by (a) are subject to the limitations of State and Territorial law just as all collective agreements under section 8(a)(3) are limited by the provisions of section 14(b) of the National Labor Relations Act.

Section 603: Repeals the provision of section 9(c)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, which bars economic strikers from voting in representation elections conducted by the National Labor Relations Board. The present ban on such voting is generally regarded as a "union busting" provision.

Section 604: Makes clear that service assistants in the communications industry are not to be regarded or treated as supervisors under the definition contained in section 2(11) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

Section 605: Amends paragraph (4) of section 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended to authorize the National Labor Relations Board to hold prehearing elections in cases where there are no substantial issues of fact or law requiring a preelection hearing. This section provides that notwithstanding section 9(c)(1), when a question of representation affecting commerce exists, the Board through its designated representative may call an informal conference of the parties upon due notice. If no agreement is reached at such conference for a consent election and there are no substantial issues of fact or law requiring a hearing before an election, the Board may, through its designated representative, conduct an election. Such election is not to be conducted before the expiration of 30 days from the date of the petition. Any party aggrieved by the proceeding may file a motion for a hearing, but such motion shall not, unless specifically ordered by the Board, operate to stay the election. Unless such motion is granted prior to the election or is withdrawn, the Board is to afford the moving party an opportunity for hearing before certifying the results of such election.

Section 606: Amends section 3(d) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, to provide that when any vacancy exists in the office of the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, the President may designate an officer or employee as acting General Counsel. Such designation shall expire (i) at the end of 40 days when the Congress is in session unless a nomination to fill the vacancy has been submitted to the U.S. Senate or (ii) upon the sine die adjournment of the session of the Senate in which such nomination was submitted.

Under this provision a recess designation of an acting General Counsel will expire 40 days after the beginning of the next session of the Congress unless prior to that time the President submits a nomination to fill the vacancy in the Office of General Counsel.

SUMMARY OF THE PROVISIONS OF S. 1555

(4) Criminal penalties for failure to make such reports or for filing false reports;

(5) Criminal penalties for false entries in and destruction of union records;

(6) Full reporting and public disclosure of financial transactions and holdings, if any, by union officials which might give rise to conflicts of interest, including payments received from labor relations consultants;

(7) Full reporting and public disclosures by employers of expenditures for the purpose of persuading employees to exercise, not to exercise, or as to the manner of exercising their rights to organize and bargain collectively;

(8) Full reporting and public disclosure by employers of expenditures for the purpose of obtaining information concerning the activities of employees or unions in connection with a labor dispute;

(9) Full reports by employers of any direct or indirect loans to a labor organization or officer or employee of a labor organization;

(10) Criminal penalties for failing to file or falsification of reports required of employers and labor relations consultants;

(11) Provides Secretary with broad investigatory power, including the power of subpena, to prevent violation of the reporting and other provisions of the bill;

(12) Authorizes the Secretary to bring a civil injunction in a district court of the United States to compel compliance with the reporting provisions of the act or any rules or regulations which he promulgates to insure compliance with these provisions;

(13) Criminal penalties for payments by "middlemen" to union officials;

(14) Full reports by employers of any arrangement with a labor relations consultant or other independent contractor by which such person undertakes to persuade employees to exercise or not to exercise or regarding the exercise of their rights to organize or bargain collectively;

(15) Full reports by any person who has an agreement with an employer to persuade employees to exercise or not to exercise or as to the manner of their exercising their rights to organize and bargain collectively; or who supplies information to an employer concerning the activities of employees or labor organizations in connection with a labor dispute;

(16) Prohibits persons who have been convicted of certain crimes from holding union office or employment within 5 years of having served any part of a prison term as a result of such conviction;

(17) Prohibits unions from paying the legal fees or fines of any person indicted or convicted of a violation of the bill;

(18) Full reporting and public disclosure of trusteeships imposed by national or international unions;

(19) Criminal penalties for failure to file or falsification of required reports relating to trusteeships;

(20) Prescribes minimum standards for establishment of trusteeships and sets limits on their duration;

(21) Authorizes Federal court proceedings to dissolve trusteeships when not imposed in accordance with provisions of the bill;

(22) Empowers Federal courts to preserve the assets of a trusteed labor organization and limits the funds which may be transferred from a trusteed labor organization to the international;

(23) Requires election of constitutional officers and members of executive boards of international unions at least every 5 years by secret ballot or by delegates elected by secret ballot;

(24) Requires election of constitutional officers and members of executive boards of local unions at least every 3 years by secret ballot;

(25) Protects freedom of opportunity to nominate candidates in union elections;

(26) Protects members' right to vote in union elections without being subject to improper interference or reprisals;

(27) Insures that every candidate for union office shall be afforded the opportunity to distribute at his own expense literature in support of his candidacy to all the members of the union;

(28) Requires that all candidates shall have the opportunity to have observers present at the balloting and at the counting of the ballots in a union election;

(29) Prohibits use of union funds to promote individual candidacy in union elections;

(30) Procedures whereby a union officer guilty of serious misconduct in office may be removed by a secret ballot vote after court proceedings if the union's constitution does not provide adequate machinery for such removal;

(31) Provides for investigations by the Secretary of members' complaints of improper procedures in union elections and court actions by the Secretary to set aside improperly conducted elections;

(32) Empowers Federal courts to direct new elections to be conducted under supervision of the Secretary where it finds union election was improperly conducted;

(33) Preserves members' rights to enforce union's constitution under State laws with respect to trusteeships and safeguarding fair procedures before an election;

(34) A congressional declaration of policy favoring voluntary self-policing, through adoption and implementation of codes of ethical practices, by labor organizations and employers;

(35) Establishment of an Advisory Committee on Ethical Practices composed of representatives of the public, labor organizations, and employers;

(36) Eliminates the "no man's land" in labor-management relations by directing the National Labor Relations Board to exercise jurisdiction directly or with the aid of State agencies in all cases within its competence;

(37) State agencies may, by agreement with the National Labor Relations Board, administer the Federal act in accordance with procedures and substantive law applicable with regard to cases processed by the NLRB;

(38) Subjects shakedown picketing to criminal sanctions;

(39) Bans demand and acceptance by unions or union representatives of payments from interstate truckers of improper unloading fees;

(40) Permits with appropriate safeguards, prehire and 7-day union shop agreements in the building and construction industry;

(41) Clarification of the propriety of employer contributions to joint union-management apprenticeship funds;

(42) Restoration of voting rights to economic strikers;

(43) Criminal penalties for embezzlement, conversion, etc., of union funds;

(44) Establishes a prehearing election procedure with respect to labor disputes in which there are no substantive issues present in order to speed up the handling of cases by the National Labor Relations Board;

(45) Authorizes the President to appoint an acting General Counsel to the National Labor Relations Board when a vacancy occurs in that office.

EXHIBIT 2

THE SENATE AND LABOR REFORM

After weeks of political infighting the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee has brought forth a new incarnation of the Kennedy labor union regulation measure (now S. 1555), approved by a vote of 13 to 2. Its essentials are the same as the original bill, in spite of some 46 amendments which, on the whole, are strengthening. But the new sponsors it has picked up in the process are even more important.

Senator KENNEDY wasn't able to get any leading Republicans to join him and the 11 other Democrats who introduced the first bill (S. 505), Now two such have been added to the roster—New York's Senator JAVITS and Senator COOPER, of Kentucky. This is a healthy sign. Differences of opinion as to how to put curbs on corruption and dictatorship in unions should never have been made a party issue. The new sponsors show that this is less likely to happen in the future.

To most of the Kennedy-Ervin bill there has been no serious opposition—nor should there be now. The American Federation of Labor-Congress of Industrial Organizations has consistently supported it. The great bulk of its provisions are aimed to stop corrupt practices, through public disclosure of the financial operation of unions and their officers, and to insure democratic procedures in the conduct of union affairs, both in elections and in the use of local trusteeships.

What criticism there has been of these sections of the bill has come mostly from Republicans who want them to go further—for example, stronger penalties for violations and giving a fiduciary status to union officials. Had the bill been confined to the regulation of the internal affairs of unions, its passage would have been relatively easy. Title VI, amending the Taft-Hartley Act, on the contrary, has proved to be highly controversial. Even at that, the opposition has been focused there, too, not so much on what is in the bill as what has been left out. For example, powerful pressure has developed, especially among Republicans, to add wide picketing and boycott restrictions—which labor strongly opposes. These and other amendments will surely be urged when the bill goes to the Senate floor.

But the public interest, and labor's too, clearly calls for the passage of S. 1555. Its defeat would set labor reform back on its heels in the present session of Congress. It would be a calamity for the Senate to turn it down merely because it doesn't go far enough.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask that, during the debate on S. 1555, staff of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare be permitted access to the floor of the Senate without regard to the usual numerical restrictions imposed by the rules.

I also ask unanimous consent that Prof. Archibald Cox, of the Harvard law school, be permitted to be present in the Chamber during the debate on S. 1555, as he was during the debate on the bill last year. Professor Cox has advised me and the committee on this bill and his assistance would be very helpful during the debate.

Professor Cox was chairman of the so-called Blue Ribbon Committee, and participated in the drafting of the proposed legislation. He was present during the discussion in the committee, and his services have been rendered voluntarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, does the Senator's request contemplate including an equal number of minority staff members?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes. It includes both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, in due course we shall have abundant opportunity to ventilate the minority views on the pending bill. I am content to leave it at that until the debate begins, particularly with reference to the Ervin amendment and other amendments which will be offered. A substantial number of amendments will be offered on the minority side. The bill will receive adequate ventilation before consideration is concluded.

FEDERAL-STATE UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE SYSTEM

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, a few days ago, 21 distinguished teachers and members of the faculties of such outstanding schools as the University of Michigan, Princeton University, the University of Illinois, Smith College, Harvard University, Michigan State University, the University of Chicago, Johns Hopkins University, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the University of Pennsylvania, the University of California, Brandeis University, Haverford College, and Stanford University issued a statement calling attention to "the need for strengthening the national responsibility for unemployment insurance on a permanent basis." They made 4 recommendations, all of which are incorporated in S. 791, the bill introduced by the junior Senator from Minnesota, the senior Senator from New Jersey, myself, and 31 other Members of this body.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the statement by these 21 students of the problem be included in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IMPROVING OUR FEDERAL-STATE UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE SYSTEM—RECOMMENDATIONS FOR CONGRESSIONAL ACTION

It is now clear from recent experience that in its present form our Federal-State unemployment insurance system does not afford sufficient protection to unemployed persons and their families during a recession.

Early in 1958, after the recession had begun, the executive and legislative branches of the Federal Government concluded that the Federal-State system of unemployment insurance was not adequate to meet the unemployment emergency without Federal action. As a result, Congress passed and the President signed, an emergency stop-gap bill to provide temporary unemployment compensation benefits by advancing funds to the States to increase the duration of State benefits by 50 percent.

At the time Congress took emergency action there was in excess of $8 billion in the State unemployment insurance reserve funds. But a very large proportion of this money was not available in States experiencing heavy unemployment. As a result, on January 1, 1959, there was a total of nearly $7 billion in these unemployment reserves which was available but had not been used. Yet, during the last 6 months of 1958, the Federal Government had to advance to the States over $300 million out of general revenues, under the temporary unemployment compensation program, to meet the need for increased duration of unemployment benefits.

The weakness in our Federal-State unemployment insurance system thus were clearly demonstrated by this need for emergency Federal legislation for loans while there were substantial overall reserves.

This recent experience demonstrates the need for strengthening the national responsibility for unemployment insurance on a permanent basis. We, therefore, recommend Federal legislation to establish:

1. A nationwide reinsurance fund in order to equalize excessive costs of unemployment insurance in States experiencing a high incidence or prolonged duration of unemployment.

2. A specific minimum number of weeks of benefits applicable to all States for all unemployed persons having a recent substantial employment history.

3. A specific minimum proportion of weekly earnings which the great majority of unemployed in all States should receive subject to a defined maximum weekly benefit amount.

4. Nationwide coverage on a broadened basis, including all employees having a substantial attachment to the labor force.

The changes recommended would retain the basic responsibility for unemployment insurance in the individual States. At the same time, however, recognition is given to the fact that the Federal Government should have a responsibility to assist the States to meet unemployment which cannot effectively be handled exclusively on an individual State basis.

The following 21 persons, all holding academic positions, and identified with the field of social insurance, have subscribed to the foregoing statement:

THE LOYALTY OATH AND DISCLAIMER AFFIDAVIT IN THE NATIONAL DEFENSE EDUCATION ACT

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I have been informed by the distinguished senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], who is chairman of the Education Subcommittee of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee, that he plans to hold hearings upon S. 819, a bill to amend the National Defense Education Act by striking the provision dealing with the loyalty oath and the disclaimer affidavit. This bill was introduced by the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania and me.

A great many organizations have written to me expressing their support for the measure. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution of the house of representatives of Smith College of Northampton, Mass., the resolution of the FDR Democratic Club in Hollywood, Calif., and the resolution of the Los Angeles Chapter of the Federation of American Scientists be printed in the RECORD as representative of the groups which have taken a strong stand in favor of the elimination of this provision of the National Defense Education Act.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SMITH COLLEGE,
Northampton, Mass., April 9, 1959.

We oppose section 1001(f) of the National Defense Education Act both in principle and in practice. The principle of attaching loyalty oaths to Federal grants for education undercuts our expressed confidence in American ideals. It is a basic tenet of our educational philosophy that everyone have a right to free inquiry into and free choice among all points of view. This philosophy asserts that such free inquiry and choice will lead to a fuller understanding of all principles and to an affirmation of the values of the American way of life. Free intellectual inquiry does not imply seditious belief.

Furthermore, we doubt the effectiveness of the loyalty oath. Loyal citizens may be antagonized by being required to take such an oath because it conflicts with the principle stated above. Disloyal persons will not hesitate to take the oath, nor will it prevent them from acting according to their beliefs. Requiring a loyalty oath as a condition for Federal aid to students establishes a precedent of unwarranted Government interference with academic freedom.

We urge the immediate repeal of section 1001(f) on these grounds.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
SMITH COLLEGE.

Whereas Senator JOHN KENNEDY, of Massachusetts, and Senator JOSEPH CLARK, of Pennsylvania, introduced on January 29, 1959, in the U.S. Senate, Senate bill 819; and

Whereas Congressman FRANK THOMPSON, JR., of New Jersey, introduced on January 7, 1959, in the House of Representatives, House bill 284; and

Whereas, S. 819 and H.R. 284 provide for repeal of the nondisloyalty oath now required of applicants for grants or loans under the National Defense Education Act; and

Whereas Senator KENNEDY has said the oath would discourage only those who find oaths "distasteful and humiliating," and "most of those thus excluded by this provision might be said to be nonconformists and dissenters—but surely in our efforts to attract into scientific pursuits the best talents, the most inquiring minds and our Nation, we do not wish to exclude the nonconformists and the dissenters. Those who are willing to sign such an affidavit are not always by that act necessarily proven to be either more loyal or more talented than those who do not sign"; and

Whereas Congressman THOMPSON has said:

"Repeal of the loyalty oath is provided in H.R. 284, however the measure also calls for an affirmative oath of allegiance. Many educational leaders believe the present requirement of a loyalty oath, applying as it does to a large number of young people and teachers, is thoroughly harmful since it singles out people in education as objects of suspicion. Further, the present act tragically stifles the free exchange of ideas in the classroom and leads to complete stultification of the educational process"; and

Whereas the 1958 platform of the Democratic Party of California adopted at the Democratic State convention at Sacramento, August 9 and 10, 1958, states:

"The Democratic Party reaffirms its belief that our country's greatest security is the freely given loyalty of its citizens. * * *

We therefore oppose all oaths of nondisloyalty and the penalizing of citizens for the exercise of their constitutional rights": Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Franklin Delano Roosevelt Club of Hollywood, Calif., supports S. 819 and H.R. 284; and that copies of this resolution be sent to Senators CLAIR ENGLE, THOMAS KUCHEL, KENNEDY, and CLARK, and to Congressmen THOMPSON, JOE HOLT, CHET HOLIFIELD, CLYDE DOYLE, and JAMES ROOSEVELT.

ROYCE BARSTOW,
President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt Democratic Club of Hollywood, Calif.

(The above resolution was unanimously adopted March 18, 1959.)

WEST LOS ANGELES, CALIF., April 8, 1959.
Hon. JOHN F. KENNEDY,
Washington, D.C.:

Los Angeles Chapter, Federation of American Scientists, urges passage of H.R. 2437, S. 819, or similar legislation removing the loyalty provision from the National Defense Education Act.

In a democracy, students cannot be forced to study science; but attempts to legislate their loyalty can drive many excellent students away from science.

Traditional academic freedom of thought, which is endangered by the loyalty provision, is essential to the development of a healthy scientific community. Especially in the current crisis, America cannot afford this implication that scientists are a suspect group. The opportunity to receive an education should no more be contingent upon personal belief than are farm loans or old-age benefits.

DAVID L. HETRICK, Ph. D.,
Chairman, Los Angeles Chapter, Federation of American Scientists.

HOW TO GET ELECTED TO CONGRESS

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, in the April issue of Pageant magazine there appeared an article entitled "How To Get Elected to Congress." This is a story of a campaign by KEN HECHLER which resulted in his election to Congress from West Virginia's Fourth District.

I was privileged to visit West Virginia during the campaign and, in a small way, to participate in it. I was impressed, as the author of the article was obviously impressed, with the vigor, the dedication, and the ability of the college professor who decided he wanted to take an active part in the political life of the country rather than merely teach others about it.

KEN HECHLER proved it is no obstacle to start without widespread support and the handicap of only a brief residence in the community is not insuperable. He proved that strength of character and an interest in the people who make up the constituency are more persuasive than opposition jibes.

I commend this article to all persons interested in political science and I congratulate the voters of West Virginia upon their wisdom in electing KEN HECHLER.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

PROPOSED HONORARY CITIZENSHIP FOR WINSTON CHURCHILL

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a broadcast given last Monday evening by Mr. Eric Sevareid. The proposal which he discusses is one which I believe is worthy of our full attention during the next days, prior to the arrival in Washington of Sir Winston Churchill. I believe now that Sir Winston has left active political office, that a grant of honorary U.S. citizenship to him would be a worthy and fully deserved gesture.

There being no objection, the text of the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CBS RADIO NEWS ANALYSIS, MONDAY, APRIL 13, 1959

(By Eric Sevareid)

Good evening. Three weeks from today, Winston Churchill will arrive on these shores; the great defender of humane society in its time of peril is now 84, and it is possible that this is the last time Americans will see him in the flesh; thereafter he will belong to history and the folk memory of our common culture. He has received many honors in this country; but there is one possible honor surpassing all others, the one that was enjoyed by the Marquis de Lafayette and thereafter by his male descendants, American citizenship.

This idea of making Churchill an American citizen as well as a British subject, was first suggested here by a well-known Washington resident, Miss Katherine Halle, who is also a longtime friend of the Churchill family. The idea has been received with enthusiasm by every individual this reporter has tried it on, but the legal difficulties in the way may be considerable.

The Congress, apparently, would have to make any move in that direction; the President, so I am informed, could not, by Executive order, make Mr. Churchill either a full citizen or an honorary citizen; honorary citizenship of the United States is a condition that seems to have no precedent, though it is a familiar practice with State Governors; but Churchill, in his relationship to this country, is himself virtually without precedent and in the best of all worlds, there ought to be a way.

There appear to be at least two major problems where a grant of full citizenship is concerned. One is that the Constitution requires that the Congress provide a uniform rule of naturalization which makes it difficult to put the English statesman in a legislative class by himself; the other is that, strictly speaking, he would have to take an oath of allegiance to the United States. What could be done by Congress in terms of honorary citizenship remains to be explored.

There are, of course, many people who have dual citizenship today—in a certain sense. People, that is, who are considered by a foreign state to be a citizen of that state and considered under our laws to be a citizen of America. But they are not dual citizens in the eyes of both states as are the male descendants, today, of Lafayette.

Lafayette did not become an American citizen by act of the Federal Congress, except indirectly. He was first made a citizen by act of the General Assembly of the State of Maryland, and New York, among other States; that was early in the seventeen-eighties, before the Constitution was ratified and the Federal Congress established. In those days each State could write its own naturalization rules; so Lafayette and his male heirs were declared to be citizens by those States and later, as part of the bargaining for State ratification of the Constitution, these state acts were accepted as part of the Federal law. This was also done, in similar fashion, for the German soldier of fortune, Baron de Kalb; he was killed in the Revolution and left no son.

Lafayette did, and his direct descendant, Count de Chambrun, won a court test on his right to American citizenship when he arrived here without a visa during the wartime days of the Vichy government in France. He was the object of much acrimonious controversy at that time, since he was married to the daughter of the Vichy politician, Laval, who was later shot as a traitor to France. But De Chambrun today is an undisputed legal citizen of both France and the United States. So far as this reporter can discover, no other family enjoys this extraordinary status.

Congress frequently passes special legislation restoring citizenship to an individual, caught in unusual circumstances; but there is what is described to me as an unwritten rule that Congress never grants naturalization by special act; what it does, through private bills, is to adjust or waive certain normal immigration requirements for citizenship which is then attained through the regular court procedures.

In the Revolutionary and post-Revolutionary days, when the struggling young Republic had acute reason to be aware of the help given by foreigners, tangible expressions of gratitude to them were not uncommon. Lafayette was not only made a citizen; he was also given a piece of land and a gift of $200,000 by the United States.

If there has ever been a time, since then, when a case could be made for an illustrious foreigner receiving exceptional honor here, it would seem to be now, with Winston Churchill.

This is Eric Sevareid in Washington.

RECESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, in accordance with the previous order, I move that the Senate now take a recess.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5:44 o'clock p.m.), in accordance with the previous order, the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, April 16, 1959, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 15, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Bishop A. Frank Smith, the Methodist Church, Houston, Tex., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the Creator of all things, the Ruler of the nations, the Father of us all, we invoke Thy presence with, and Thy guidance for all peoples and especially for this land of ours. We are conscious of and grateful for the providence that has brought us, individually and collectively, down to this hour, and this morning. Our desire and prayer is that we may take unto ourselves the injunction of the Master Teacher: "Unto whom much is given, of him shall much be required," and, as a privileged people, recognize that we are correspondingly an obligated people. Extend our horizons, deepen our sympathies, lend unto us balance and poise, that we may be able to put first things first, and to distinguish between the passing and the eternal. May Thy blessing rest upon the Congress of the United States, upon the President and all those in places of responsibility and authority, and upon the people—Thy children—everywhere, to the end that increasingly Thy will may be done upon the earth as it is done in Heaven. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 27]

Andersen, Minn.	Giaimo	Polk
Barden	Gray	Powell
Baring	Hall	Rostenkowski
Bowles	Holifield	Roush
Buckley	Holland	St. George
Carnahan	Hosmer	Santangelo
Celler	Huddleston	Stubblefield

Donohue	Miller, George P.	Walter
Durham	Moulder	Whitener
Feighan	Multer	Whitten
Flynn	Norblad	Williams
Fogarty	Philbin	Wilson
		Winstead

The SPEAKER. On this rollcall 379 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

MODIFYING REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 2 OF 1939 AND REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 2 OF 1953

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 1321) to amend Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 1321, with Mr. BOLLING in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee rose on yesterday the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] had 20 minutes remaining; the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] had 30 minutes remaining.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, the National Electric Cooperative Association which, as we know, is the national service organization of the Rural Electric Systems of the Rural Electrification Administration, representing at least 90 percent of these systems and which serve about 4 million farms and other rural establishments in 44 States and Alaska, with from 12 to 16 million people benefiting, strongly support this bill.

Also appearing before the subcommittee last year were the assistant manager and engineer of the Buckeye Rural Electric Cooperative of Gallipolis, Ohio; the general manager of the Eastern Iowa Light and Power Cooperative of Wilton Junction, Iowa; the manager of the Association of Illinois Electric Cooperatives of Springfield, Ill.; the executive secretary of the Ohio Statewide Association of Columbus, Ohio; the president of the Menard Electric Cooperative of Petersburg, Ill.; the president of the Burke-Divide Electric Cooperative of Columbus, N. Dak.; the manager of the Johnson County Electric Cooperative Association of Cleburne, Tex.; the director of the North Arkansas Cooperative of Salem, Ark.; the manager of the Morgan County Rural Electric Membership Corporation of Martinsville, Ind.; the president of the board of directors of the Sheyenne Valley Electric Cooperative of Finley, N. Dak.; the manager of the Marlboro Electric Cooperative of Bennettsville, S.C.; the president of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association; the manager of the Sam Houston Electric Cooperative of Livingston, Tex.; the manager of the Williams Electric Cooperative of Williston, N. Dak.; the president of the board of directors of the Verendrye Electric Cooperative of Velva, N. Dak.; the executive manager of the Tarheel Electric Membership Association of Raleigh, N.C.

That is an illustration of the support given to this bill by those who are the beneficiaries of this great program which this Congress put into effect years ago under Democratic leadership.

I might also say that at the time of the hearings a representative of the General Accounting Office who appeared, John W. Moore, legislative attorney, was asked this question:

> If the REA were put in the same status as the Farm Credit Administration by becoming an independent agency, but with certain housekeeping facilities in the Department of Agriculture, such an action would in no way do violence to the good management principles that you have mentioned, would it?

That is what this bill undertakes to do. This bill also does nothing more than what the Maritime Administration now has the power to do in the Department of Commerce. They are in there for housekeeping purposes. But they have the final say in connection with loans and in passing upon any loans or subsidies that come before the Maritime Administration of the Department of Commerce. There are other agencies that are parts of departments that have the same autonomy in connection with the making of loans but are part of a department for housekeeping purposes.

In connection with Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953, a number of Members at that time expressed concern about the power to change functions of the REA without notice. They were assured that this would not be done. One Member of the Senate said:

> We have the Secretary virtually giving notice that he will make public his plans for major changes.

Another Member of the Senate, a former Secretary of Agriculture, said:

> It requires the Secretary, to the extent practicable, to give appropriate advance public notice of delegations of functions and to afford opportunity for interested persons or groups to place their views before the Department.

Our former colleague, Cliff Hope, speaking when the resolution was up before the House, assured us that the Secretary would be required to give public notice of important changes and the opportunity of interested persons to be heard.

Speaking for himself, Secretary Benson said it was his intention and that of the Department "to consult with Members of Congress and with farm organizations and other interested groups. We do not expect to make any major changes in organization without full consultation and advice."

For nearly 4 years nothing happened. Then the secret directive was issued. Nobody was advised. Members of Congress were not advised or consulted. The committees of Congress were not advised or consulted. The farm groups interested were not advised or consulted. It was only by accident that it was found out, when the manager of a cooperative that had filed an application upon which it was important to have action before the end of the fiscal year 1957 made inquiry in connection with that action and was informed about the new directive, that he had to give additional information.

As a result of that Members of Congress tried to get information. The interested rural electrification cooperatives tried to get information, but they could not get information. It was only after several weeks of strong probing by Members of Congress that they were able to get the information about this important change, this major change in connection with the Rural Electrification Administration.

This change means that somebody appointed by the Secretary, whose office is not established by the Congress specifically, who is appointed by the Secretary, for all practical purposes supersedes a man appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration, not to review after the fact but to review all applications of $500,000 or more, now $1 million or more, before the fact.

You all know the story of the Indiana case, you all know it was held up, you all know an important policy was involved. The Administrator, Mr. Hamil, testified that he had a consultation in the Secretary's office with representatives of the Department of Public Utilities of the State of Indiana, and that later he went over to the White House and had a conference with some persons there about the Indiana application.

This is a major change, this is a radical change, this is a violation of the promise made by the Secretary himself to the Congress of the United States. This means that one not appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate is in a position where he can dictate policy in connection with this important agency, which is of such vital importance to millions of persons who live on the farm and till the soil for a living.

So the case is clear. You and I know the reason for putting that order through secretly. If they gave public notice, if they had consulted with the farm organizations, if they had consulted with the committees of Congress and Members of Congress, there would be a rousing of public opinion with knowledge of the proposed change. Public opinion among our farming communities and among Members of Congress representing farm districts would have been so strong that they would not have dared to put that directive through superseding the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration, a Senate-confirmed official, by one who was simply an appointee of the Secretary of Agriculture.

The case is clear. There are other agencies in the same position as this agency will be, if this law is passed, where for housekeeping purposes, they are a part of a department, but they have an autonomy within themselves in carrying out the major purposes of the law they administer and which Congress passed. In this case, we are simply doing what the Congress intended to do, which was circumvented by a secret order. Congress should pass this law not only to carry out our intent, but to protect the great farming communities of our country.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MEADER], a member of the committee.

Mr. MEADER. Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest to the remarks of the distinguished majority leader, with whom it has been my pleasure to serve on the Committee on Government Operations during my entire career in the House of Representatives. He has made a stirring appeal but he has employed inflammatory phrases such as "a secret order" and has charged the Secretary of Agriculture with violating a certain promise made to the Congress of the United States.

I was present when Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953 was considered by the Committee on Government Operations. The majority leader more than once during those proceedings indicated that, in general, he favored Reorganization Plan No. 2. He very carefully went over with the Secretary, Mr. Benson, this very matter of consultation with Congress on major changes.

So that there may be no mistake or misunderstanding, I want to read one of these passages from the record of our hearings. I may say also that the majority leader asked the same question of our former colleague, Mr. Hope, of Kansas, who was also a witness in favor of that reorganization plan. I quote from page 92 of our hearings of May 21 and 25 of 1953. Secretary Benson was the witness and Mr. McCORMACK was interrogating him.

Mr. McCORMACK. Well, not to quibble—I am not going to quibble—you have stated and you now definitely state for the record that before any changes take place, if this reorganization plan becomes effective, in addition to consulting with others, on proper public notice, hearing on major matters, and so forth, you are going to consult with the Democratic members of the committee as well as the Republican members of the committee?

Secretary BENSON. Well, I think, Congressman, certainly on any major change proposed we would want to consult with the Republican and Democratic Members of Congress.

Mr. McCORMACK. Well, I said——

Secretary BENSON (interrupting). Now, you wouldn't want us to do that on every minor change that was to be done from day to day.

Mr. McCORMACK. I said major.

Secretary BENSON. On major changes; yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Now, what would you call a major change?

Secretary BENSON. I think this provision dealing with marketing—

Which had been discussed a few minutes earlier—as we envision it, would be a major change. I think if we proposed the consolidation of any two agencies or any important functions of two agencies, that would be a major change.

It is pretty hard to describe what is a major and what is a minor change.

Mr. McCORMACK. I agree with that. I am just trying to get an understanding of what is in your mind.

The gentleman who just preceded me, the majority leader, more or less assumes that what was done here, which he calls a secret order was a major change of the character discussed before our committee.

I submit it was not a major change but merely the exercise of control by the head of a department. This involves no consolidation of agencies within the Department of Agriculture. It involves no consolidation of functions within the agencies in the Department of Agriculture. It involves day-to-day supervision of the subordinates within the Department of Agriculture and nothing more.

Now I ask the majority leader, who has frequently stood on this floor and upheld the separation of powers of government, even to the extent of indicating that Congress is not entitled to information from the executive branch, if he would try to set up whirlpools of government as they are called by Dr. Ernest S. Griffith in his book "Congress—Its Contemporary Role"—pages 37–39.

Does the majority leader believe individual Members of Congress should interfere in the daily administration of the functions of the executive branch of the Government?

Is he suggesting that before the Secretary of Agriculture can sign a letter he must come over here and talk to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and the ranking minority member of that committee?

Is he suggesting that we inject ourselves into the administration of the affairs of the executive branch of the Government? I hope not, because we have enough to do to attend to our own business.

The Congress acts by the action of committees and the House and the Senate. It does not act through individual Members of Congress, consulting with departments, of which there is no record and could be no official record.

If major changes are contemplated the reorganization plan itself contains a provision included at the request of the Secretary of Agriculture, for advance notice and hearing. There is not any suggestion that that provision has been violated. The hearing record of the committee does not justify the attack the majority leader has made on the Secretary of Agriculture nor the flammatory phraseology he used in discussing this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to H.R. 1321 because, first, it flaunts sound principles of administration and good government, and second, because the burden of proof has not been sustained. Indeed, not even a prima facie case has been made to justify this proposed change in law.

Students of government agree that a basic principle of sound administration is that authority and responsibilty go hand in hand; that clear lines of authority or channels of command between a top administrator and subordinates must be established and maintained.

That philosophy has been expressed repeatedly by the Hoover Commission on reorganization of the executive branch of the Government, and has been endorsed by the Congress both expressly and by its action, particularly by its approval of reorganization plans growing out of the Hoover Commission's studies. Those studies had as their objective centralization of administrative power in the head of departments with full authority to delegate portions of it to subordinates and to hold them responsible.

Such sound philosophy of governmental structure runs through the legislative history of congressional efforts to bring the sprawling military services and their respective semiautonomous divisions, corps, and bureaus under centralized control of the Department of Defense. There should be no disagreement among us on that basic principle.

It must likewise be clear that the purpose of the bill before use is to move in the opposite direction, away from such vital centralization and clear channels of authority.

The bill in its effect disperses and fragments governmental authority and, as I stated at the outset, flaunts and violates sound principles of administration. It sets bad precedent. It places beyond the control of the Secretary of Agriculture and perhaps even the Chief Executive the supervision of the only function in the Rural Electrification Administration that amounts to anything; namely, the granting of loans. It might be said the bill is not only one of diffusion but confusion.

It should be clearer to—and we would be more candid with—the American people if the bill provided outright for repeal of Reorganization Plan 2 of 1939 and Reorganization Plan 2 of 1953 and recreated the REA as an independent autonomous body wholly outside any department of Government. But H.R. 1321 leaves REA in the Department of Agriculture, leading to the impression that the Cabinet officer who heads that Department has some authority over it and over the REA Administrator as his subordinate. In fact, the Secretary of Agriculture, if this bill is adopted, would have no such control and supervision.

Thus, if we are to take the action which is the object of this measure, it would be far preferable in my opinion to go all the way and give REA complete autonomy than do as some want to, to leave it within the Department of Agriculture with apparent but no real control.

What case has been made for this departure from sound principles of government? From the committee's record it appears that absolutely no case has been made, not even a prima facie one.

Other speakers have quoted amply from the RECORD to show that no loan has been disapproved by virtue of the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture and that the Administrator in exercising the functions delegated to him by the Secretary of Agriculture has been free from any interference. For emphasis I quote the following passage from the testimony of Mr. Hamil, the Administrator, on page 34 of the committee hearings:

Secretary Benson has made no change in the organization, authorities, functions or policies of REA.

The informal procedure whereby proposed supplemental loans in excess of one-half million dollars—now $1 million—and proposed loans to new borrowers are discussed with Mr. Kenneth L. Scott, Director of Agricultural Credit Services, has not resulted in the rejection of a single loan or in any appreciable delay.

In not a single instance has Secretary Benson or Director Scott interferred in the discharge of my responsibilities as Administrator of REA. I make the loans.

The emotional charges of political interference are without support in the RECORD. The person with whom the REA Administrator is required to consult on behalf of the Secretary of Agriculture is Mr. Kenneth L. Scott, Director of Agriculture Credit Services. Mr. Scott has been with the Department of Agriculture since 1934, for 20 years with the Farm Credit Administration, and since 1954, in his present position. How can we base legislative judgment on a tacit assumption of political interference when the facts are all to the contrary?

Mr. Chairman, I appeal to my colleagues not to embark on this dangerous course of creating autonomous little kingdoms in the executive branch of the Government. If the cooperative association lobby succeeds in this movement to place REA outside the channels of control of the administration of the executive branch, what will come next? The Corps of Engineers, the Bureau of Reclamation. What other bureaus having functions of interest to a particular segment of our population will seek to free themselves from supervision and control of Cabinet officers.

It is perfectly obvious that if the precedent established today encourages a widespread movement toward dispersal and fragmentation of Government functions, the executive branch of the Government must become an unmanageable hodge-podge of sovereign, autonomous bureaucracies. Congress will find its control weakened to the point of disappearance.

I hope H.R. 1321 will be resoundingly defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MEADER] has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARRY].

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Chairman, we have heard eloquently from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MEADER], whose factual testimony cuts through the haze of oratory presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

In the course of the remarks delivered by the gentleman from Massachusetts he also stated something about an Indiana situation; an application that was made by the REA of Indiana.

Yesterday we heard considerable testimony with respect to this loan application from his side of the aisle. I would like to take occasion to look at the record with your indulgence on this phase of the majority leader's statement this morning. I refer to the statement of David A. Hamil, Administrator, REA before the Government Operations Committee hearings of 1958, page 212, with regard to this loan application for Indiana:

> An application for about $42 million was received on May 10, 1957, from a federation of Indiana distribution cooperatives called Hoosier Cooperative Energy, Inc. The cooperative proposes a lease-operation arrangement with the aluminum wire firm of Richards & Associates, which planned to use surplus power for operation of a new aluminum plant.
> REA met numerous times with representatives of the Hoosier group and their engineers, the Southern Engineering Co. Over a period of many months the Hoosier group revised its plans, reviewed its engineering studies, keeping pace with changing conditions in its negotiations with the aluminum firm. Through October and November of last year these changes were major in nature, and in mid-December REA was advised by the Hoosier group that they no longer wished to consider a lease-operation arrangement with the aluminum company. They wanted to enter into an outright sale-of-power arrangement. Necessary information in respect to this proposal has not been submitted to REA, and we have been unable, for that reason, to further process the application.
> Our latest information is that the Hoosier group no longer plans to serve the aluminum plant, and is working on another plan of operation. REA has no details of this new proposal, nor do we know when a new or revised loan application will be submitted.
> REA's processing of the Hoosier application has been normal in every respect. We neither speed up nor hold back on loan processing. We take them as they come, insisting only that they stand on their merits.

Mr. Chairman, yesterday morning it was my good fortune to witness the dedication of the Taft Memorial, honoring that great statesman, Senator Robert A. Taft, who, for so many years, championed integrity in Government and sound principles of management for the Nation. In yesterday's special tribute, former President Herbert Hoover said that Bob Taft for years struggled against great odds to prevent legislators from "changing for change sake rather than for improvement." I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if we are not dangerously near that very position today while in the shadow of the gracious Taft Memorial which should certainly serve as a reminder of his sound philosophy of government.

During the course of the hearings on this bill, there is not one iota of evidence to show that there was ever a single REA loan turned down because of the REA being in the Department of Agriculture, or particularly because the Secretary of Agriculture has a right of review over the loans that the REA made—and yet some would change it. The Administrator of the REA has stated and I quote:

> Benson has made no change in the organization authority, function or policies of REA.

And the Administrator went on to say further that the informal procedure we have heard so much about "has not resulted in the rejection of a single loan or any appreciable delay."

What then are the motivating forces that bring this legislation to the floor? Gentlemen, I examined carefully the evidence presented to this Committee, especially by those seeking the adoption of this bill. I refer you to the statement of Clyde Ellis, general manager of the National REA, which appears in the record of hearings on this bill, and I ask you, after perusing this document, if this is not his individual effort wherein he has corraled the REAs throughout the country to get behind this legislation, more with the purpose in mind of showing the strength of the REA for future legislative purposes than the particular issue at hand?

Has this House and this Congress constituted itself as a body to determine who has the naked power to achieve his will even though no gain may be reflected to the people? I think not—and I am confident that a great many of my colleagues also agree. Let the record speak for itself with regard to the intent of the proceedings upon which we are now engaged. I refer again to Mr. Ellis' statement, which appears on page 50 of the hearings, where he complained:

> The act prohibits us from using REA loans to serve any of the most profitable part of the power industry market; that is, we are prohibited from going into the most thickly settled villages and towns of over 1,500 population.

Mr. Ellis makes this statement notwithstanding the fact that, by his own later testimony, 95 percent of the farms of the Nation have been covered by rural electrification or otherwise, and it certainly is recalled by Members of Congress that the original intent of the REA was for the purpose of establishing electric service, and later telephone service to the farms in the rural areas of the Nation where no service previously existed.

There was no intent in the original law to provide electrical services which industry could otherwise have provided. Private capital should be employed in thickly populated villages and communities where it can do the job without Government support. This is in accordance with basic elements of the free enterprise systems upon which this Nation has so long prospered.

Continuing further from Mr. Ellis' statement, he drones on with 10 other major complaints with respect to the provisions of the REA and its problem in competing with private enterprise. Mr. Chairman, this bill is not at all what it purports to be. This bill is designed to be an opening wedge to let the flood gates down on the other complaints in Mr. Ellis' statement that the REA's throughout the Nation would request of this or future Congresses—in order to more effectively compete and drive out private capital throughout areas that are now already supplied with private power and where ample capital is available to do the job without Government subsidy, which, in the words of Senator Taft, amounts to "creeping socialism."

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that in the statement of Mr. Ellis, he consistently uses the word "fear." In fact, beginning on page 51 and continuing for two pages, "fear" is mentioned 12 times or words connoting the same apprehension.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that an act of this House predicated on the unsound principle of change for change's sake, coupled with a psychosis of fear, and contrary to sound management principles of Government, sets a dangerous precedent in reversing reorganization proceedings recommended by the Hoover Commission, and is unworthy of approval by this august body.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HIESTAND].

Mr. HIESTAND. Mr. Chairman, a fundamental of sound organization is that powers must measure up to responsibility. I am sure every Member of this House agrees with that.

Mr. Chairman, the Congress of the United States over the years has established a reputation as among the best of the legislative bodies anywhere in the world.

This has been achieved through careful deliberation and thorough analysis of the facts involved in particular issues. But one of the most important qualities which has usually typified Congress is that we have adhered to basic principles of sound governmental procedure and the placing of responsibility in compliance with good administrative practice.

The passage of H.R. 1321 would create an administrative monstrosity and would be a blot on the reputation of the Congress.

The effect of this bill is inconcievable in that it would leave the REA within the Department of Agriculture subject to the general supervision and direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, but the Administrator of REA would have authority to approve or disapprove loans without the supervision or direction of, or any other control by the Secretary of Agriculture.

In other words the Congress would be telling the Secretary of Agriculture that we are holding him responsible for the supervision and direction of REA as a part of the Department of Agriculture, but would remove from the Secretary any authority over the approval or disapproval of loans which is in essence the lifeblood of the agency.

In the first place, I doubt if there is anyone here who believes that it is good public administration to saddle the Department head with the responsibility for an agency, but remove all of his supervision over that agency.

Secondly, this debate fails to produce any evidence that the REA programs are being interfered with by the Secretary of Agriculture or anyone else in the executive branch. REA's Administrator Dave Hamil, who has high respect on both sides of the aisle, has testified:

> In not a single instance has Secretary Benson or Director Scott interfered in the discharge of my responsibilities as Administrator of REA. I make the loans.

Speaking very frankly the politically inspired lobbyists, including the one who takes up most of the committee reports who are pushing this measure have even failed to present any evidence where the existing procedure has been harmful to REA or a single bona fide loan application has been rejected.

In contrast REA has enjoyed the golden era of its existence during the past 6 or 7 years. For example, loans of $1.2 billion were made during this period contrasted to $2.6 billion loaned in the previous 17½ years of the program.

Let me cite you some additional proof that this whole business is purely a distasteful "tempest in a teapot."

During the last 6 years the following has been achieved:

First. Borrowers delinquent on loans dropped from 45 to 6—systems payments $139 million ahead.

Second. The backlog of applications has dropped. On June 30, 1953, there were 234 applications on hand for $193 million. On December 31, 1958, there were 58 applications on hand for $111.5 million which included one application for $48.5 million.

Think of that, Mr. Chairman, one-fifth of the backlog of pending applications at the end of last year compared to 6 years ago.

Third. Annual power sales are nearly 22 billion kilowatt-hours—double sales in 1952.

Fourth. Net worth of cooperative borrowers has more than tripled. REA has come of age; it has matured.

Now there are two other factors which are disconcerting to many Members of this House and are perhaps an indication of why some want to create this tempest to distract attention from the real problems.

I refer to the fact that 75 percent of new customers being added under the REA program are industrial and nonfarm consumers. One-half of the total power being used by REA systems is for nonfarm use. Then there is the law which allows REA cooperatives to borrow your money from the Treasury at 2 percent though the Treasury has to pay 4 percent for those funds. But that is the law. Congress wrote it. The administration is charged with directing the REA as the law is, and I have every reason to believe the Department is doing a good job.

REA is making tremendous progress and it has not been hampered by anyone in this administration. The passage of this bill would not only be a reflection on the intelligence of the Congress and our knowledge of sound public administrative practice, but it would be a disservice to the American people and the REA program. This is not a matter to be passed over lightly. The passage of this monstrosity would come back to haunt each of us and I urge its referral back to the committee.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of the time on this side to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSEN], former Director of the REA.

Mr. NELSEN. Mr. Chairman, and members of the Committee, I would like to make some brief remarks about this bill, and I am sorry that time does not permit adequate coverage of the things that I think need to be discussed. I have heard a good deal of talk from other members of the Committee, and they were fine, and I want to compliment the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRICE] on the remarks that he made relative to this measure. They were well done and very sincere.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to add this comment, that I do happen to be a farmer. This morning my son turned the switch on at the end of the barn and the barn was cleaned. He turned another switch, and the silage came down for the cattle. The milking operation was handled with electric power delivered on a system that I helped organize. The poles that are still in the ground were put there when I went out with others to get enough members signed up on our system to bring REA to our farm, and I served as vice president of the board.

In the early stages of the history of this program we had a tax bill in Minnesota that was impossible to live with. As a State senator I was the author of the tax bill under which we now operate, one of the best systems in the United States. I later became the administrator of this program, and I administered the program for 3 years. I worked hard at it. I traveled all over the United States. I dealt with many Members of Congress, and I was given wonderful treatment, and I thank all of you for it.

Now I want to address myself to the bill, because time will not permit me to deal with all of the things I wish to develop relative to this measure. I was in the REA from 1953 to 1956. The Reorganization Act which has been talked about here was enacted when I was the Administrator. Never at any time did anybody interfere with me in my operation as REA Administrator, and I know that to be true, and that is true at this time.

Now, then, I want to tell you something else about this program. If this particular act is necessary, if the REA Administrator is being bothered, there is only one thing to do, and that is to make it an independent agency, which the Senate attempted to do. The bill was defeated. Why? That is a good question. But, remember this, the Secretary of Agriculture, if he wishes, could interfere with personnel, he could interfere with the legal division under the Humphrey-Price bill, and if he wishes to hurt the Administrator, he still can. And if the proponents of this measure mean what they say, they should adopt what is known as the Curtis bill, if it is in keeping with the rules of the House to mention that, where the REA becomes a completely separate agency which could be operated in the future without any interference whatsoever. But this, in my opinion, is nothing more than another strawman that they have built up.

I want to tell you what I found in the REA. I found on my desk $200 million of waiting loan applications. I found in the REA about 1,200 to 1,500 of the finest employees who ever worked for the Government of the United States—good people. We revised the procedure under which loans were handled. I was the Administrator. We did it in this way. If it was a good credit risk, where interest and payments were being made, we made the loan. We did not go through all the redtape. The $200 million of applications melted down to nothing overnight.

We have made more loans under this Administration and better loans, and the power rates are lower and the repayment schedule is better and the delinquency record is better.

For example take generation: 1,116,000 kilowatts of capacity in the last 6 years as compared to 1,145,000 kilowatts of capacity in the previous 17 years. With a total of $3.8 billion, $1.2 billion have been made in the last 6 years.

Take the REA telephone program. There were only 7,500 telephones under REA telephone systems in the country prior to 1953. We added 800,000 since that time—think of that. Those who say that the program has been hampered are only building a strawman—and it could well catch fire from some of the hot air that whizzes by.

Now I would like to get down to something else, if time permits. I happen to be a dues-paying member of NRECA. Every year I pay my light bill and every year I pay dues. I believe we need organizations. But I think we need them not for propaganda, but for the best interests of the REA program.

When I came to Washington the word went out, not by journalists of high quality, of which we have many, but by the paid writers, and most of the lines went something like this: "Program running like dry creek," "don't wiggle, little catfish, we are just going to cut your guts out," "REA at the crossroads," "G. and T. program dead," "Power lobby takes over," and so forth.

Those statements appeared in magazines all over the United States.

It was reported that we were going to scuttle the REA program. The strawman gradually became bigger and bigger and bigger and he almost came to life. It took almost all of our time to defend our own position and keep the fact straight. At the same time, the program is better today than it ever has been. I have a personal interest in this program, because when I clean my barn every morning, it is done by electric power—a great help on the farm. And by the way, the substance that goes out is much better in quality than some of the stuff I hear that passes for political argument.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NELSEN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Before the gentleman leaves that point, in what magazines did those articles appear?

Mr. NELSEN. Almost any magazine that would print them. They have appeared in some of our national magazines. Some appeared in trade journals, and what-have-you—whoever would print them. I want to say that many of the people who printed them took them in good faith.

Here is a report from the Government Operations Committee. I was investigated. There are Members on this floor who were on the committee when I was investigated. The charges were a shotgun wedding.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NELSEN. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Was that the time when those Members from, I believe, southeast Colorado came in and the committee would not hear them? That was the Chudoff Committee.

Mr. NELSEN. That is right. Some of the witnesses were contacted by staff members before they appeared before the committee. It was a shotgun wedding. If you read the report you will find in it, "It has been reported—" "There are those who believe—" "There are some who are of the opinion—" "Rumors are—".

They are not direct charges. And, believe it or not, I was investigated for just one thing that I think is really funny. It does not appear in this report.

I was investigated because I drank coffee with some friends—Republican—in Minnesota. In my opinion the whole investigation was nothing more than taxpayers' dollars being spent on a political hayride to write a political record—to build a strawman. It did not work, not even in a campaign, where of course it was intended to be used, and it was used.

I also want to say this, that this strawman has been built to a great degree by our own national organization, NRECA, of which I am a member. When they are so bold as to send telegrams into my district in political campaigns—when they are so bold as to write speeches attacking me for other men who are running for office to deliver, they are violating the trust that I and my neighbor farmers have placed in them. I regret that it happened. I was tape recorded time after time—recorders followed me around in Denver like little red coaster wagons in the hope that I would slip. NRECA personnel played parts of an Indiana speech, out of context, in New Mexico in the hope that I could be discredited by obvious misrepresentation. It did not work.

I want to say that on their staff are many fine friends of mine. But it is tragic that we should be subjected to these low-level propaganda attacks where facts are misrepresented and tuned to their own fancy. Many members of this House have come to me on this very issue and a number of them have said, "I do not dare vote against this bill because they will make it appear that I am against rural electrification." The facts will be distorted and twisted by that propaganda front, NRECA. I believe that all of us, whether we be farmers or laborers or businessmen, if we have reached the degree of fear where those who practice a technique of propaganda make us afraid to have an honest difference of opinion, then it is about time we look into a few things.

As to this bill, if we believe that REA has been interferred with, which it has not been, then we should divorce it completely, because remember this: Under this bill you are taking away from the Secretary the right to have a voice in the approval or denial of loans, but you would leave in his hands complete authority as to policy, as to personnel. And what could he do? Who knows what a future Secretary of Agriculture could do to the REA. He could say, "Chris Schultz, we think you should be transferred; Reggie Cole and Roy Zook should go to Alaska; Oz Briden, I don't like the way you trim your eyebrows, move over. And so he could still put the finger on many outstanding men, Ralph Foreman, Bill Eastman, Everett Weitzell, Ray Lind.

He could fire the whole group of dedicated men if he wanted to by making it tough for them. He could go down in the Legal Division and say, "I want you to put a flag on this loan." It could happen.

It is a phony issue. I regret that a program that is so near and dear to the farmers of America should be continually placed in this political crossfire and be used in campaign after campaign.

The Farm Credit Administration has been referred to. I hope the day comes when we can have in this REA program a revolving fund of some kind after the pattern of the Farm Credit Administration, where the farmers can finally run their own business. I am one of them, and we can do it. The REA co-ops in my district pay back more to the Government than they borrow. We could operate with a revolving fund.

That about sums up the remarks I have, Mr. Chairman. I am opposed to this bill because it is phony. If I were to vote for this bill I would be admitting there is something wrong, which there is not. I regret that this measure should be on this floor. I am probably one of the few farmers in this room, and I am one of the few that have been with this program since it was conceived, since it was born, and all through its maturity.

I want to refer to a couple of other gentlemen on this floor and compliment them. I will refer to a couple of issues and problems we settled. We had in Kentucky a problem when I came in, a very difficult one. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. NATCHER], who is on the floor, knows about it. The record in the House hearings carries his expression of endorsement of the settlement made. There we finally settled a case that had been in the courts for years, and long before I came along.

The farmers in Kentucky have as a result one of the finest powerplants in the world. Power costs were cut and a fine plant was salvaged from a problem which I inherited when I came to Washington.

It was our privilege to help out in the settling of the long contested Georgia situation, where the REA preference customers worked out a satisfactory arrangement with the Government on hydropower and the power companies on firming and delivery of the power.

I have personal letters from Marshall Pollock and Jim Polhill of Georgia with the sincerest of thank you's for the help the REA gave them, and I personally enjoyed a thank you from Congressman FLYNT of Georgia.

We worked hard. We did our best. We made mistakes, but when we did, they were honest ones.

Summing up the mechanics of the bill under consideration in detail, it appears that the significance of the bill is far from clear, but it appears that it could have two possible fundamental interpretations, each of which would be equally undesirable for different reasons.

The first possible interpretation is that the bill in effect would vest practically all of the powers relative to the REA in the Administrator, but yet the Secretary of Agriculture would be left under it with the general function of directing and supervising the REA. The bill provides that functions relative to the REA transferred to the Department of Agriculture and its Secretary by reorganization plans of 1939 and 1953 would be transferred to the Administrator of the REA, and that officer would have the authority to approve or disapprove loans without any review by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Now, Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1939 provides in section 402 that the control of records, property, and personnel of the agencies transferred—including REA—is to be vested in the Secretary of the department concerned. The control of funds was transferred to him by section 403, and the control of personnel was specifically covered by section 404. Now if the functions and activities relative to the REA that were transferred to the Secretary by this plan are transferred back to the Administrator, then all authority over records, personnel, property, and funds would be placed in the hands of the Administrator. The approval of loans would also be in his hands.

But the Secretary of Agriculture would be left in the anomalous position of having general direction and supervision of the REA. Although he would be deprived of the tools needed to perform this function, the Secretary of Agriculture would still be responsible. Only one tool would be left in his hands. Remember, the funds for the REA are advanced to it by the Treasury pursuant to an appropriation made by Congress. Now section 3(a) of the Rural Electrification Act of 1936, as amended, provides:

> The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to make loans to the Administrator, upon the request and approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, in such amounts in the aggregate for each fiscal year * * * as the Congress may from time to time determine to be necessary.

Thus the determination of the amount of money to be spent by the REA within an appropriation made by Congress would remain in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture. There is nothing in this bill that would in any way change either section 3(a) of the act of 1936, as amended, or the power of the Secretary under it.

Then, under this first possible interpretation, the Secretary of Agriculture would have general direction and supervision over the REA but practically no authority over the agency for which he is responsible. If the Secretary is deprived of supervision over the end product, how could anyone argue that the REA would be "under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture"? To say the least this would be highly anomalous.

The other possible interpretation of the language of this bill is just as ridiculous. Under this construction the Secretary would still have all possible controls over property, funds, personnel, and procedures of the REA, but he would be deprived only of control over the approval or disapproval of loans. Obviously in this instance it would place the Administrator of the REA in a peculiar position.

The report of the minority of the House Committee on Government Operations spells out specifically this interpretation:

> A literal reading of the bill reported by the majority would leave subject to the Secretary's direction and supervision all of the functions and activities of REA except the bare function of approving and disapproving loans. The Administrator in other vital aspects of administering the Rural Electrification Act and the agency would continue to be subordinate to the Secretary, and subject to his direction, supervision, and control, and to the regulations prescribed by him for the government of the Department, the conduct of its officers and clerks, the distribution and performance of its business (other than the act of approving or refusing to approve loans), and the custody, use, and preservation of the records, papers, and property appertaining to it (5 U.S.C. 22). The preparation and submission of annual loan and administrative fund budgets, the appointment and supervision of personnel, the formulation of loan and other administrative policies and procedures, and all the other activities and functions associated with the administration of REA would continue to be under the Secretary's direction and supervision.

Obviously the minority is correct when it says that "such an arrangement is unworkable." Under this interpretation the Secretary could supervise the selection of personnel, he could determine the procedures to be used by the REA, he could determine the funds to be requested in the REA's budget, he would control its office equipment and supplies, loan procedures would be under his control, legal advice and services would be supplied by the Department; but the actual approval or disapproval of loans would not be subject to the Secretary's control. The final approval or disapproval of loans would be the responsibility of the Administrator alone. It is hard to see how the Administrator could logically be vested with the sole authority to approve or disapprove of loans if the entire operations on which this final act rests are under the direction and supervision of someone else and could be removed from the immediate control of the Administrator.

It is not clear which of these two possible interpretations of the bill is correct. Either one of them would be anomalous, to say the least.

Significantly, neither in 1958 nor in 1959 did the Committee on Government Operations conduct hearings on this specific bill reported to the House. It conducted hearings on a completely different bill that bears no relation to this bill at all. Therefore, the hearings yield no evidence from representatives of the Bureau of the Budget, of the Department of Agriculture, or of REA on how this specific bill might actually be interpeted and applied.

The REA is too important, too vital to American agriculture, for Congress to place it in such an anomalous position.

PROGRESS OF REA PROGRAMS

Profound postwar changes in the character of rural America—including the growth of a large nonfarm population, the increasing use of electricity for farm and home chores, and the development of new rural industries and processing plants—have greatly increased the demand for adequate and reliable electric service in rural areas. In addition, the growing interdependence of city and country has made modern dial telephone service a virtual necessity in rural America. Since 1952, the Rural Electrification Administration has steadily increased the tempo of its activities to help 985 active electric borrowers and 638 rural telephone systems to meet this continuously growing demand for their services.

LOAN NEEDS MET FULLY

Loans to rural electric systems approved during calendar year 1958 totaled $213.8 million, bringing total electric loans approved since inception of the program to $3.8 billion. About $1.2 billion of this total has been made since January 1, 1953. Telephone loans reached the record high of $102.9 million in calendar year 1958. More than 79 percent of all telephone loans and about 31 percent of all electric loans have been made since January 1, 1953.

EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND CONSUMERS ADDED IN 6 YEARS

Some 800,000 new consumers and 180,000 miles of line have been added to the systems of REA electric borrowers since January 1, 1953. The current rate of addition is more than 120,000 consumers a year. Among these new users, nonfarm consumers outnumber farm consumers 3 to 1. Power sales to nonfarm establishments now are greater than to farmers.

Besides this growth in numbers, consumers are using more kilowatt-hours of electricity each year. Annual consumption averaged 3,050 kilowatt-hours per consumer in 1953; in 1958, it was estimated at 4,450 kilowatt-hours. Power sales on systems financed by REA rose 10 percent over 1957 during calendar year 1958, reaching an estimated 21.7 billion kilowatt-hours.

MORE POWER ASSURED FOR RURAL CONSUMERS

Particular attention has been given to borrowers' needs for an expanding supply of power at low cost. REA has pressed the search for more economical means of power production and has assisted borrowers to obtain substantial savings in initial investment and operating costs through interconnection, joint operation, and more efficient generating units.

In calendar year 1958, REA approved loans to provide 214,000 kilowatts of additional generating capacity. Installed capacity stood at nearly 1.3 million kilowatts on January 1, 1959.

During the first 17½ years of the REA electric program, loans provided for a generating capacity of 1,145,000 kilowatts. During the next 6 years—beginning January 1, 1953—loans were approved providing for an additional 1,116,000 kilowatts of generating capacity. Generation and transmission loans have accounted for almost 31 percent of the total loaned for rural electrification since January 1, 1953, compared with 19 percent before that date. Forty-three percent of the 1958 loans were approved for generation and transmission facilities.

During the past 6 years, first loans have been made to five new generation and transmission cooperatives. In addition, one cooperative has successfully negotiated with AEC for construction of a nuclear reactor as part of AEC's power demonstration program, and 20 borrowers or groups of borrowers have obtained access permits for information from AEC. REA itself is keeping abreast of nuclear developments.

FARMERS PAY LESS FOR ELECTRICITY

The average price of power paid by rural residential consumers has dropped more than three-fourths of a cent per kilowatt-hour since 1952. This is due largely to the increased use of electricity. The average price is now about 2.68 cents per kilowatt-hour, lowest in REA history. The wholesale cost to REA distribution borrowers is also at a record low—about 8 percent lower than in 1952.

BETTER TELEPHONES AND MORE OF THEM

In early 1953, only 40 REA telephone borrowers had cut over 85 dial central offices to bring new or improved service to 7,500 subscribers. As of January 1, 1959, 488 borrowers had cut over 1,855 new dial exchanges. Loans approved since January 1, 1953, will benefit about 800,000 farm families and other rural subscribers. Total telephone loans to date will benefit about 1,100,000 rural subscribers.

BORROWERS BUILD FINANCIAL STRENGTH

Given encouragement toward independence and self-reliance, REA borrowers have made substantial financial progress since 1952. Net worth of electrification borrowers has more than tripled, increasing from $161 million at the end of December 1952 to $512 million on December 31, 1958.

During the 6-year period January 1, 1953, to January 1, 1959, the number of electrification borrowers behind in their loan payments dropped from 45 to 6. In the same period, the balance of payments on debt made in advance of due dates rose from $52.5 million to abcut $139 million. In the much newer telephone program, the balance of advance payments amounts to $1 million and all but 16 borrowers are current or ahead of schedule on debt payments.

EFFICIENCY BENEFITS ALL

REA has streamlined its procedures to speed processing of loans, to give improved service to borrowers, and to reduce administrative costs. With 11 percent fewer employees today than in 1952, REA is administering much bigger electric and telephone programs. Working with industry, REA carries on constant research to hold down construction costs and to improve performance and service.

PLANNING FOR FUTURE GROWTH

To help borrowers keep ahead of new power demands, REA has developed new techniques of long-range planning for rural electric systems. As a result, borrowers will be able to schedule construction several years in advance and to expand at minimum cost. New telephone construction also is being planned to meet needs over an extended period.

The effect of this bill is to leave the Rural Electrification Administration within the Department of Agriculture subject to the general supervision and direction of the Secretary of Agriculture except that the Administrator of REA would have authority to approve or disapprove loans without the supervision or direction of, or any other control by, the Secretary of Agriculture. This would be an administrative monstrosity.

The hearings on this bill failed to produce any evidence that the Rural Electrification programs were being interfered with by the Secretary of Agriculture or anyone else in the executive branch. REA Administrator David A. Hamil has testified:

> In not a single instance has Secretary Benson or Director Scott interfered in the discharge of my responsibilities as Administrator of REA. I make the loans.

The charge has been made that the Eisenhower administration is destroying REA. The REA-financed systems have never been in stronger position than they are at this time. Here are some facts from the record:

First. The greatest progress ever during the last 6 years. Loans of $1.2 billion were made during this period compared to $2.6 billion loaned in the previous 17½ years of the program.

Second. Power sales nearly 22 billion kilowatt-hours—double sales in 1952.

Third. Borrowers delinquent on loans dropped from 45 to 6—systems $139 million ahead on payments.

Fourth. Net worth of cooperative borrowers more than tripled. REA has come of age—it has matured.

Fifth. Over 95 percent of the farms and ranches of America have electric power.

Sixth. Seventy-five percent of new customers being added are industrial and nonfarm residential consumers.

Seventh. One-half of total power sales by REA system is for nonfarm use.

Since the adoption of Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1939 the Rural Electrification Administration has been within the Department and subject to the general direction and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture. The purpose of this action and of Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953 was to centralize in the Secretary responsibility for effective administration of all programs within the Department. This coordination of responsibility and authority is in line with the sound congressional policy of vesting functions directly in the Department heads so that they can be held accountable for the performance of their agencies.

For about 20 years REA has been effectively accomplishing its purposes under the general supervision and direction of the Secretary of Agriculture. The REA programs have been especially successful during the past 6 years.

During the hearings on Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953 Secretary Benson assured the committee that he would make no major changes in the REA organization without consulting with the Congress and making known such proposals to the public prior to their becoming effective.

Recently, Secretary Benson said:

> I have made no major change in the REA organization or policies. I have transferred no functions or powers from REA. I have adhered to my assurances and the provisions of Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DENTON].

Mr. DENTON. Mr. Chairman, during a colloquy with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN], yesterday, I discussed the application of the Indiana REA's for an REA loan to construct a powerplant at Petersburg, Ind., and I would like to add to that statement, as I believe the situation in Indiana shows the necessity for this legislation.

It has been said that no application has been turned down because of the order of 1957 giving to the Secretary of Agriculture the power to review applications for REA loans exceeding $500,000. While it is true that the Indiana application has not been actually turned down, nevertheless it was filed in 1957 and no action has been taken on it. It is just the difference between saying "You can't have the money" and not giving it to you.

It has also been said that the Indiana application has been withdrawn. This is what actually happened. Nine Indiana REA's made application for this loan to build the powerplant. Since that time, 7 additional REA's have sought to join in this application, and the application has been withdrawn, as everyone in the REA knows, to be refiled with 16 applicants instead of the original 9.

When the REA was established, it was an independent agency. By giving the Administrator a long term of office of 10 years, it was the intent of Congress that he would be free from political influence. You will notice that his position was very different from that of the Secretary of Agriculture, who is a political appointee and whose term of office would naturally expire with a change of administration.

Since the inception of the REA, the Administrator has had the authority to approve all loans. Claude Wickard had such authority, as did David Hamil until the order of 1957, which gave the Secretary of Agriculture the power to review applications for loans over $500,000. If the Secretary of Agriculture already had this power, why was it necessary to issue this order? If we concede that the Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953 gave the Secretary of Agriculture this power, he had never exercised it. Furthermore, when the Senate Government Operations Committee was considering Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953, the committee was fearful that the Secretary of Agriculture, rather than the REA Administrator would approve these loans; however, Secretary Benson assured them that no change would be made in the REA procedure, unless and until both of the interested committees in Congress were given knowledge of this fact.

As we know, however, Secretary Benson did change that procedure, but has yet to give the interested committees notice. The manner in which the Indiana REA's application for loan was handled demonstrates the need for remedial legislation. As I pointed out in my colloquy with the gentleman from Illinois, the REA Administrator, Mr. Hamil, was processing the application of the Indiana REA's for a loan to build the powerplant at Petersburg, Ind., in the regular manner, when political influence entered the picture.

The Public Service Commission of Indiana, which passes on many phases of the REA's activities, at the request of the Governor of Indiana, lobbied against this application. Public service commission officials conferred with Secretary Benson and Mr. Hamil. After that meeting, conference was held at the White House presided over by Sherman Adams, and immediately following, Secretary Benson issued the order giving himself the power to review loan applications over $500,000 and set up a procedure in his own department to place this authority under one of his assistants. As a result of that action, the loan application of the Indiana REA's has not been approved.

At every crossroads in the State of Indiana during the last political campaign, my party charged that political consideration prevented this loan from being approved, and I never heard this charge denied. In fact, toward the end of the campaign, the opposition apparently came over to our side and indicated that they thought this loan of the Indiana REA's should be approved. It would be difficult to convince the users of REA electricity in Indiana that this loan was not denied because of political considerations.

Approval of this loan would have been very beneficial to the State of Indiana for several reasons: First, it would have enabled the users of REA electricity to receive cheaper electric rates; and second, since this plant would have been built in the district I represent at Petersburg, Ind., in the coalfields where there is much unemployment, it would have brought about greater employment both at this plant, and in the coalfields which would supply coal to the plant. In addition, construction of this plant would bring other industries into the district, such as an aluminum plant, which was proposed at the time the Indiana REA applied for a loan to build the Petersburg plant.

I have a personal reason for wanting to see this legislation enacted, because I do not believe that this loan will ever be approved if Secretary Benson has the right and power to pass on these loans. Also, this same thing might happen in your State—in the district you represent.

The example of the Indiana REA illustrates strongly that we should return to the original intent of the law, that these loans should be processed by the REA Administrator who will not be subject to the same political pressure as might be brought to bear on the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. McGOVERN].

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Chairman, I have long believed that the Federal rural electrification program which has been operating since 1936 is the finest possible example of grassroots democracy. No one can fully evaluate the tremendous contribution that rural electricity has made to the development of our Nation.

The blessings of REA to the farm families of America are realized in the form of electric lights, refrigeration, washing machines, telephones, and power equipment such as milking machines feed grinders, pumps, and numerous other labor-saving devices. Every main-street in a rural area as well as the factories of the Nation have felt the stimulus of millions of dollars of farm purchases of appliances, machinery, and equipment for REA users.

The program has been an inspiring experience in democratic living as farmers have joined together to form REA cooperatives which they have managed and directed with great skill. REA loans have been repaid to the Treasury ahead of schedule and in spite of the low 2-percent interest rate, the Government has shown a net profit of millions of dollars during the near quarter of a century that the program has operated.

Up until 1953, the REA Administrator, presumably the man best equipped for such functions, had full authority to pass on REA loan applications. Since that time, under Government Reorganization Plan No. 2, the Administrator's loan-making authority has been given over to the Secretary of Agriculture for those loans in excess of $500,000.

The legislation now before us would restore full loan-making authority to the REA Administrator. This legislation, known as the Humphrey-Price bill, because of its sponsorship by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota and our able colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRICE], seemed so essential to me that I introduced similar legislation—H.R. 3029—early in this session and testified in its support before the House Government Operations Committee.

It is my strong conviction that the future growth and integrity of rural electrification rests considerably upon our approval of this legislation.

As matters now stand, the REA Administrator has been stripped of his most important function. The careful investigation and approval or disapproval of loans requested by rural electric groups is the major responsibility of the Administrator. When he is deprived of this authority and his functions are transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture, the dignity of REA and the authority of its Administrator to make loans based on nonpolitical considerations are jeopardized.

It has always been the intent of Congress that REA loans are to be made provided they meet proper feasibility criteria. Political considerations or personal inclinations have no place in this decision.

Why, then, should the Administrator best equipped to pass on the technical characteristics of a loan request have his judgment overruled by another official? The REA Administrator has a competent technical staff that has already investigated the merits of a loan application before it is sent on to the Secretary of Agriculture for review. What kind of a review is then made by the Secretary? Is it another technical review? If so, is not this a case of wasteful duplication of effort. If it is not a technical review, can it be a political test or some other hurdle based on the personal philosophy or prejudices of the Secretary of Agriculture? If so, the quicker we stop this practice, the better it will be for the rural electric users of the country.

Although I have a particular lack of confidence in the present Secretary of Agriculture and the present administration's attitude toward REA, I would not want any Secretary of Agriculture, Democratic or Republican, duplicating the functions of the REA Administrator or overruling his judgment on loan decisions.

On the other hand, I see nothing to be gained and much that could be lost in the more extreme proposals that have been made to set up a completely separate Rural Electrification Administration independent of the Department of Agriculture.

If we pass the legislation before us to restore the loan-making authority of the REA Administrator, REA can continue to benefit from its relationship to the Department of Agriculture more than it would from a completely independent status as a new agency.

As an independent agency it would lose the present benefit of a Cabinet level spokesman in the fight for appropriations. Furthermore, the congressional committees now handling REA matters have had long experience with the program. This does not mean that a new set of committees would be hostile, but a continuation of the present committee responsibility leaves rural electric leaders and members with a more certain knowledge as to where they stand with the Congress. Finally, why should we add further to the maze of Federal agencies by creating yet another new one when historical experience demonstrates that the existing operation can be made fully effective through the moderate proposal contained in the Humphrey-Price legislation?

I strongly urge the Congress to act favorably on this legislation by restoring the loanmaking authority of the REA Administrator.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have the privilege of extending their remarks at this point in the RECORD on this bill.

Mr. FASCELL. I will make a request when we get back into the House that Members may extend their remarks in the proceedings on the bill, but I have already agreed to yield to Members at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is withdrawn.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the courtesy of the committee in allowing me to make some remarks about this bill.

I want to congratulate the distinguished chairman of this committee for this constructive measure.

I enthusiastically support this bill. I feel very deeply that any board, agency, or administrator in Government charged with the responsibility of making loans should be free and independent of political control or veto by a Cabinet member. Congressional appropriation power and congressional legislative power are sufficient political supervision and policy control.

To subject loans to political approval by a Cabinet member is to invite abuse. A Cabinet member is a political appointee, whose term of office is concurrent with and dependent on the President's tenure. In a given 4-year period, you might get one who is completely out of sympathy with the agency's purpose and operation. If so, he could scuttle or strangle it by disapproving loans unjustifiably.

Conversely, the Cabinet member in another period could be overzealous and want to extend the agency's functions far afield from the original purpose; and he might approve excessive loans unjustifiably.

Or, through prejudice and favoritism, the Cabinet member could grant some loans and deny others, and thereby abuse his authority.

As a matter of principle, it is a mistake to superimpose a Cabinet member or a combination of Cabinet members over and above any loan-making agency.

And, Mr. Chairman, I submit that I am not alone in that belief. Last year, the Small Business Committee of the House—of which I am a member—held extensive hearings on equity capital and long-term loans for small business.

In April, we were in the process of formulating a bill to submit to Congress creating capital banks, and we were getting the counsel of the members of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve. One of the bills provided an ex officio loan policy committee at the top of the organization structure, a committee comprised of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce as two of three members.

Gov. James K. Vardemann opposed this idea vehemently, stating in part—and I quote the printed transcript of the hearings:

> The biggest objection to them—

Meaning the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce—> is that they are partisan national political creatures. They are appointed by the President, as his Cabinet, and as such they are going to follow the party line as dictated by the President.

Governor Vardemann pleaded for an independent policy board, subject only to congressional appropriation control; and, quoting the governor further in the hearings:

> Once you put the men on this Board, they should be free of political and economic domination from any individual group, or party or anybody else during their term of office.

It has been said that an administrator is, in fact, a political appointee of the President approved by the Senate. But oh—there is a big difference—the independence of tenure. The REA Administrator serves for 10 years. He will serve under at least two Presidents. His tenure makes him, at least, a semipolitical appointee with indisputable independence, if he's half a man.

The REA is a Federal lending agency. It exists for the express purpose of making loans to further rural electrification. The approval of those loans is the function of the REA Administrator and his large and capable staff. The decision as to whether or not a loan should be made is supposed to depend on the merits of each case. If a loan applicant qualifies for a loan, and if the REA Administrator finds the loan is feasible from an economic and engineering standpoint, that loan is supposed to be in order. The loan is not supposed to pass any sort of political or philosophical test imposed by any member of the President's Cabinet. The people's Congress can apply ample philosophical and policy control.

Yet we find that without the knowledge of Congress, the Secretary of Agriculture directed that applications for loans over $500,000 be sent over to his office for approval. This gave the Secretary a veto power over some 80 percent of the loans, dollarwise, made by the REA last year.

Now I don't know whether the present Secretary of Agriculture has exercised or abused this authority. I suggest that we could just concede that the present Secretary—Mr. Benson—is as perfect as he says he is, that his intentions are as pure as the driven snow. But what about the next Secretary or the one after that?

No Secretary of Agriculture should have review authority or veto power over any REA loan, $5,000 or $500,000. And, I suggest that some of the people who so strongly favor this setup while they have their Secretary will be sick of it when they lose their Secretary. This authority lodged in a political appointee casts a political shadow over the REA procedure where there was none before.

I think this bill will eliminate that shadow. I think it will restore the faith of rural people in the loan procedures of the Rural Electrification Administration. I think it will restore the independent, nonpartisan stature which REA must have if it is to fulfill its original purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I am proud to support this measure and I sincerely hope it will receive the favorable consideration of this Committee and the Congress.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT].

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Chairman, the words of the majority leader, Mr. MCCORMACK, and the other able Members who have spoken in support of this bill clearly prove its justification and need.

Mr. Chairman, there are many valid and practical reasons for the enactment of H.R. 1321. I merely want to emphasize two of these many reasons for I believe they are at the heart of the matter.

First, it should be noted that Congress intended that the REA Administrator exercise independence of judgment far removed from political or partisan considerations. This intent has not been followed since 1957 when the Secretary of Agriculture took over the loanmaking authority of the Administrator. No one has really been successful in discovering the standards which have been established for the loan review setup.

Second, the past history of the operation of the REA does not warrant the interference in loanmaking policy by the Secretary of Agriculture. The record shows that REA functioned efficiently and successfully from 1939 to 1957. During this period REA was under the general supervision and direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, but the REA Administrator had the final say-so on loans. This concept of independence of departmental control in specified matters is practiced by other Government agencies such as the Department of Commerce, to cite just one example.

During the 1939–1957 period, we saw great advances in farm electrification. Three billion dollars in sound loans have been made, with $1 billion already paid back to the Government. H.R. 1321 proposes to restore REA to the position it had during the 23 years in which a successful record was achieved. I hope this legislation will be overwhelmingly supported.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BROCK].

Mr. BROCK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the pending measure, H.R. 1321.

I am not a johnny-come-lately in the REA field. I have had the honor and privilege of consulting with the late Senator George Norris, Nebraska, the father of the REA, when this program was being formulated for subsequent legislative action. During the ensuing years, it has been my further privilege to continuously work in conjunction with the REA representatives, the rural public power people throughout the country, as well as serving in the official capacity as president of my own public power district for 14 years. In fact, it became necessary for me to resign my position as vice president of the State of Nebraska REA in order to run for my present office as a Representative in this body.

Because of these former connections over the period of years, in which the REA was developing into a stable, helpful and necessary agency, the future of this agency gives me great concern. My personal knowledge of its needs to function properly for the purpose it was created prompts my remarks on this occasion. It is also my knowledge that the REA consumers throughout the United States want the membership on both sides of the aisle to support this measure.

The National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, composed of the membership of similar electric cooperatives in the several States, including my State of Nebraska, has taken a definite position on this legislation. Our experience in dealing with the existing authority and control of REA, within the jurisdiction of the Secretary and Department of Agriculture, has been very unsatisfactory. Ninety percent of the rural electric systems in the United States have gone on record as opposing the present setup of the REA. They have expressed their views in convention assembled as recently as February of this year. They resolved to ask the Congress to restore the REA to the status of an independent agency, the status which was the original intent and purpose of the Congress when REA first came into being. The rural electric systems, who are the borrowers from REA, have no confidence in the policies of the Secretary of Agriculture and are unalterably opposed to his usurpation of the powers previously granted to the REA Administrator.

The Speaker himself, when addressing the recent annual meeting of the delegates from the rural electric systems said:

> We in the Congress do not believe that this should be administered by any Cabinet officer, but we believe it should be administered by an Administrator appointed for the purpose for which he should be, and one whose vital interest is in this program.

Mr. Chairman, those words were well chosen, and emphasizes the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture is not only out of step with the original intent and purpose of the Congress when it created the REA, nor has he at any time exhibited even a sympathetic interest in the expanding programs of the REA, which has contributed much to a better life for our stable rural citizens.

The Benson order of May or June 1957, which stripped the REA Administrator of the loan powers he previously exercised without interference, fits into a master plan that has for its objective the ultimate destruction of the REA program, as we have known it and seen it function successfully for the past 24 years.

Mr. Chairman, if we are going to legislate the loan authority back to final jurisdiction of the REA Administrator, it stands to reason that we should go the whole cloth, and restore the agency back to its original independent status.

The Speaker also stated to the delegates:

> We in the Congress intend, if fighting will do the job, if using reason and good common sense will do the job, to keep rural electrification on the track it has been running for nearly 25 years.

Mr. Chairman, this appears to be good sound logic.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. The minority was given to understand a few moments ago, upon inquiry made of the majority, that there would only be one speaker, one remaining speaker on that side, and for that reason we yielded back the remaining time on this side. I just wonder how many Members are going to make speeches after we had that understanding.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, our concluding speaker is a member of the committee, and we have two more——

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I know, but we had what I thought was the concluding speech and then we have had two or three speeches here already after agreement was made that there would be one remaining speaker on the majority side and one on the minority side when with that understanding we yielded back the time.

Mr. FASCELL. I am sorry the gentleman misunderstood.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Well, the record speaks for itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time being used now is the time of the gentleman from Florida since the time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the time of the gentleman has expired. I have been here a long time and I understand the rules of the House, I may say to the Chair, but I also understand that there is an agreement made between the majority leadership in control of this bill and the minority leadership in charge of this bill that there was only one remaining speaker on that side, and since that time we put on our one remaining speaker, and then there have been several speakers in support of the bill. I am just inquiring now, how many more speakers we may expect to hear from under that previous agreement. I would just like to find out where we are.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of the time to conclude debate to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I yield.

Mr. PRICE. With the permission of the gentleman from Iowa, I take this time to set the record straight on the comparative amounts of funds appropriated to the REA in recent years, since frequent reference has been made to this factor in the debate on the bill.

The average per year appropriations for the REA during the period of 1946 to 1953 was $281 million a year. During the term as REA Administrator, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who has just addressed the House, the average per year appropriation was $175 million a year.

During the last 2 years, 1957 and 1958, the average per year appropriation was $271 million. This would indicate a considerable lead during the period from 1946 to 1953.

The following table will indicate just the amount of the loans approved:

Gross REA electric loans since World War II

[In millions]

FISCAL YEAR AND AMOUNT APPROVED
During term of Claude Wickard, Administrator:
1946	$291

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSEN] has made a very fine argument on how well this program worked before the secret order involved was issued and before the famous rendezvous at the White House, including anti-REA people, Sherman Adams, and the Secretary's representative, Mr. Scott. It is a fine presentation of how well it worked before that time.

He has also rendered a service in pointing out to this body how important it is that these programs continue to expand, for this reason: As technology brings forth more electrical conveniences and as farmers can, they want to add to the electrical machines used on the farm. This is the reason we must continue to expand the supply of electricity. There is also a great benefit resulting to those who produce and merchandise electrical equipment.

He also makes another point I would like to discuss. As I understand, he says that the Secretary of Agriculture will still be able to render harm to the REA program, even if this bill is passed. I submit that is true. But we cannot, until 1960, cure that situation. Congress cannot change the Secretary of Agriculture—that is a decision for the voters in 1960. In the interim all we can do is whatever can be done by passage of legislation. That is the reason for the bill under consideration.

In summarizing the arguments on the bill under consideration, I would like to say that it is in essence a bill to outlaw the use of a concealed weapon. The concealed weapon in this case is the secret oral order issued by the Secretary of Agriculture in 1957 following a conference of anti-REA people at the White House. The weapon even changes caliber from time to time. One time, when the Director of Agricultural Services, Mr. Scott, came before the committee, he said the order applied to all loans over $500,000. The next time it was on all loans over a million dollars. For all we know, it may be applicable to all loans over $1,000 today. There is no way of knowing. It is one of those concealed weapons that is so difficult to control that you must outlaw it.

The arguments used on this floor to oppose this bill are the same arguments used by defendants being prosecuted for carrying a concealed weapon. The argument in both cases has been, "Why prosecute me? You have not proved that I killed anybody yet." There is obviously a greater reason involved for this secret order that was issued than what has generally been conceded by the opponents of this bill.

I point to page 40 of the hearings and to questions asked of Mr. Scott by myself and others. It was pointed out at that time that through this order, Mr. Scott could do to the REA program the same thing he did to the watershed program, wherein he instituted a policy which said: "You cannot receive a watershed loan unless you can prove to me that you cannot get the loan elsewhere."

Under these loans, the amount of interest cost to the applicant can be important. Under the order in the watershed program, you had to get a loan elsewhere if you could regardless of the interest cost. That same policy could be instituted here. It would be easy to do under this kind of order if it is allowed to stand and would be consistent with the announced plan of the administration to raise interest rates on REA loans.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] and others have said that there was no testimony given or taken that the Secretary of Agriculture has ever interfered in any way with the Director of REA in making these loans. The gentlemen from Indiana [Mr. DENTON and Mr. WAMPLER] spoke about one case in Indiana. Now maybe Mr. Benson was not there but his assistant, Mr. Scott, was there and I say what difference does it make if the assistant Mr. Scott is there instead of Mr. Benson and especially when Sherman Adams was there, too? What more do you need to electrify the rural electric communities of America and cause alarm in those communities?

Certainly it would, and it did; and as a result there appeared all of these items that were mentioned in the various farm journals and publications of the country. REA users became concerned because administration of the REA program had been thrown headlong into politics.

I think I should point out also that this bill, if amended as proposed by the committee, will not be the same bill that was originally introduced. There were some objections to the wording of the bill, and the committee is proposing to substitute the provisions of a bill I happened to introduce, H.R. 5688. The bill as amended should meet the objections heard to the wording of H.R. 1321. In considering this revised bill, I say you will have to be a great friend indeed of this administration's high interest policy and the Secretary of Agriculture to vote against this bill.

I urge you to vote for the bill for the benefit of the rural electric communities of America and those who produce and sell and repair electric appliances.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired; all time has expired.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1 of Reorganization Plan Numbered 2 of 1953 shall not hereafter apply to the Rural Electrification Administration, and there are hereby transferred to the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration all functions which were transferred from the Administrator to the Secretary of Agriculture by such reorganization plan; and notwithstanding the provisions of section 5 of Reorganization Plan Numbered 2 of 1939, or the provisions of any other law, any action of the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration with respect to the approval or denial of loans authorized to be made under the provisions of the Rural Electrification Act of 1936, as amended, shall be the sole responsibility of the Administrator.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That the functions and activities of the Rural Electrification Administration and the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration which were transferred to the Department of Agriculture and to the Secretary of Agriculture by Reorganization Plan No. II of 1939 and Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953 are hereby transferred to the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration, and shall be exercised and administered within the Department of Agriculture by such Administrator under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture; except that insofar as such functions relate to the approval or disapproval of loans authorized to be made under the Rural Electrification Act of 1936, as amended, their exercise by the Administrator shall not be subject to the supervision or direction of, or to any other control by, the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

WILL CONGRESSIONAL FOLLY AID RUSSIA TO ESTABLISH COMMUNISM THROUGHOUT WORLD?—RUSSIA'S PURPOSE

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, speaking generally, we have accepted the theory that the present purpose of Russia is to establish communism throughout the world—destroy what we are pleased to call the free world.

We assume that self-preservation now demands that as a people and a nation we do our utmost to defeat that objective. We likewise seem to admit that as a nation we are so weak in national resources, in economic strength, in technical knowledge, in military ability, that we are dependent upon other nations for our continued existence.

It is true that, since the adoption of the Marshall plan, in opposing the spread of communism, we have, through foreign aid, spent some $22.759 billion for military supplies and services; $34.516 billion in economic and technical aid grants; and $14.277 billion in new credits or loans. Apparently, we have accepted as our duty the policy of making loans and extending financial and technical aid, the actual value of which cannot be estimated.

Surrendering a part of our national independence, of the control of our own destiny, we became a part of the United Nations which has 82 members; we became a part of a military alliance with 14 other nations when we became a member of NATO; we are now bound in a common bond which binds us to participate in every war in which any of our allies may become rightfully or wrongfully involved.

We are no longer the masters of our destiny.

We are no longer a free and independent nation.

Economically and militarily, we are but one nation of a group. The Congress is no longer the sole authority to involve us in war, even though the Constitution so provides.

Our material resources, including as well the youth of our land and our scientific knowledge, are handcuffed to the decisions of those in control in other lands.

Although we no longer have the ability to abstain from war or to formulate our own foreign policy—those in control now have the authority—it is still our duty—one imposed by the necessity of self-preservation—to do everything within our power to make ourselves strong and competent to wage successful warfare if that be forced upon us.

This would seem to lead to the conclusion that releasing information which would give aid and comfort to our enemies would be supreme folly, this notwithstanding the theory that, ours being a people's Government, the people are entitled to all information within the possession of the executive departments, including the Department of National Defense.

It is a matter of common knowledge that not only has the Defense Department spent billions of dollars, employed the country's topmost scientists, in an effort to give us the best possible offensive and defensive weapons available, but that it has from time to time as a result of its research work devised new and more efficient offensive and defensive weapons, discarding the old, the obsolete, devising and producing the new and better.

Progress has been made through secret investigations and experiments, through the continuance of employment of those in the possession of advanced scientific knowledge. It is acknowledged that most amazing progress has been made because of the employment of those with special and superior knowledge, because of experiments which have been carried on through the observation not only of people but of animals.

Being under the necessity, if we are to survive, of being first rather than second best in preparation for defense, it necessarily follows that, if we are to win over our competitors, it is folly to advise them of each progressive successful step we take. In the press a few days ago there appeared a statement by General Thomas S. Power, the Nation's Strategic Air Commander, advising that he had, in substance, warned the Congress that it was risking the whole country if it did not vote more money for both Atlas, ICBM's and atomic bombers than the amount requested by President Eisenhower.

Then, a few days later, we heard from General Power's superior, General Thomas D. White, Air Force Chief of Staff, to the effect that we were prepared and apparently General Power did not know all on the subject he was talking about. It leaves us all somewhat confused as to the exact situation.

The controversy continues.

This morning to my desk came a letter from the General Counsel of the Department of Defense, which enclosed a letter dated March 30, 1959, written to the Secretary of Defense by Mr. Moss, chairman of the Subcommittee on Government Information of the House Government Operations Committee, and which reads as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
SPECIAL GOVERNMENT INFORMATION
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS,
Washington, D.C., March 30, 1959.

Hon. NEIL H. MCELROY,
Secretary of Defense, Department of Defense, The Pentagon, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The House Government Information Subcommittee has been informed that a Department of Defense memorandum dated June 3, 1958 and signed by Assistant Secretary of Defense (Public Affairs) Murray Snyder imposes restrictions on information about the use of monkeys in scientific research projects. The memorandum bears the military security classification "Confidential."

Executive Order 10501 states that the classification "Confidential" is authorized only for defense information or material the unauthorized disclosure of which could be prejudicial to the defense interests of the Nation.

In December 1958 the Dayton Daily News was refused information about the use of monkeys in scientific research projects at the Wright Air Development Center. Shortly thereafter Mr. Roy Johnson, Director of the Advanced Research Projects Agency admitted during questioning at a press conference that "primates" were being prepared for use in satellite research projects.

The House Government Information Subcommittee would appreciate a full explanation of the apparent on-again-off-again secrecy about the use of monkeys in research projects. The subcommittee will appreciate a specific explanation of how the disclosure of such information could prejudice "the defense interests of the Nation."

Sincerely,

JOHN E. MOSS,
Chairman.

To that letter, the General Counsel of the Department of Defense replied on April 10. A copy of that letter follows:

GENERAL COUNSEL OF THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., April 10, 1959.

Hon. JOHN E. MOSS,
Chairman, Special Government Information Subcommittee, Committee on Government Operations, House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I write this letter at the direction of the Secretary of Defense to reply to your letter of March 30, 1959, which related to the handling of information on use of animals in space experiments. Your letter cited a classified memorandum signed by the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Public Affairs, and, in effect, demanded an explanation of how any information concerning the use of animals in experiments could come under the provisions of the President's Executive Order 10501, which requires protection of information the publication of which "could be prejudicial to the defense interests of the Nation."

We have noted the news articles of last Saturday (April 4), through which, contemporaneously with sending your letter to the Secretary of Defense, your staff made public both the substance of your inquiry and your committee's indicated prejudgment that care to avoid offending religious or other sensibilities of persons at home and abroad, concerning Government experimentation with animals, was not a Government responsibility, much less a matter which could involve defense interests.

It is regretted that you did not follow the customary courteous course of awaiting a reply to your letter to the Secretary, particularly since you knew that classified information was involved. It is our belief that your committee's actions in this matter not only have served to encourage disrespect for the security system, but that the only real beneficiaries can be the Communist propagandists who want to stir up trouble between us and other nations.

The memorandum of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Public Affairs about which you asked transmitted classified information which had been received from another Government agency and, accordingly, was appropriately classified under Executive Order 10501. The originating agency advises us that the basic correspondence must remain classified. It can therefore be made available to you personally only upon assurance that the security classification will be honored. While I am thus not at liberty here to provide you with the classified attachments, I can nevertheless now give you the complete material which was contained in the Assistant Secretary's memorandum. That memorandum was classified only because of the classified attachments, and consisted only of the following two paragraphs:

"It is believed that attached exchange of correspondence concerning the need for care in this matter is self-explanatory.

"It is requested that you alert your staffs and other personnel concerned to the need for careful handling of this subject in speeches, articles, pictures and other material originating within your Military Service, intended for publication."

It will be noted that Assistant Secretary Snyder's memorandum called attention to the "need for care" to be taken in connection with the subject generally but did not, in any way, direct suppression of information, as you implied in your letter.

From your letter and the additional information relating to your committee appearing in the newspapers, it appears reasonably clear that information concerning classified matters has been disclosed by an employee of this Department, without authority. Accordingly, it is requested that you furnish to the Department of Defense all pertinent facts concerning the acquisition of information on this matter by yourself and your committee staff, including the name of Department employee or other source; the date of disclosure; to whom disclosure was made; the manner of disclosure—whether oral or in writing—and any other relevant facts. I am sure that as a Member of Congress you will assist in fulfilling our official responsibility for upholding the laws concerning national security. Obviously, if unauthorized disclosures are to go unnoticed, we will soon have a Government of men and not of laws. This would indeed, be the road to anarchy.

In view of the security aspects involved and the direct foreign relations implications, we are furnishing copies of this letter to the chairmen and senior minority members of the Armed Services Committees and the Foreign Relations and Foreign Affairs Committees of both Houses of the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT DECHERT.

SPACE MONKEYS TAGGED SECRET—MOSS ASKS WHY

The military was reported yesterday to be stamping as "confidential" all information about space monkeys. Representative JOHN E. Moss, Democrat, California, is asking: "Why?"

As chairman of the House Government Information Subcommittee, Moss wrote Secretary of Defense Neil McElroy:

"The subcommittee will appreciate a specific explanation of how the disclosure of such information could prejudice the defense interests of the Nation."

A Defense Department spokesman declined comment.

People connected with the Moss group suspect that all the hush-hush is to avoid offending those in India who worship monkeys or those at home who complain of inhumane treatment of animals.

According to Moss, Assistant Secretary of Defense Murray Snyder put out a secret order, No. 10501, last June 3, stating that research business on monkeys is for defense information only.

The following December, Moss said the Dayton Daily News tried unsuccessfully to obtain information about space monkeys under training at Wright Air Development Center.

Shortly after that, Moss said, Roy Johnson, Director of the Advanced Research Projects Agency, admitted that primates were being trained for use in satellite projects.

Similar copies went to the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the House Foreign Affairs Committee, the Senate Armed Services Committee and the House Armed Services Committee.

The Department apparently considers the matter of some importance.

It does seem that an end should be made to the controversy which exists between the committees of the Congress and the executive departments as to the information which the congressional committees are entitled to receive from the executive departments.

We are wasting money, sometimes creating ill feeling, holding what apparently are endless investigations and hearings, and all of which take the time, not only of the Members of Congress but, of far more importance, of the chief officers in the executive departments.

Sometimes I wonder how it is possible, in view of the demands for information which congressional committees are continually making upon them, for those in the executive departments to perform their duties.

In the press statement to which reference has been made this statement is found:

People connected with the Moss group suspect that all the hush-hush is to avoid offending those in India who worship monkeys or those at home who complain of inhumane treatment of animals.

One of the principal objectives of our foreign policy is to obtain and retain the good will of other nations, the people of other nations.

The House Government Information Subcommittee has three members: Mr. Moss, who is chairman, Congressman FASCELL from Florida, and the Representative from the Fourth Congressional District of Michigan. So far as I know, it has four professional staff members: Mr. Samuel J. Archibald, former newspaper reporter; Mr. John J. Mitchell, counsel; Mr. Paul Southwick, formerly with UPI; Mr. Harry S. Weidberg; and two stenographers, Mrs. Helen Beasley and Mrs. Catherine Hartke.

Inasmuch as Chairman Moss is one of the outstanding champions of the people's right to know, will he kindly give us the names of those who "connected with the Moss group suspect that all the hush-hush is to avoid offending those in India who worship monkeys?" Also advise as to who in India has been offended or who has suggested that he would be offended by the use of monkeys.

If it is necessary or advisable to use monkeys in connection with these or other experiments, was it one of the purposes of this press release to prevent further use of those animals?

When and from what source did the Moss subcommittee get the authority to participate in religious discussion, to inject the religious issue?

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Humphrey-Price REA bill as amended by the committee. This bill has the same intent as the bill which I introduced.

My district has many REA co-ops with thousands of electric consumers on the farms and small towns. From these obviously worried consumers are coming a large number of letters requesting my support of this legislation, which is indicative of the feeling that a change is needed. A further dramatic demonstration was given to me on a very icy night in December 1958 when 58 farmer-directors representing 5 REA co-ops, some of whom traveled up to 120 miles to meet with me to urge my support of this legislation. Men who will travel over such hazardous road conditions obviously feel a very strong dedication, and for these reasons I take the floor today to support the Humphrey-Price bill. To prove that this is not a partisan position I am taking, I would like to state that the majority of these 58 farmer-directors are active Republican workers.

These farmer-directors were not willing to state specifically why the change is needed because they knew that any moneys which may come to them in the future would have to come from this organization and they did not want to jeopardize any loan request needed in the future.

It seems that the gentleman from Ohio, representing the minority report, builds his whole case around the question "Can you prove that the Secretary of Agriculture has interfered in the granting of a loan?"

It is unlikely that anyone except a person sitting in the inner circle at the Department of Agriculture would be in a position to answer this question. It is impossible to know what shuffling in criteria takes place as loans are ruled upon. Naturally, Secretary Benson would not give out this information. The applicants for loans to whom this happened would not say so, because it would jeopardize their chance for a loan in the future.

Further, whether or not the REA Administrator has recommended loans that have been refused by the Secretary of Agriculture is immaterial. The point is that the REA Administrator, an accountable official to Congress, should not be accountable to someone who has no standing except as a political appointee of the President.

We are attempting to do two things with the pending legislation. First, to restore the loan-making function to the REA Administrator without qualification; and second, to maintain in the Department of Agriculture for centralized administrative purposes the Rural Electrification Administration.

A bit of history is needed in order to make clear the change for which we are asking. When Mr. Benson testified about Reorganization Plan No. 2 before the Senate Committee on Government Operations, he stated, and it is a matter of public record, that if there were any major change in the administrative establishment or structure of REA he would tell the proper committees of this fact in advance.

Mr. Chairman, this procedure was not followed when the general reorganization of the Agriculture Department was made. Consequently, Congress was presented with an accomplished fact and there was nothing that Congress could do to voice its opposition except to follow the legislative form. We are all well aware of the fact that the REA has been in a privileged position in the Department of Agriculture. This was the wish of Congress. The proof of this is in the fact that the REA Administrator is appointed for 10 years. This is longer than the number of years a President may serve under the Constitution, and clearly longer than the time a Cabinet officer serves. Without question it is longer than the time most political appointees in executive departments serve, which clearly points up the wish of Congress to keep the REA Administrator free from political pressures of either party.

Under the present situation, the REA is headed by an Administrator, appointed by the President and agreed to by the Senate, who is under the thumb of the Secretary of Agriculture.

It is obvious that under the present arrangement the REA loses its identity and becomes just another one of many agencies within the Department of Agriculture. When the responsibilities for REA policy are diffused throughout a number of offices in the Department, the historically intended purpose of keeping the REA as an important segment of our farm policy is defeated.

You may ask why I do not support the bill intended to give the REA status as an independent agency. I have two reasons for not supporting such a bill or amendment.

The first is that the REA is concerned for the most part with problems involving rural America. It has served best when it had preferred status and was still an important arm in the Agriculture Department. I do not think that such close cooperation could exist if it operated as a separate agency.

My second reason is an economic and administrative one. When the first Hoover Commission was created in 1947, there were 65 independent agencies, many of them working at cross-purposes. The Hoover Commission recommended the elimination of a great many of them. The number has now been reduced from 65 to 40. This is not the time to start in the opposite direction when we are so interested in avoiding added bureaucracy and waste in Government.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I simply want to read from the record for the benefit of the committee and for the benefit of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WOLF], on page 16 of the hearings, in which I asked the gentleman from Iowa, after he testified, this question.

Mr. BROWN. The only question I have is whether or not the gentleman—knows of any case where the Secretary of Agriculture has turned down or rejected any loan recommended by the Administrator.

That means Mr. WOLF, of course—

Mr. WOLF. How soon will you make the decision on this?

Chairman DAWSON. It won't be today.

Mr. WOLF. I will gather that information and submit it to the committee to be a part of my report.

Mr. BROWN. Very well. I would like to have it authenticated and documented. There has been no testimony on that so far.

Mr. WOLF. I will get it back to your subcommittee this afternoon.

Later on in the report there was a letter filed, addressed to Mr. DAWSON, chairman of the committee, by Mr. WOLF, in which he says:

My answer—

Referring to the answer to my question—is that it is unlikely that anyone except a person sitting in the inner circle at the Department of Agriculture would be in a position to answer this question.

To wit, the question as to whether or not he personally knew or could document or could produce any evidence of any case where a loan had been rejected. So, evidently the gentleman does not know of any such loan having been rejected or refused as the result of the review by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. MORRIS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MORRIS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the only question we should ask ourselves is whether or not this is good and valid legislation. If it is we should pass it. I certainly think it is.

I don't know that it is but it may be true that the motive behind it, or a partial motive behind it, is because of a fear of what might happen under Secretary Benson. So far as I am personally concerned I understand that Secretary Benson is a very splendid gentleman; a good man, a Christian man. But his philosophies, in regard to a farm program of course, run counter to the philosophies of a great many people, and they run counter to my own philosophy in regard to operating the farm program; at least in many instances. But it does not make any difference, as I see it, whether it was motivated by the fact that some people may have thought that Secretary Benson would be unfriendly in this matter or not. The only question, I repeat, is whether or not it is good and valid legislation. And here is why I think it is. Some of these points have been made in the debate, but I want to emphasize just one or two in the few minutes that I have.

In the first place, the Secretary of Agriculture, regardless of who he is, has so many, many important duties to perform that he could not possibly perform duties in this particular REA field as expeditiously as they ought to be performed and as can the REA Administrator; because the Administrator becomes an expert in this field and he also has time to devote to it. What I am afraid of, perhaps more than the fact that the Secretary might turn down some good loans, is that there will be a slowdown on the making of loans. When these applications are filed, these various REA co-ops need the money and they often need it badly and at once to put people to work and to carry on with their operations.

We all know that REA has not only been a blessing to rural America and has helped to light up rural America, but it has been a blessing to small business. It has been a blessing to the whole economy of our country.

I feel that the Administrator is the man who definitely ought to have the final say-so in regard to these loans.

I might call attention to the fact that we all know something about life, about politics. We all know about political pressures, and so forth. But the Administrator is appointed for and has a tenure in office of 10 years. To a large extent, maybe not entirely, but to a large extent he is removed from political pressures. And if he is the proper kind of man, and we assume that he is going to be the proper kind of man, whether he is a Democrat or a Republican, he will have time to devote to the problem. He will be the type of person to whom you can go and talk and get a speedy hearing in regard to these important matters. And he will be able to make a final decision expeditiously.

My final thought is simply this. These are not grants; these are loans. And I think that everyone will agree that the repayment performance on these loans has been unusually good.

So, Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this bill as amended by the committee.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I am hopeful the House this afternoon will give its approval to this bill.

The purpose of H.R. 1321 is to return to the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration all of the independent authority with respect to the approval or denial of loans authorized to be made under provisions of the REA Act of 1936 he possessed prior to the acceptance of the aforementioned reorganization plans.

I feel the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], has sound arguments as to the wisdom of this course of action. I feel that this is a needed move to preserve the vitality and purpose of this useful agency, which has brought light and power to rural America.

It was as an independent agency that REA was created back in 1936.

In 1939, the agency was placed in the Department of Agriculture, on the supposition that clearer lines of authority would be established and efficiency improved. It has since become obvious that the lack of independence could eventually destroy REA should it become subservient to an administration which would not have created it and was lacking in enthusiasm for it.

The fine accomplishments of REA cannot be consolidated by divided and contradictory administration.

To solidify REA gains I urge approval of H.R. 1321. It is necessary to establish in the Rural Electrification Administration, as a matter of law, the function vested in the agency by the 1936 act.

The measure is required, further, to restore the prestige of the REA Administrator, who under present administrative rulings is stripped of authority Congress intended to rest in his hand.

The REA program has enjoyed phenomenal success. A serious threat to its continuance can be eliminated by approval of this bill, H.R. 1321.

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Chairman, I have carefully read both the majority and minority committee reports on this bill and have also given close attention to the debate. Judging from the information I have at hand, there seems to be no real justification for this legislation. If enacted into law, it would create an unworkable administrative anomaly. It is difficult for me to understand the real purpose in trying to have this bill enacted into law.

There are not many Members of the House who have supported the REA program longer or more earnestly than I have. My voting record in the House in this regard speaks for itself. Furthermore, I yield to no one in the support of the REA program at the present time.

If I thought for one moment that the REA loan program would be jeopardized by the failure to enact this legislation, it most certainly would have my support.

Under the terms of the bill, the Secretary of Agriculture would be responsible for the overall affairs of REA, but would have no authority concerning its main function; that is, taking action on loan applications. Such a division of authority and responsibility would be completely inconsistent with the administration of REA as an agency within and as a part of the Department of Agriculture.

A claim has been made that the Secretary has taken away the authority of the Administrator to approve loans. That certainly is untrue. They say this administration is destroying REA. That is absolutely false, as the record of achievement clearly indicates. During the hearings on March 6, 1959, before the Subcommittee on Executive and Legislative Reorganization of the House Committee on Government Operations, the REA Administrator, David A. Hamil, stated:

> I am ready to answer for any aspect of the administration of the REA programs. I have administered them without interference from any quarter. I exercise full responsibility.
> In not a single instance has Secretary Benson or Director Scott interfered in the discharge of my responsibilities as Administrator of REA. I make the loans.
> Not one of my loan decisions has been motivated or colored by political considerations.

Not one good reason has been advanced to support the enactment of this legislation. Certainly we should not build up additional independent agencies in our Government. This does not make for good government. The Hoover Commission, in its several reports, recommended the elimination of many of these agencies. In a report to the 81st Congress relating to a study of the Department of Agriculture, the Hoover Commission said:

> We have urged in our first report that the foundation of good departmental administration is that the Secretary shall have authority from the Congress to organize and control his organization, and that separate authorities to his subordinates be eliminated.

This recommendation was approved by Congress. Once the practice of exempting certain agencies and excepting particular functions has begun, the chance of achieving substantial improvements in the efficiency of the Government will speedily diminish. Passage of the bill now under consideration, in my judgment, therefore, would be a step in the wrong direction.

Mr. JOHNSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to state my views in favor of passage of H.R. 1321, a bill to restore to the Administrator of REA all of the functions which were transferred from the Administrator to the Secretary of Agriculture by the Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953, giving him full authority to approve or deny loan applications that are made under provisions of the REA Act of 1936 as amended.

The 9th Congressional District which I represent is predominantly rural in character. As the representative of more than 300,000 people whose welfare is dependent upon agriculture directly or indirectly, I am vitally concerned with all legislative matters which affect their lives.

The rural electrification program is one of the Federally supported activities that has done most to improve the life of rural people in my district, in the whole of Wisconsin and in the entire country. I view with disfavor the perpetuation of any change that the REA program has undergone which poses a threat to its future.

I consider the application of Reorganization Plan No. 2 to REA as such a threat. In my opinion it is dangerous to vest in a politically minded Secretary of Agriculture the authority to approve or disapprove applications for REA loan funds.

In my considered judgment it is not the intent of Congress to have a well-paid and competent Administrator of the REA program sitting on the knee of the Secretary of Agriculture, taking his orders and mouthing his words like a well disciplined Charles McCarthy.

People of my district are rapidly losing confidence in the infallability of Secretary Benson in the broad field of agriculture. In the special field of rural electric affairs they have even less confidence in his judgment. They feel with considerable justification that the legislative proposals espoused by Secretary Benson to raise REA interest rates and to have REA loan applicants go into the private money market for funds clearly demonstrates his lack of understanding and appreciation of their problems.

Because I share the concerns and apprehensions of my constituents, and because I believe that the bill before the House will correct a threatening situation, I urge passage of H.R. 1321.

Mr. MACK of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I wish to voice my enthusiastic support for H.R. 1321, a bill to modify Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1939 and Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953 which was introduced by my good friend and colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRICE].

It is my understanding that this amendment would restore to the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration the authority to approve or disapprove loans. It would have the effect of restoring in the Rural Electrification Administration the functions vested in that agency by Congress in 1936. It would permit the Rural Electrification Administration to continue to function within the Department of Agriculture. But it would maintain its independence and integrity and the Secretary of Agriculture would not have the power to redistribute or transfer its functions to other agencies in the Department.

Mr. Chairman, the 27 electrical cooperatives in Illinois have fully endorsed this bill as being in the public interest and contributing to the efficient operation of their cooperatives. I have discussed this matter with them on many occasions and am convinced that individual members of these cooperatives strongly feel that this amendment should be approved.

The rural electrification program has been successful in bringing all the conveniences of our cities to the rural sections of our country. It has spurred our economic growth by creating a new market for our manufactured products. It has brought electric power into the most remote areas of this country. In less than 25 years this program has replaced darkness with light, and has made rural family life more pleasant. In my opinion, this has been one of the greatest programs enacted by Congress since the turn of the century.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly support this bill because I feel that the independence of this agency must be maintained. The Rural Electrification Administration should not be subjected to political influence and therefore, in my opinion, should not be subjected to the influence of the Secretary of Agriculture with regard to loans for various cooperatives. The REA should be administered by its own Administrator rather than by a Cabinet Secretary. We have had some outstanding men serve in this capacity. These men have been dedicated to this service and in most instances have ignored all political consideration when approving or disapproving loans. I feel that the Administrator should be given the authority for approval or disapproval of all loan applications.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that this bill is adopted because it will contribute to the efficiency of the Rural Electrification Administration.

Mrs. PFOST. Mr. Chairman, I am vitally interested in the passage of the bill before us today. As you know, it transfers back to the Administrator of the REA those functions which were transferred from him to the Secretary of Agriculture back in 1953. In January I introduced a similar bill.

In urging the House to pass this bill, I speak not only for the thousands of hard working rural people in my district in Idaho, but also for hundreds of thousands more throughout our great Nation.

Since the Congress adopted the Rural Electrification Act nearly a quarter of a century ago, the REA program has been a beacon of light and hope to the homes of rural America.

Today, however, there is a dark cloud on the horizon; a cloud that throws an ominous shadow over the shining nonpolitical activities of REA. It is a threat to the very heart of this vitally important agency. I refer to the Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953 as it is now being applied to REA by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Recent statements by Secretary Benson show the basic difference between his thinking and the thinking behind the establishment of REA. For example, he has advocated raising interest rates on REA loans. He also has proposed private financing of REA's future loan requirements, a proposal that would turn back the clock of progress and put the people once again at the mercy of ruthless, private monopolies.

Some of you may ask, how is this possible? How can a little private financing wreck REA? Well, Mr. Chairman, here is the answer.

As soon as REA opens the way to a better life for a farm or home, it creates additional demands for its services. More people want more refrigerators, more toasters, more washing machines, more TV sets and radios, and particularly for farmers, more milking equipment—just about everything that people need and are getting through REA facilities.

This means there must be larger capacity lines, more power insulators and generators, additional substations and all of the machinery and equipment that go into an electrical system.

To provide this equipment, the various REA systems, through borrowing, get the necessary funds. They must keep pace with the ever-increasing demands. Otherwise, they would be open to attack by other suppliers of power. And this is the crux of the whole matter: these private suppliers, through private financing, could gain control of an REA system even though that same system has done the pioneering work and made a sizable capital initial investment.

Let me remind you, Members of the House, that through the extension of light and power systems through REA, farmers have been able to throw away their kerosene lamps and have achieved the living comforts and standards to which they are so eminently entitled.

In my own State of Idaho, 97.1 percent of all farms had central station electric service last year. Yet only 30 percent of our farms had such facilities in the mid-1930's.

Since the rural electrification program has had such a great and beneficial effect upon the daily lives of the people, many of them think of it not as a remote Government agency with headquarters in Washington, but as their own creature. I know that is how the rural people in my district regard it. And they should, because so many of them have joined the electric cooperatives, served on their boards, and helped in so many other ways to make it the wonderful success that it is today.

Surely, a program that has given so many benefits to so many people in so short a time deserves to be kept free of politics. The Congress realized this when it set up the Agency. It established a 10-year term for the Administrator to insure his freedom from political pressures, and gave him the authority to judge loan applications solely on technical and legal grounds.

Now, the decision regarding REA loans—the only real purpose for the existence of REA—are no longer the sole responsibility of the Administrator. Nor are they free of the possible taint of political considerations. The Administrator must review new loan applications exceeding $500,000 with the Secretary of Agriculture or one of the Secretary's subordinates, both of whom are political appointees whose philosophies may and frequently do conflict sharply with the basic philosophy of REA.

Why this change? Does the Secretary of Agriculture have the professional and technical know-how to evaluate an electrification project? Of course not. The answer must be obvious to all of us: The Secretary of Agriculture wants to make sure that the loan applications conform to the philosophy of the administration. And we know that philosophy is definitely not for public power for the public interest, but rather private power for private, monopolistic interests.

Let us not weaken the system that the Congress has set up and which is working so well. Let us not hamstring a program that has lightened the burdens of our farm people and has literally lighted their lives. Let us rather work to strengthen REA and make it an everlasting monument to the wisdom of those who created it. Again, I urge the passage of H.R. 1321.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 1321, which seeks to give the Administrator of REA the unqualified right and jurisdiction to approve or disapprove applications by rural electric cooperatives for REA loans. By the same token this bill would relieve the Secretary of Agriculture of all right to supervise, direct, or control the making of such loans.

I have always supported the REA program, and am happy to have had the privilege during my service in the Congress of voting for the largest appropriations that have ever been made for REA loans. In the year 1949 the Rural Electrification Administration loaned $321,287,000 to the rural electric co-ops; in 1950, the amount loaned was $286,658,000; in 1951, it was $268,131,000; in 1952 it was $227,574,000; in 1953, $207,634,000. In no year, since 1953, appropriations for which were made by the 2d session of the 82d Congress, have loans made exceeded the amount of $200 million, save and except in the year of 1958, when loans reached the total of $205,332,000. Res ipsa loquitur.

The rural electric cooperatives in the 7th Congressional District of Alabama have made fine use of the loans that we have provided. The cooperatives serving our district have borrowed over $8 million for building lines which now serve nearly 25,000 customers; another $4.5 million has been loaned to telephone companies and cooperatives in the area.

Mr. Chairman, I know what it is to have been reared without the benefits of electricity; I know something of the burdens electricity has removed from the backs of farm women, and from the brawn of farm men. The spring as a milk cooler and the battling block as a clothes washer are no more and I am glad.

REA has had a fairly liberal lending policy so far as these co-ops go and it has done a world of good. I don't want any Secretary of Agriculture to be placed in the position of being able to stifle or curb or circumscribe the good work the co-ops are doing. Let us pass this bill and remove any temptation in that direction that he may have.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, in deliberations on this floor last Wednesday concerning the Humphrey-Price bill—H.R. 1321—I was of the hope that this House would be successful in passing that bill in unaltered form, thereby restoring the REA as a semi-independent agency and returning to the office of the REA Administrator the efficacy that it had held prior to 1953.

The main reason I had hoped to have the REA taken out from under the Department of Agriculture was so that Ezra Taft Benson would be unable to continue showing REA loan funds as a subsidy to farmers, as he has been doing since the REA came under his control in 1953. Actually, as we are all aware, the REA loan fund program is self-sustaining and, in the long run, is a money-making venture for the taxpayers of America.

Since the House of Representatives as a body was not able to agree on this bill without amendment, I decided to go ahead and vote for the bill in its amended form. In this amended form, the Administrator of the REA will once again have control over the lending activities of the agency. This is actually somewhat of a "half a loaf" solution to the problem. But then, even if the bill had been passed without amendment, under the present administration we would have only been successful in taking the REA out from under the control of Ezra Taft Benson and placing it under the control of Eisenhower. In view of these facts, any benefit to the REA and to rural electric cooperatives all over the country might have been rather dubious.

Mr. FOUNTAIN. Mr. Chairman, there are many good and valid reasons why I favor the passage of H.R. 1321. The debate thus far clearly indicates grave doubt as to who has the final authority to make decisions in connection with REA loans, the Rural Electrification Administrator or his administrative boss, the Secretary of Agriculture. Personally, I have no objections to the administration of the Rural Electrification Administration program within the Department of Agriculture by the Administrator under the general administrative supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture. The fact that the Rural Electrification Administration is an agency of the Department of Agriculture, without anything further, in and of itself, already gives the Secretary of Agriculture tremendous indirect influence upon the actions of the Rural Electrification Administrator.

Nevertheless, serious question has arisen as to whether or not the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration, duly appointed by the President for a term of 10 years on the basis of his peculiar qualifications for the job, and confirmed by the Senate, exercises the power and assumes the responsibility vested in him by the Rural Electrification Act of 1936. The power of the Secretary of Agriculture to review and influence loans, as some seem to think is now true, is one thing—while the power of the Secretary of Agriculture as the administrative head of a department, which includes along with the REA many other agencies, is another.

Personally, I think it is a good thing to have coordination between agency and department heads in the interest of efficiency and economy, in a matter of this kind affecting so many people. However, if the Administrator does not have the final authority to approve or disapprove loans, he is merely serving in a more or less perfunctory capacity and his position is not in keeping with an appointment by the President and confirmation by the Senate. I believe the Congress wants him to exercise his independent judgment. The present Administrator says he is doing that. If that is true, this bill will eliminate any question about his authority.

My experience as chairman of the Intergovernmental Relations Subcommittee of the House Committee on Government Operations, which includes jurisdiction over the Department of Agriculture for efficiency and economy purposes, has convinced me that the Secretary of Agriculture already has under his jurisdiction far more than he can possibly attend to. If he should make decisions in connection with loans to REA cooperatives, in my opinion, he would of necessity have to do so on the basis of a subordinate's recommendations. In effect, this would be placing the subordinate in a position of making decisions which are the responsibility of the Administrator. This bill in no way changes the status of personnel or of general supervision by the Secretary of Agriculture, but it does insure the continued operation of the REA as an integral and dynamic unit within the Department of Agriculture.

Most assuredly, all of us should be opposed to unnecessary and unwise loans by the Administrator. This legislation, insofar as I am concerned, is in no way designed to encourage him to make undeserving loans. If I thought it would have such a result, I would be opposed to it.

There is another more paramount reason why I favor the passage of H.R. 1321. It will to some extent do what was left undone by Congress in 1953 when, by default, it permitted the President's Reorganization Plan No. II to become law without permitting debate on its merits. I was opposed to Reorganization Plan No. II. I introduced a disapproving resolution known as H.R. 236. Unfortunately, although requested several times by me to do so, the then chairman of the Committee on Government Operations, did not call the committee together for action on the plan. I, therefore, did the only thing I could do as the introducer of a disapproving resolution. I exercised under the rules of the House the personal privilege of making a motion on the floor of the House to discharge the Committee on Government Operations from further consideration of H.R. 236. Only 30 minutes debate was permitted under the rule.

The purpose of that 30 minutes was to enable Members to ask the House to debate Reorganization Plan No. 2 on its merits. This was, of course, during the 83d Congress which was under the control of a Republican administration, just as was the House Committee on Government Operations. Almost to a man, the Republicans, aided by some few Democrats, refused to permit debate as to the merits of Reorganization Plan No. 2. While the plan was, to some extent, discussed by extended remarks in the RECORD, its merits were not considered.

However, 128 Members of the House expressed their fears by supporting the discharge resolution and asking for general debate on the plan. The overwhelming majority of Republicans opposed debate, thus approving the plan.

Consequently, under the reorganization act, the President's so-called plan No. 2 automatically became law. It was no plan at all. It was a complete abdication by the House of congressional authority over the Department of Agriculture. Without any knowledge of what the Secretary of Agriculture had in mind, the House, by refusing debate on the plan's merits, permitted, with certain exceptions, the transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture of all functions not vested in him of all other officers and of all agencies and employees of the Department of Agriculture. The Rural Electrification Administration was included in the transfer.

I never like to take the position of one who says, "I told you so." And yet, I cannot resist the temptation to say to you today that I argued upon the floor of the House in 1953 that Reorganization Plan No. 2 clearly violated the spirit and intent of the reorganization act. I said then there was nothing in the plan to tell us "what the Secretary of Agriculture would do with respect to the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, the Foreign Service, the Soil Conservation Service, the Farmers Home Administration, and the Rural Electrification Administration." I then asked these questions: "Is there one of you who has the slightest idea as to what will be done by the Secretary of Agriculture, or any other Secretary, with the various functions of the Department under this plan? Which of the functions will be magnified? Who among the officers or which of the agencies will be given greater power? Which function or functions will be subordinated or stifled or even possibly eliminated?" Many of us raised serious questions as to the advisability of giving the Secretary of Agriculture such unbridled and unlimited blanket authority.

I make these observations because today we are debating the advisability of modifying Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1939 and Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953. Had the House disapproved Reorganization Plan No. 2, passage of this bill would not be necessary. The modification proposed in this bill, while it may not be the best way to amend reorganization plans, will at least return to the Congress in the form of specific legislation a minimum of the authority vested in the Secretary by its default approval of the President's Reorganization Plan No. 2, a plan which gave the Secretary of Agriculture more authority over the Department of Agriculture and its various agencies and branches than even the President himself has.

It is true that in 1939 the functions of the Rural Electrification Administration were transferred to the Department of Agriculture. However, experience showed that the Rural Electrification Administrator exercised the power and the authority to approve or disapprove loans. Under the authority of Reorganization Plan No. 2, there seems to have been an important modification of that practice. Such delegation of congressional authority—the power to legislate—to administrative heads is a dangerous trend. It is time for the Congress to stop abdicating its responsibility under the Constitution. In fact, the time has long since passed when the Congress should return to itself many of the powers and responsibilities which it has previously unwisely delegated to administrative agencies.

The passage of H.R. 1321 will in some small way do just that insofar as the Department of Agriculture is concerned. At the same time, it will establish clear responsibility and accountability on the part of the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOLLING, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 1321) to amend Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1943, pursuant to House Resolution 236, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 254, nays 131, answered "present" 1, not voting 48, as follows:

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

MODIFYING REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 2 OF 1939 AND REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 2 OF 1953

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 144) to modify Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1939 and Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the functions and activities of the Rural Electrification Administration and the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration which were transferred to the Department of Agriculture and to the Secretary of Agriculture by Reorganization Plan No. II of 1939 and Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953 are hereby transferred to the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration, and shall be exercised and administered within the Department of Agriculture by such Administrator under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture; except that insofar as such functions relate to the approval or disapproval of loans authorized to be made under the Rural Electrification Act of 1936, as amended, their exercise by the Administrator shall not be subject to the supervision or direction of, or to any other control by, the Secretary of Agriculture.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A similar House bill (H.R. 1321) was laid on the table.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PRIVILEGE OF THE HOUSE

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the privilege of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I have been subpenaed to appear before the United States District Court for the District of Columbia to testify on April 15, 1959, at 10 p.m. in the case of United States of America against Bernard Goldfine. Under the precedents of the House, I am unable to comply with this subpena without the consent of the House, the privileges of the House being involved. I, therefore, submit the matter for the consideration of this body.

Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk the subpena.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the subpena.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. BERNARD GOLDFINE, DEFENDANT—No. 1158-58

To Congressman OREN HARRIS,
Room 1503, New House Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

You are hereby commanded to appear in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia at 3d and Constitution Avenue NW., fourth floor, courtroom 8, in the city of Washington, on the 15th day of April 1959, at 10 o'clock p.m. to testify in the above-entitled case.

This subpena is issued on application of the defendant.

HARRY M. HULL,
Clerk.
By IRENE B. BURROUGHS,
Deputy Clerk.

APRIL 8, 1959.

EDWARD BENNETT WILLIAMS,
Attorney for Defendant.

The SPEAKER. The letter and subpena will be printed in the Journal.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. RICHARD A. MACK AND THURMAN A. WHITESIDE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

APRIL 15, 1959.

The Honorable the SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: From the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, I have received a subpena duces tecum, directed to me as Clerk of the House of Representatives, to appear before said court as a witness in the case of the United States v. Richard A. Mack, Thurman A. Whiteside (Criminal No. 856–58), and to bring with me certain and sundry papers therein described in the files of the House of Representatives.

The rules and practice of the House of Representatives indicates that the Clerk may not, either voluntarily or in obedience to a subpena duces tecum, produce such papers without the consent of the House being first obtained. It is further indicated that he may not supply copies of certain of the documents and papers requested without such consent.

The subpena in question is herewith, and the matter is presented for such action as the House in its wisdom may see fit to take.

Respectfully yours,

RALPH R. ROBERTS,
Clerk, U.S. House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the subpena.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. RICHARD A. MACK, THURMAN A. WHITESIDE—CRIMINAL NO. 856–58

To Honorable RALPH ROBERTS,
Clerk, House of Representatives,
House Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

You are hereby commanded to appear in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia at 3d and Constitution Avenue NW., 4th floor, courtroom 8, in the city of Washington, D.C. on the 17th day of April 1959 at 9:30 o'clock a.m. to testify in the case of United States v. Richard A. Mack, and bring with you the original letter of the Honorable George Smathers to the Honorable Oren Harris, dated March 5, 1958 (with copy of the letter from Honorable George Smathers to Mr. L. B. Wilson, dated February 16, 1954, which was enclosed therewith at the time of its transmission to the subcommittee); the original letter of the Honorable Warren G. Magnuson to the Honorable Oren Harris, dated March 5, 1958; the original letter of the Honorable Andrew F. Shoeppel to the Honorable Oren Harris, dated March 5, 1958; the original letters of the Honorable Estes Kefauver to the Honorable Oren Harris, dated March 10, 1958, and February 26, 1958; the original letter of the Honorable Spessard Holland to the Honorable Oren Harris, all of which letters are located in the files of the Special Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; the original of the photograph of Mrs. George T. Baker and Mrs. Gordon Moore on file with the subcommittee; the copy of the partial transcript of the Minifon recording of the interview of Honorable Richard A. Mack by Paul Berger and Herbert Wachtell of February 17, 1958 (the original of which was given to Agent Boardman of the Federal Bureau of Investigation on September 15, 1958) on file with the subcommittee; the receipt for the original transcript of the Minifon recording of the Mack-Wachtell-Berger interview of February 17, 1958, bearing the signature of Agent Boardman of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the date of September 15, 1958; the return and supplemental return of Thurman A. Whiteside to the subpena of the Special Committee on Legislative Oversight of January and February 1958, which documents are on file with the subcommittee; letter from A. Frank Katzentine to Paul Porter, Esq., dated February 24, 1956 (in channel 10 file); January 9, 1956, memo from A. Frank Katzentine file (in channel 10 file); letter from A. Frank Katzentine to Paul Porter, Esq., cancelling all horse race broadcasts, dated December 2, 1955 (in channel 10 file).

2. To produce the documents set forth in the attached subpena duces tecum, all of which documents are relevant to the issues in counts 1 and 3 of the indictment.

This subpena is issued upon application of the defendant Richard A. Mack.

HARRY M. HULL,
Clerk.

By MABEL R. HOUSTON,
Deputy Clerk.

April 13, 1959, Nicholas J. Chase, attorney for Richard A. Mack.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 244) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

Whereas in the case of United States against Richard A. Mack, Thurman A. Whiteside (Criminal Case No. 856–58), pending in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, a subpena duces tecum was issued by the said court and addressed to Ralph R. Roberts, Clerk of the House of Representatives, directing him to appear as a witness before said court at 9:30 antemeridian on the 17th day of April 1959, and to bring with him certain and sundry papers in the possession and under the control of the House of Representatives: Therefore be it

Resolved, That by the privileges of this House no evidence of a documentary character under the control and in the possession of the House of Representatives can, by the mandate of process of the ordinary courts of justice, be taken from such control or possession but by its permission; be it further.

Resolved, That when it appears by the order of the court or of the judge thereof, or of any legal officer charged with the administration of the orders of such court or judge, that documentary evidence in the possession and under the control of the House is needful for use in any court of justice, or before any judge or such legal officer, for the promotion of justice, this House will take such action thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of this House; be it further

Resolved, That Ralph R. Roberts, Clerk of the House, be authorized to appear at the place and before the court named in the subpena duces tecum before-mentioned, but shall not take with him any papers or documents on file in his office or under his control or in possession of the House of Representatives; be it further

Resolved, That when said court determines upon the materiality and the relevancy of the papers and documents called for in the subpena duces tecum, then the said court, through any of its officers or agents, have full permission to attend with all proper parties to the proceeding and then always at any place under the orders and control of this House and take copies of any documents or papers and the Clerk is authorized to supply certified copies of such documents and papers in possession or control of said Clerk that the court has found to be material and relevant, except minutes and transcripts of executive sessions, and any evidence of witnesses in respect thereto which the court or other proper officer thereof shall desire, so as, however, the possession of said documents and papers by the said Clerk shall not be disturbed, or the same shall not be removed from their place of file or custody under said Clerk; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the said court as a respectful answer to the subpena aforementioned.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONSTRUCTION AT MILITARY INSTALLATIONS

Mr. THORNBERRY, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 245, Rept. No. 272), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5674) to authorize certain construction at military installations, and for other purposes. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill, and shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Armed Services, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCES WITH CANADA

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 239 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 254) to authorize participation by the United States in parliamentary conferences with Canada. After general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution, and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the joint resolution for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the joint resolution to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. BUDGE] and pending that I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 239 makes in order the consideration of House Joint Resolution 254, which authorizes participation by the United States in parliamentary conferences with Canada. This resolution provides for an open rule and 1 hour of debate.

House Joint Resolution 254 authorizes the appointment of not to exceed 24 Members of Congress to the Canada-United States interparliamentary group each year; half of this number to be appointed by the Speaker of the House and half by the President of the Senate. Not less than four members shall be from the Committee on Foreign Affairs and not less than four from the Committee on Foreign Relations. The resolution also authorizes the appropriation of not to exceed $30,000; $15,000 of which shall be for the expenses of the House delegation, and $15,000 for the Senate delegation.

In the first report of the special study mission to Canada made during the 85th Congress, it was recommended that in the interest of improving our relations with Canada, the United States should explore the following fields of activity: One, congressional representation, in observer status, on the Canadian-United States Trade Committee; two, formal recognition of Canada-United States relationship as a continuing area of interest by a subcommittee or a joint committee; and three, periodic visits to each country by the parliamentarians of the other.

Subsequently, the Senate passed Senate Resolution 359, authorizing the study of the problem of United States and Canadian parliamentary liaison, and a meeting was held here in Washington in January of this year, attended by eight Members of the U.S. Congress. It was decided at that time that semi-annual meetings should be held in order to discuss the problems of the United States-Canadian relations and in order to foster better understanding in each country of the other's problems.

I urge the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. BUDGE. Mr. Speaker, I am in complete agreement with the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi. I know of no opposition to the rule.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ACQUIRING LAND ALONG MOUNT VERNON HIGHWAY

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 237 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 2228) to provide for the acquisition of additional land along the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway in exchange for certain dredging privileges, and for other purposes. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill, and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Public Works, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. BUDGE] and now yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 237 makes in order the consideration of H.R. 2228, providing for the acquisition of additional land along the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway in exchange for certain dredging privileges. This resolution provides for an open rule and 1 hour of debate.

The purpose of this bill is to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire certain lands in exchange for dredging and other rights on lands already owned by the United States located on the east side of the parkway in Fairfax County, Va.

The bill covers two adjoining parcels of land located along the east side of the parkway. It authorizes the Federal Government to accept from the Smoot Sand & Gravel Corp., present owners of the property, fee simple title to a strip of land below Hunting Creek containing 110 acres, more or less, plus fee simple title to an adjoining area of 150 acres, more or less, also owned by Smoot Sand & Gravel Corp. It would permit this corporation to reserve the right to remove sand and gravel from this 150-acre tract for a period of 30 years, and it would further reserve to this corporation for the same period of time such riparian rights as are appurtenant to this 150-acre tract.

In exchange for the deed to the approximately 260 acres, the Federal Government would grant to Smoot Sand & Gravel Corp. the privilege of dredging sand and gravel for a period of 20 years from approximately 85 acres out of some 110 acres of land belonging to the United States. All dredging would be performed in accordance with the plans recommended by the Chief of Engineers and authorized by the Secretary of the Army. Both the Secretary of the Army and the Secretary of the Interior are authorized to prescribe such terms and conditions as are necessary to protect the interest of the United States in carrying out any contracts entered into under the bill.

No expenditure of Federal funds is involved.

I urge the adoption of this resolution.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELANEY. I yield.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time in order to advise the membership that on tomorrow the bill, H.R. 5674, providing for the authorization and construction of military installations will be programed, and that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, will ask for a rollcall vote on that bill.

Mr. BUDGE. Mr. Speaker, I know of no opposition to the adoption of the pending rule on this measure, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCES

Mrs. KELLY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 254) to authorize participation by the United States in parliamentary conferences with Canada.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution, House Joint Resolution 254, with Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the joint resolution was dispensed with.

Mrs. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Chairman, House Joint Resolution 254 grants permanent legislative authority for the yearly appointment of a U.S. delegation to the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group. It also authorizes a $30,000 annual appropriation for this activity.

Following the Korean war and up until last year our relations with Canada had slipped badly. There had developed an increasing resentment against U.S. economic and political policies. This deterioration had continued unabated and unnoticed for some time until members of this committee began pointing to the dangers which the situation held for the United States.

The resolution authorizes U.S. participation in a joint group with Canadian parliamentarians which, in my opinion, will improve relations between our two countries. In this forum there will be ample opportunity to discuss problems common to our two countries, and from these discussions it is quite probable there will come new approaches, new ideas, and new solutions. It will enable the Canadians to understand many of our problems and us to understand Canadian problems. In the opinion of all concerned, U.S. participation will be of substantial value in retarding further deterioration in Canada-United States relations and in giving further support to the outstanding cooperation between our two countries in economic matters, in foreign policy and in defense.

The resolution authorizes the appointment of not less than 24 members to the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group. Twelve of this number are to be from the House and 12 from the Senate. Not less than four of the House representatives are to be from this committee. The resolution also authorizes an annual appropriation not to exceed $30,000, $15,000 of which is for the expenses of the House group. Expenses which would be covered by this appropriation would include travel to the semiannual meetings, expenses while there, and entertainment of the Canadian group when it is here.

The Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group grew out of a suggestion contained in the first report of the Special Study Mission to Canada composed of Mr. Brooks Hays and Mr. FRANK M. COFFIN. The recommendation was as follows:

CONGRESSIONAL AWARENESS

The vital role which Congress plays in determining United States-Canadian relationships, for better or worse, must no longer be ignored. The fact needs to be constantly borne in mind that, unlike the parliamentary system of Canada, the executive branch does not necessarily speak for the legislative branch. It is not enough that there be continuing liaison between the Cabinets of the two nations. The following fields of activity should be thoroughly explored:

(a) Congressional representation, in observer status, on the Canada-United Trade Committee (at present, a committee of the two executive branches). Our information is that Canadian parliamentarians would understand the need for such liaison under our system.

(b) Formal recognition of Canada-United States relationship as a continuing area of interest by a subcommittee or a joint committee.

(c) Periodic visits to each country by the parliamentarians of the other.

Prime Minister Diefenbaker picked up this suggestion in a speech which he made at Wesleyan University on June 8, 1958, stating:

To meet the problem of the relations of our nations the Hays-Coffin report suggested a congressional committee on Canadian relations. I am sure that the Parliament of Canada would give the fullest consideration to the setting up of a similar committee of Canadian parliamentarians who in periodic visits to our respective capitals would do much to achieve suggested solutions of recurring problems.

The benefits that will flow from such a joint meeting were very apparent in 1942, when at a parliamentary conference at which I had the honor to preside, Members of Congress of the United States met in conference for the first time with Canadian and Commonwealth Members of Parliament.

Subsequently the Senate Foreign Relations Committee held a hearing on Canadian-United States relations, following which Senator AIKEN introduced Senate Resolution 359, which passed the Senate on August 8, 1958. Senate Resolution 359 authoritzed a study of possible means of effecting interparliamentary liaison with Canada and authorized discussion with Canadian groups to that end. Senator AIKEN discussed the need for parliamentary liaison with the Canadians in the fall of 1958 as did Mr. HAYS and Mr. COFFIN.

The approval of the Speaker was secured for a meeting to be held last January here in Washington. The meeting was held and was attended by Mr. COFFIN, Mr. MERROW, Dr. JUDD, and myself for the House and by Senator AIKEN, Senator MANSFIELD, Senator MORSE, and Senator CAPEHART for the Senate. The Canadian representation included the Speaker of the Canadian House of Commons and the Speaker of the Canadian Senate together with seven other Canadian parliamentarians. The group concentrated on the problem of establishing an interparliamentary group, discussion of the ways in which this could best be accomplished and the techniques which would be appropriate. It was agreed that small steering groups from the United States and Canada would handle agendas and arrangements for the meetings but that these steering groups would be considerably expanded at the time of actual meetings. It was further agreed that each country would furnish the travel and expenses of its own delegation, but that the host country in each case would pay for any side trips and for any entertainment.

The Canadian group has now extended an invitation to 24 U.S. representatives—12 from the Senate and 12 from the House—to attend the ceremonies in connection with the dedication of the St. Lawrence Seaway.

If this resolution is not passed it would be almost impossible for the House to participate. I would like to point out, however, that even if the House does not, it is almost certain that the other body would go ahead even in the absence of representation from the House.

Mr. Chairman, this resolution is in the best interests of the United States. In my opinion, it will serve a very useful purpose in bringing the parliamentary representatives of the United States and Canada together and in improving relations between the United States and our ally to the north.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD] is recognized.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, I doubt if there is any place in the world where a closer mutuality of interest exists than between the United States and its neighbor to the north, Canada. There is no place where a genuine understanding of our common interests and of the views of each other regarding them is more important. There is, I think, no place where true reciprocity in actions is more essential. For the legislative bodies of each country to know what the other is thinking or doing and why is bound to be beneficial to each.

It is inescapable that when two countries live side by side, as we do, with a 3,000-mile border, some trouble, incidents, or differences of opinion arise. This is especially true when thousands of people are going back and forth across the border every single day at places like Detroit and Buffalo and between Seattle and Vancouver, as well as the regular immigration flow.

Some of our waters flow north into Canada, and one of hers, the Columbia, flows south into our country.

In my part of the United States we are dependent for much of our oil on pipelines that come from developing oilfields in western Canada. In turn, they are dependent on us for the major markets to which they can deliver oil by pipeline from their inland fields.

We have some absolutely essential defense installations on the soil of our northern neighbor, essential to the survival of the United States in this age of missiles.

Many Americans have invested such large quantities of dollars in Canadian companies that sometimes the latter feel unable to function as Canadian companies because of the control of ownership in the United States.

Canada has a troublesome trade deficit with the United States. She dislikes some of our tariffs and our disposal of agricultural surpluses abroad. We have subsidies for domestic production of zinc, lead, copper that they believe unreasonably discriminate against their ores.

Differences inevitably develop from time to time under such circumstances. There is a much longer list of possible irritations that, if ignored, can become grievances which in turn become difficulties that lead to public statements or policies injurious to both sides. In such a situation it seems to me there ought not to be the slightest question as to the value and the wisdom of adopting this resolution, setting up joint groups to meet probably twice a year, once here, and once in Canada. Representatives of our House and Senate will meet privately with representatives of the two Houses of the Canadian Parliament to discuss and try to thresh out whatever problems there may be so that at least we understand each other and do not get too far into some of the difficulties that have been developing more frequently of late, with harm to both sides.

That is all there is to this resolution. It was suggested informally by a delegation from this House. It was a tentative idea, but the Canadian Prime Minister himself welcomed it and offered to cooperate in setting up a group of this sort.

It seems obvious that the relations between our two countries will be even more important in the years ahead than at any time in the past. We should undertake this effort. It is so relatively easy to prevent misunderstandings; it is so difficult to clear away estrangements once they have developed or after inflammatory statements have been made.

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUDD. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SAYLOR. I wish to take this opportunity to commend the committee for bringing this resolution to the floor of the House for consideration. I sincerely believe, from my knowledge of and association with Members of the Parliament of Canada that this will do a great deal to prevent some small incidents which have occurred in the past from ever occurring again, and will strengthen the friendly relations between our countries.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUDD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I favor the passage of House Joint Resolution 254. It creates a legislative committee of 24

Members of the Congress for the purpose of meeting with a similar group of the Canadian Parliament.

Our relations with Canada are of the utmost importance. I firmly believe for us to meet with the Canadians will improve our relations with Canada and bring about a better understanding between our two countries.

Certainly it is in the best interests of the United States to enact this resolution. It will do much to assist in reducing frictions, and it will solidify the good relations between the two countries.

I hope the vote will be unanimous.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bow].

Mr. BOW. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman several questions. My interest in this matter stems somewhat from the appropriations standpoint. It is a fact, is it not, that Canada is a member of the NATO organization with which we have a parliamentary setup at this time?

Mr. JUDD. That is true.

Mr. BOW. And is it not true that in the NATO Parliamentary Union we are spending about $57,129 a year? This would add $30,000 more, I understand.

Mr. JUDD. A maximum of $15,000 for the House and $15,000 for the Senate.

Mr. BOW. The total of the two, the NATO Parliamentary Union which includes Canada, and the United States, would be $87,129. In the Interparliamentary Union our expenses at the present time are about $58,000 a year.

I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not we are now establishing a precedent where we are going to have interparliamentary unions in NATO and the other interparliamentary unions, perhaps later. SEATO then begins to develop with each of the countries of the world separate interparliamentary unions, a union upon a union, whereas we are already in these groups that now meet together.

Mr. COFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUDD. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. COFFIN. The gentleman has asked a very pertinent question. It has been the judgment of our committee that this relationship between these two great North American countries is a unique one. We have the conviction that just because these countries are close together and abut each other now, with a common border of some 4,800 miles, which border is crossed every day by people and goods, with a tremendous possibility of irritation, that we need something in addition to the formal relationship between the executive bodies. This informal fluctuating but periodic relationship serves the purposes of these groups which the gentleman has mentioned, the NATO Conference and the other interparliamentary bodies. NATO consists of some 15 countries in the parliamentary union which meets once a year and is vastly larger now. It is impossible to have the down-to-earth detailed agenda that this Canada-United States group could erect and could carry out over the years. We think, therefore, this is not a precedent for the type of development which the gentleman appropriately would not welcome. Obviously, we do not have the personnel to establish bilateral relationships with every other nation, but we think this situation stands unique because of the geography, the population, and the other reasons I have mentioned.

Mr. BOW. The gentleman is quite correct. My concern is whether we are now going to begin to establish parliamentary unions with all the nations with which we now have diplomatic relations within the hemisphere, all touching our borders, with this amount we are now appropriating. May I say that the $57,129 that we are appropriating is not the complete picture. I understand, in addition to that foreign currencies are used which would increase that amount.

Mr. JUDD. Not in this arrangement.

Mr. BOW. Not in this arrangement. But I am talking about the NATO setup and whether or not perhaps when NATO meets there could be a meeting with the Canadians separate from the other, if the delegations are there.

I raise these questions because I would like the views of the great Committee on Foreign Affairs. It is important to us when we come to the appropriation of funds to have the views of the committee and to know what their intentions are as to the future and whether this is establishing a precedent for additional interparliamentary unions.

Mr. JUDD. I appreciate the gentleman's bringing this point up. We discussed it in our committee on several occasions. There are no other countries, with one possible exception, Mexico, that has any such relationship to the United States. I will say, frankly, that if the Government of Mexico were to approach the United States saying that they believed it would be in their interest and ours to set up a group of their legislators and ours to deal with any issues of vital mutual interest, I should favor our accepting their request. I am not suggesting such a request. We did not make such a request of the Canadians. But to build the closest possible understanding with the country on our north and the one on our south, the three of us being the most populous countries in the Western Hemisphere and having vital interests in common, is a project of such importance that I think the amount of money involved for an arrangement of this sort is infinitesimal.

I wonder if the gentleman has the figures as to the amount of investment of American capital in the DEW line, or the amount of United States capital invested in Canadian industries? The defense of our country from possible missiles across the North Pole depends on joint military arrangements. If the gentleman will look at the money involved in our common defense and defense production, he will see that this $30,000 is an incredibly small amount to spend to try to prevent in the earliest possible stages any misunderstanding or estrangement or both.

Mr. BOW. I think I do have the figures on the cost of the DEW Line, and I have seen the figures on our investment in Canada, and it would seem to me with those large investments that we have, perhaps we have advanced sufficient funds that we should be in pretty good shape with our neighbors to the north. Whether or not a group of our membership meeting with a small group of the Canadian House is going to correct all of the ills, I do not know, and I am not sure one way or the other. My only thought is, when we talk about a small amount of $30,000, we have to add that to the hundreds of thousands that we have throughout the entire bill when it comes to the United Nations, the parliamentary unions, and others, which look small when you take them individually, but when you add them all up we run into an awful lot of money. And it seems to me we ought to be sure we get a dollar's worth of value for the dollar we spent.

Mr. JUDD. I am in wholehearted agreement with what the gentleman has said. I believe we can get a great deal more than full value received for the dollars spent under this proposal.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUDD. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. LAIRD. I think the necessity for this resolution is certainly very great in view of the action that the Congress has taken this year in antagonizing our friends to the north through the passage of the Great Lakes water diversion bill, and I think we will have to work very closely with our friends in Canada, and perhaps one of the antagonisms that the gentlewoman from New York referred to was the activity of this Congress in trying to divert water from the Great Lakes.

Mr. JUDD. And the gentleman understands that this can be a two-edged sword. The Columbia River rises in Canada and flows into our great Northwest. We can alter the water level in the St. Lawrence, but they can alter the water level in the Columbia. It is that kind of problem that good neighbors should work out together for our mutual benefit.

Mrs. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HARA].

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I must admit that the charm as well as the logic of the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. KELLY] has won me. I think it is a good thing for our legislators to meet with the legislators of Canada. I trust that when the charming gentlewoman from New York, the persuasive gentleman from Maine, and the others from this body meet with the statesmen from the Dominion they will stress the fact that Congress speaks for the American people and international good will travels a two-way street. Three times this body passed the Lake Michigan water diversion bill by tremendous majority, and two times the other body passed it overwhelmingly. We of Illinois do not think that the Government of Canada is leading the way to a better understanding when it meddles in a dispute among the States of the Great Lakes, and seeks to deprive the people of Chicago of the only hope they may have of averting a frightful plague. So I hope our American legislators, in meeting with the Canadian legislators, will make it crystal clear that one way not to make friends with one's next-door neighbor is to interfere when he seeks to protect the health of his family with a plumbing job.

Of course, the Canadians are fine people. Many of Canadian birth are among our leaders in Chicago, well liked by everyone, and they are as aghast as the rest of us at the course of the Canadian Government suddenly changing front on a matter so vital to all Chicago's millions and which could not by any stretch of the imagination do harm to Canada or anyone.

The Government of Canada could assure the success of future associations of Canadian and American legislators by withdrawing its objections to Lake Michigan water diversions. There is still time.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOEVEN.]

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Chairman, I express the hope that if this joint resolution is adopted the Committee on Agriculture may have some consideration in being represented on the U.S. delegation. I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture on the floor at the moment, but I think he has in mind sending a subcommittee up to Canada to see if we can iron out some matters relating to the disposal of surplus agricultural commodities. Canada has a wheat surplus problem just as does the United States, and the disposal of such surpluses in an orderly manner should be the subject of joint discussion. There are other matters in the agricultural field which should also be resolved. Representatives of the Committee on Agriculture could well have a place on the U.S. delegation whenever it is appointed.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEVEN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JUDD. May I say to the gentleman that both our committee and the joint group have discussed that very point. There are many issues to be taken up. They cannot all be solved at once. It is the plan to work out informally an agenda for each meeting ahead of time. One meeting would perhaps concentrate on, among other things, immigration problems, the next on trade matters. The next on boundary waters, and perhaps the next on the sort of agricultural problems which the gentleman mentions. To that meeting, obviously, our Speaker would want to appoint some Members who are experts in that particular field.

Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as she may desire to the gentlewoman from Washington [Mrs. MAY].

Mrs. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support this House joint resolution. It strikes me as very sound legislation. I represent an area where the famous Columbia River runs north and south of the common boundary between Canada and the United States. There is more than a billion dollar investment on the part of the United States in this part of our river and I think this resolution provides a relatively inexpensive life insurance policy to protect this investment. In the future development of the Columbia River Basin, the people of the United States and Canada realize that their problems are mutual and that we can reach long-range intelligent solutions only by working together. If as nations we each adopt a narrow nationalistic approach, this would mean disaster to our common interest. Oftentimes our difficulties have been aggravated and exaggerated by unfortunate and oftentimes carelessly made pronouncements of persons on both sides of our boundary. I agree wholeheartedly with previous speakers that the congressional group which this resolution establishes would have the necessary stature to put discussion of our mutual problems in parliamentary conferences on a basis that would make it far easier to reach areas of agreement on the many problems involving our two countries.

Sir David Eccles, president of the Board of Trade, United Kingdom, made a speech before the European Industrial Conference in London in 1958 in which he said:

> Nations are not like individuals. They cannot fall in love at first sight. There are no enchanted evenings for proud and ancient communities, when across a crowded room they lose in an instant their heads and their hearts. Nations must carry about with them the wounds and dreams of history. They can come nearer to each other only by showing respect, sympathy and scrupulous honesty.

I am firmly convinced that with the passage of the joint resolution before us, we will create a greater opportunity to meet in a proper atmosphere for reaching a statesmanlike solution of our mutual problems.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

Mrs. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the joint resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That not to exceed twenty-four Members of Congress shall be appointed to meet jointly and at least annually and when Congress is not in session with representatives of the House of Commons and Senate of the Canadian Parliament for discussion of common problems in the interests of relations between the United States and Canada. Of the Members of the Congress to be appointed for the purposes of this resolution (hereinafter designated as the United States group) half shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House from Members of the House (not less than four of whom shall be from the Foreign Affairs Committee), and half shall be appointed by the President of the Senate from Members of the Senate (not less than four of whom shall be from the Foreign Relations Committee).

Mrs. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mrs. KELLY: On page 1, line 5, after the word "session", insert "(except that this restriction shall not apply during the 1st session of the 86th Cong.)."

Mrs. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment was suggested due to the fact that in June, pursuant to the invitation extended by Canada for Members of Congress to participate in the opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway, it will be necessary for the group to be absent 1 or 2 days in order to go up there at that period of time. That is the reason for this amendment. It will apply only to this particular occasion.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. KELLY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Does the amendment have anything to do with an additional appropriation

Mrs. KELLY. No. This amendment will simply permit Members to attend the opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway on the invitation extended to us by Canada. I should also like to point out that the joint resolution contains a provision limiting the group to not more than 24 members. The invitation extended by Canada includes 24. We hope that the U.S. delegation will not always include the full number. We also anticipate, in accordance with the desire of certain Members of Congress to join with us in the discussion of problems particular to their areas to incorporate them in the groups when those problems are discussed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. KELLY. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. I wonder if the gentlewoman could arrange to provide for a 25 member committee and have the gentlemen on it who led the fight against the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Mrs. KELLY. That will not be necessary because the gentleman could be included as one of the 24 members.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to put the House on notice and emphasize that this is the beginning of a $30,000 or more annual appropriation that will go on from now until the end of time. Someone spoke of Mexico a little while ago, and we immediately had the assurance of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD] that if the Mexicans invited us to establish a so-called parliamentary group, we would be glad to accommodate them and that, of course, would call for another $30,000 or more a year.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield.

Mr. JUDD. I did not say that we would be glad to accommodate them. I said that, speaking for myself, I think the relationships between the United States and Canada and the United States and Mexico are so important that it would be a sound investment to approve such an arrangement, if they requested it.

Mr. GROSS. Are our relations with Mexico any less important than with Canada?

Mr. JUDD. I said, I strongly approve of this with Canada, and if Mexico, which is the only other country which has such a unique position with respect to ourselves, should request a similar group, I would favor it.

Mr. GROSS. I like that word "unique." We are members of the United Nations and spending millions upon millions of dollars each year on that international organization. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bow] well pointed out, we are also members of NATO, and the NATO parliamentary group. We are also a member of the granddaddy of junketing organizations, the Interparliamentary Union. Next, it will probably be SEATO. I wonder how many official commissions are already operating between the United States and Canada. Does the gentleman have any idea how many committees and commissions we have going back and forth across the border conferring with the Canadians on various problems?

Mr. JUDD. I think there are none of a parliamentary nature; that is, between the representatives of the two legislative bodies of our respective countries.

Mr. GROSS. I am talking about committees and commissions of various kinds.

Mr. JUDD. Perhaps, if we could resolve some of the difficulties through this arrangement, we could save many times the amount of money herein through the elimination of problems that now require these other commissions or committees from the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. GROSS. I am not clear whether this is designed to take care of the opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway. Just what is this particular organization designed to accomplish?

Mr. COFFIN. We thought that the gentleman for once would be somewhat mollified knowing that this was one country that is not receiving foreign aid from us. This is a modest bill for maintaining and bettering relationships with a nation one-tenth our size in population and with greater resources. But, here is one nation that has not been the recipient of grant aid and this is a modest thing. I think the gentleman's talents which are remarkable should be reserved for greater things.

Mr. GROSS. Let me go just this far on that point and say that this is probably the least worst of all of these junketing deals that have been wrapped around the necks of the taxpayers. This is probably the least worst, but it certainly is not palatable enough for me to swallow. Earlier someone said that this United States-Canadian parliamentary group would take no binding action as a result of the meetings to be held. Let me point out that the American delegation to the Interparliamentary Union went on a junket to Rio de Janeiro last year and it is my understanding that this American delegation voted for the Paul Hoffman scheme to set up a United Nations special fund of $2 to $5 billion a year. It is my understanding that the American delegation also voted for a resolution to provide for a permanent United Nations Police Force. I wonder who is going to put up the $2 to $5 billion and who is going to foot the bill for a division of troops in the United Nations? Is this just another organization to recommend the spending, through an international organization, of more billions of our taxpayers money?

Mr. COFFIN. The ground rules also do not provide for taking actions which would bind either Government, but would explore the situation and help immeasurably toward better relations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, is there anything in this resolution that will prohibit the adoption of a resolution in any so-called parliamentary meeting with the Canadians?

Mr. COFFIN. This would not be necessary. This group is made up of three parts. It is bipartisan, first.

Mr. GROSS. No; the gentleman is not answering my question. Is there anything that prohibits the adoption of a resolution in any one of these parliamentary meetings?

Mr. COFFIN. May I say to the gentleman first, no; and secondly, if there were a resolution it would have no more binding effect on either Government than the statement of any individual.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Why do you need all these extra fellows when you have hockey teams, football teams, the lacrosse boys, and thousands and thousands of fishermen and hunters? Why do you need these? I understand the gentleman is supporting this resolution.

Mr. GROSS. I am supporting this?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I understood so.

Mr. GROSS. Not yet. The gentleman makes a good point. A couple of weeks ago we were told on the House floor that nothing helped international relations more than a fine sports event. So the House obligingly voted a half million dollars to finance the pan-American games in Chicago, an international sports event. In view of that argument I do not know of any reason why we should go into a thing of this kind when we have all of these fine sport relationships with Canada.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I have always gotten along with the Canadians, until they put the extra 10 cents on the dollar. I did not like that.

Mr. GROSS. Someone mentioned the fact that we have quite an investment in Canada. We have heavy investments in France. Why not a parliamentary deal with France, and with Britain? We have billions of dollars loaned to Britain and cannot collect a dime. Why not organize a parliamentary group with the British and French for the purpose, among other things, of collecting some of the money they owe us?

Mr. COFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield.

Mr. COFFIN. That is a serious question and deserves a serious answer. When you consider such countries as Spain, France, and Britain, which are remote in space at least, the problems are much more capable of being treated completely at the executive level with whatever advice you can give them. In the case of Canada, with the infinite amount of traffic back and forth, the gentleman from Michigan mentioned one irritation—a small one—occurring at the current differential. The existence of a group like this will do a great deal towards bringing about a climate which will be conducive to the solution of problems between the two countries, more than anything I can imagine.

Mr. GROSS. I am concerned about this bill, and I am concerned about all groups of a similar nature. We are appropriating approximately $50,000 a year to the Interparliamentary Union, but that is just a drop in the bucket compared to the expense which is incurred each year by that junketing outfit. The delegates take four-motored military planes, and with them go their wives and some of them reportedly take along their children all over the world. They spent counterpart funds, and this, plus the cost of operating a couple of big four-motored planes, plus the cost of taking their wives and other members of their families adds up to a fat bill of expense for the taxpayers of the country, and most of it never shows up in the appropriations made by the Congress.

I am sick and tired of this kind of business. In my opinion this bill will lead to a parliamentary junketing deal with Mexico and perhaps with most of the rest of the countries of Central and South America with the taxpayers paying the freight.

I urge you to vote against this bill.

Mrs. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the requisite number of words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from Illinois is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mrs. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, I seek, if I can, to bring this matter into proper perspective. The Foreign Affairs Committee has come in with a serious proposal to meet a serious situation; and I think that the issue merits serious consideration.

At the same time I feel constrained to tell you that I, and some others on the committee, had some reservations that led us to vote against bringing out this resolution at this time and without more extensive consideration of all factors involved.

I, personally, am not convinced that we have given adequate study to the overall future reactions possible, no matter how valuable this means of closer cooperation with Canada may seem to be.

I thoroughly recognize the need for bettering our relations with our neighbor to the north, and I also believe very much in person-to-person contact as the best means of developing better understanding between nations and between individuals. However, I am not fully convinced of the wisdom of establishing this new system of bilateral relationship, nor am I convinced that the method proposed is necessary to secure adequate consultation. Under the current rules of the Foreign Affairs Committee, systematic consultation with officials of foreign countries is already possible, although, admittedly, on a more limited basis. My feeling of fear concerning bilateral arrangements, Mr. Chairman, is based not only on the thought that other requests for such arrangements would inevitably occur; but even more on the fear that rejection of such requests will lead to misunderstanding and possible ill will. Although continuity of territory, such as exists between ourselves and Canada, might not be present at the time of such requests, it would correctly be argued that the United States could not justly discriminate on that basis alone. If, therefore, we put ourselves in the position of accepting this relationship with Canada, I would think that we could not refuse to establish such relationships, when so requested by any other country in the world, without seeming to deny to its people equal respect and equal rights.

So, Mr. Chairman, for reasons of long-range foreign policy, I did propose in the committee further and deeper consideration of all the factors and reactions that establishment of this new policy of permanent bilateral interparliamentary relationships might involve. I am sorry that I cannot wholeheartedly and without any reservations agree in this matter with my colleagues on the committee. Again, let it be said strongly for the benefit of our friends in Canada and in this country, that our relationships should be bettered, our mutual interests further explored, our friendship strengthened. I merely question whether, in seeking to gain all this, we have, at this time, duly considered what may be involved in quick passage of this resolution.

I would certainly express the hope that no nation in the world may be led to interpret this action to mean that we are giving favored nation treatment to any one country, to the exclusion of other sovereign nations who, while not so geographically close, do equally seek with us mutual consideration and friendly association.

Mr. COFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I think we should all realize when we approach consideration of this resolution the particular facts which exist regarding U.S.-Canadian relations. A while ago we were speculating about investments in Canada. Our investments in Canada amount to almost the total U.S. investments in Latin America and twice those in Western Europe. I cannot begin to tell you of the particular bases that we have in Canada or the reliance that we place on the DEW line and several other lines. I cannot begin to tell you of the great stress we place on our own planning in government or industry on the natural resources that exist in Canada or our continued participation in international enterprises of all kinds.

Here is one place, Mr. Chairman, where we have a chance to use imagination in devising a limited vehicle of limited effect for something that is helpful before an unpleasant incident occurs. Usually we are in the position of wondering what to do about a crisis and finding in Congress that our hands are tied, that things are too tense, that only the Executive can act. Here is one place where the legislative branch in a limited situation can make a contribution that is wholesome, that is preventive in nature, that is timely, that is bound to be fruitful.

I wonder, Mr. Chairman. Yesterday, with very little discussion and with very little controversy certainly, we passed a valuable bill. We authorized some $48 million in that outer space bill. That was a necessary thing, of course. We are not asking for that amount of money. We are asking for no particular amount of money, as a matter of fact. This is simply an authorization we are asking. We are asking for an authorization up to $15,000 for Members of this body and up to $15,000 for Members of the other body to engage in down-to-earth detailed discussion between neighbors. This is the modern version of the good neighbor policy.

I urge, Mr. Chairman, that we keep our perspective as we face the vote on this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. An appropriation of $30,000 annually is authorized, $15,000 of which shall be for the House delegation and $15,000 for the Senate delegation, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to assist in meeting the expenses of the United States group of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary group for each fiscal year for which an appropriation is made, such appropriation to be disbursed on vouchers to be approved by the Chairman of the House delegation and the Chairman of the Senate delegation.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I take this time only for the purpose of some further clarification of the appropriation to come before the subcommittee of which I have the honor of being a member.

May I ask what this money is to be used for? What is this $15,000 to be used for, how is it to be used, and for what purpose?

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOW. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JUDD. The best way to answer that is to read from a summary of the discussions of the first group meeting held early this year.

The item "Financing of Future Meetings," reads as follows:

Financing shall continue on the same basis; namely, that the host delegation shall pay the costs of group meetings and side trips in the host country and that the traveling delegation shall pay its travel expenses and its lodging in the host country.

When the nine members of the two Houses of the Canadian Parliament came down to Washington last January, they paid their traveling expenses and their hotel lodging. We entertained them at two luncheons between our morning and afternoon sessions. One was arranged by the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. KELLY]. The next day the Senate group provided a similar luncheon in the old Supreme Court room in the Senate wing of the Capitol. The expenses were taken care of originally by the gentlewoman from New York herself because the Foreign Affairs Committee had no official funds to provide even a luncheon for these distinguished guests within our country. This summer we hope a group of Members will go to Canada at the time of the dedication of the St. Lawrence Seaway. The fund authorized in this bill will be used to pay the travel expenses and the hotel bills of the U.S. representatives there; and the Canadians, if they should put on any functions for our group or take us to see a dam or an enterprise where American funds are invested, or perhaps a project about which there is some irritation, will pay the expenses of that side trip.

Mr. BOW. That is how these funds would be used?

Mr. JUDD. That is right.

Mr. BOW. The reason I am concerned about this is, we have appropriated, as I said before, about $58,000 a year for the International Parliamentary Union and some $57,000 for the NATO Parliamentary Union, and we thought we were appropriating the full amount of costs and travel funds. Now I am advised that the Air Force has a bill against somebody for about $104,000 for travel by the group. Now, is this going to cover the amount that will be reimbursed to the Air Force or whoever handles the travel, or are we going to have another situation where we think we are appropriating funds to cover all expenses and later find that there is a reimbursable item to some other branch of the Government?

Mr. JUDD. It is the intention of the committee that the funds authorized in this resolution and the appropriations coming out of the gentleman's own subcommittee later will cover all expenses.

Mr. BOW. In other words, this $15,000, as far as the House is concerned, is all the money that is necessary; that we will not have any bill submitted later for the Air Force for travel or anything of that kind?

Mr. JUDD. That is correct.

Mr. BOW. I thank the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. The U.S. group of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary group shall submit to the Congress a report for each fiscal year for which an appropriation is made including its expenditures under such appropriation.

SEC. 4. The certificate of the Chairman of the House delegation or the Senate delegation of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary group shall hereafter be final and conclusive upon the accounting officers in the auditing of the accounts of the U.S. group of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the resolution (H.J. Res. 254) to authorize participation by the United States in parliamentary conferences with Canada, pursuant to House Resolution 239, he reported the resolution back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MOUNT VERNON MEMORIAL HIGHWAY

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 2228) to provide for the acquisition of additional land along the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway in exchange for certain dredging privileges, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 2228, with Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, this bill was introduced at the request of the National Park Service to help bring about the acquisition of some lands along the George Washington Memorial Parkway which would fill the void on that parkway between Alexandria and Mount Vernon.

The lands would be acquired through an exchange of dredging rights, and as a result the property would be acquired at no monetary cost to the Government.

The bill was favorably reported on by the various agencies to the Committee on Public Works and was reported unanimously by the committee on February 12.

There was some confusion and misunderstanding about how the operation of the bill as reported might affect certain marsh areas on the Potomac, and because of this, some of the interested Members of Congress, who were concerned about the effect of this on the work of the Park Service in this area proposed certain changes in the legislation to make it clear that the marsh area would be preserved in its wildlife benefits as a wetland area, where birds might live and breed in the future.

I have joined in working out a series of amendments which I believe will be offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SAYLOR], and which I think will adequately protect the wildlife interests in this area and at the same time serve the purpose of the Department of the Interior in acquiring this land, to have the necessary land available for the parkway between the actual highway and the Potomac River at no cost to the Government.

This will enable the parkway to be enlarged, to fulfill its initial purpose along this area and at the same time, in the long run, will greatly serve the interests of wildlife in the area, because this additional property will come under public ownership.

There are provisions in the bill and in the amendments as to regulations in regard to the dredging operation that will be made possible by this swap of land for dredging rights. I believe the provisions are such that they will not in any way interfere with the normal dredging operation of the Smoot Co.; no authority is granted to impose regulations which would not be practicable, or result in an economic hardship to the Smoot Co.

I hope that the bill with these proposed amendments, which I believe are acceptable to me as the author of the bill and to the committee, will be adopted and that we will be able to move ahead with this acquisition of one of the few remaining sites along the George Washington Memorial Parkway between Alexandria and Mount Vernon that is still not part of the parkway, so that it may become Federal property and an important part of this great memorial highway.

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this bill comes before the Committee today with the unanimous approval of the House Committee on Public Works. The bill is approved by the Interior Department and is endorsed by the Department of Commerce, the two Federal agencies that will have the most to do with the administration of this legislation. The bill is also approved by the National Planning Commission, and it has the endorsement of the Fish and Wildlife Service. There was no opposition in the committee to the passage of this legislation.

The Smoot Sand and Gravel Co. are the owners of two tracts of land that lie between the Mt. Vernon Memorial Parkway and the Potomac River. One of those tracts consists of 150 acres and the other of 110 acres, a total of 260 acres of land altogether. The Smoot Sand and Gravel Co. may build at any time they desire whatever in the nature of a structure they desire on the property, or they may sell that property to some other owner or lease it and structures may be placed upon the property that would mar the landscape and shut out the view of the Potomac River from the parkway.

The Park Service and the Interior Department are the initiators of this legislation and the Departments that request its passage. No money is involved. The dredging will be carried out under the administration of the U.S. Army Engineers, who say that its administration is perfectly feasible.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACK of Washington. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Is the gentleman saying, then, that there is no anticipation that this will cost the Federal Government any money?

Mr. MACK of Washington. The Federal Government will give dredging rights to the Smoot Sand & Gravel Co. on the 150-acre tract the Smoot Sand & Gravel Co. now owns and which they may dredge, and in return for the 110 acres which are immediately adjacent to the parkway they will allow them to dredge 85 acres of land that is now under water in the Potomac River.

Mr. GROSS. This will not cost the Government any money, either now or in the future?

Mr. MACK of Washington. No. This is an acquisition of land from the Smoot Sand & Gravel Co., 260 acres, by the Federal Government in return for dredging rights on about 230 acres.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MATTHEWS].

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the chairman and the members of the committee for working in cooperation with several of us who are interested, along with them, I know, in preserving the Dyke Marsh as a wildlife area.

My attention was first called to this problem when I read in the Washington Post an article by Mr. Barnes, president of the Audubon Society of the District of Columbia, on Sunday, February 8, of this year. Many of my friends who live in the District of Columbia have expressed to me a keen interest in this proposition. They expressed the earnest hope that we would do everything in the world we could to preserve this natural wildlife area in the territory described by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SMITH].

As I understand, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] and perhaps the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SAYLOR] will offer amendments that will be acceptable to the committee and at the same time will help the lovers of wildlife in their hope of seeing a natural habitat preserved in this area. I am particularly hopeful that no marinas will be erected on the marsh site, that will be preserved.

I hope by this discussion this afternoon we can emphasize again to the National Park Service, and I think they realize this fact, the necessity of making every effort to preserve the few natural wildlife habitats we have remaining in this country.

It is my intention to vote for the amendments to be offered by the gentlemen to whom I have referred, and it is my intention to vote for the final passage of this bill.

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SAYLOR].

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the members of the Committee on Public Works for bringing this bill to the Congress so that we might act on it today. Many of us, and perhaps all of us, have traveled from Alexandria to Mount Vernon on that beautiful memorial highway which has been built by our Park Service. However, few of us realize that just outside the city limits of Alexandria, a large tract of land over a mile in length is in private ownership and is subject at any time to being dredged to within 10 feet of the present highway. So the basic purpose of this legislation and the reason that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SMITH] introduced it is to see to it that the National Memorial Highway is not the scene of a dredging operation. That tract of land which is described on this map as "A" comprising a little better than 110 acres will be deeded by the Smoot Sand and Gravel Co. to the Federal Government with no charge whatsoever. The tract of land which is described as "D" is also owned by the same gravel company and contains a little better than 150 acres of land. It, too, will be deeded to the United States at no charge whatsoever, but with a reservation that the gravel company will retain for a period of 30 years the right to dredge in that part of the tract of land subject to the rules and regulations laid down by the Secretary of the Interior and by the Army Engineers who have charge of dredging on any navigable river. In return for these two deeds to the Federal Government, the Smoot Sand and Gravel Co. will be given the right for a period of 20 years to dredge in the area on this map marked "C." That is an area of about 110 acres. But, the gravel company will only be allowed to dredge 85 acres of that land. It has been a matter of great concern to conservation groups in and about Washington that the Department of the Interior might be losing one of the few remaining wetland areas in and about the District of Columbia. Therefore, they are concerned about this bill. I would like to take this opportunity to commend the author of this bill, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SMITH] for his willingness to cooperate with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] and myself, who went to see him to work out the amendments which will be offered. The gentleman from Mississippi was most cooperative. I might say to my colleagues in the House that if all the Members were as cooperative in attempting to work out legislation as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SMITH] was in cooperating with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] and myself, many of the debates that take place upon the floor of this House would not be necessary. I want to pay a tremendous tribute to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SMITH] for his ability to sit down and work out a real tacky problem. I think, under the amendments, which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SMITH] has agreed to, and which will be offered en bloc, the Federal Government will gain; the George Washington Memorial Highway will be preserved; and the conservation forces in this country will gain a tremendous natural asset.

There is one further point that I would like to stress at this time. The Secretary of the Interior is given 1 year to designate a part of the land included in this bill as a part of the George Washington Memorial Highway. It is the hope and desire of all the people interested in this bill that the Secretary of the Interior will not include as a part of the George Washington Memorial Highway any of the lands that lie east of the line of marsh as shown on National Capital Park and Planning Commission File No. 105.223–415.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. METCALF.]

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Chairman, this bill, with the amendments that are to be submitted by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SAYLOR], is in the highest traditions of conservation. The gentleman from Mississippi is especially to be commended for his efforts in behalf of this legislation, for his efforts to carry out the needs of the National Park Service to preserve the scenic area adjacent to the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway, and for his understanding of the desires of conservationists to preserve the wetlands for a wildlife habitat.

For years many of us have pointed out that swamplands and wetlands suitable for the preservation of waterfowl occur in small tracts. All over America there are marshlands that can be acquired to preserve the nesting grounds and the habitat of this type of wildlife. It is appropriate that here in the Nation's Capital a plan has been negotiated between competing groups so that one of these small tracts is to be so preserved. It is significant that after conferences and consultation of all concerned a plan was evolved that gave the Smoot Co. substantially the dredging rights that it desired, preserved the buffer strip for the highway, and at the same time provided for the preservation of the wildlife values at Dyke Marsh. The solution here worked out can be an inspiration for similar solutions throughout the Nation and demonstrates that wildlife values can be preserved if all parties are willing to sit down and work out a plan.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL].

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to join the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SAYLOR], in paying tribute to the author of this bill, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SMITH], for the fine spirit of compromise and cooperation, and for the genuine concern which he has displayed for the problems of conservation. He contributed materially to the efforts made to preserve Dyke Marsh, an irreplaceable marsh and wetland near the Nation's Capital, for waterfowl and wildlife.

I would like to pay tribute to my good friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SAYLOR], as one of the outstanding conservationists of this House, and as one who worked so hard with me and others in evolving a workable solution to both protect the highway and to preserve a priceless natural asset, Dyke Marsh, for waterfowl production.

I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MATTHEWS] on the purposes of this bill and the purposes of the amendments, and I expect his remarks will be taken as an important part of the legislative history of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, briefly the amendments which will be offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SAYLOR] provide that Dyke Marsh is an area of national concern and that it is to be preserved for the production and preservation of wildlife. The amendments will also set forth the conditions for the dredging of the area. I might say parenthetically that the conditions are not intended to be and will not be onerous to the Smoot Sand & Gravel Co. They are regarded as necessary for the preservation and restoration of this small marshland to its natural conditions, at as early a date as can possibly be accomplished. It is our expectation that this will be accomplished, first through the wise selection of the particular areas to be dredged within area "C" leaving a rim or island around the outer edge of the area. We expect that the Secretary will provide for the deposition of the silt and waste from the dredging operations in such way as to encourage the restoration of the marsh at the earliest possible moment.

It is also our expectation as drafters of the amendment that the Corps of Engineers, which have informally promised the Fish and Wildlife Service their cooperation, will dump from their hopper barges the silt dredged from the main Washington Channel in such way as to accelerate the marsh rebuilding in the fastest way possible. They have advised us that they are happy to have a place to dump this silt from the main channel, and there is no better use than for rebuilding Dyke Marsh.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SAYLOR] has also provided that the Secretary will administer all of the areas known as A, B, C, and D in this bill, as wildlife habitat and will use them for the maximum development and preservation of wildlife and wildlife breeding in the particular area.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. FOLEY. You mentioned the exercise of discretion in the selection of this particular area for dredging purposes. I am assuming it is the wildlife area that will be sold.

Mr. DINGELL. What will happen is this: We assume that in the one area where Smoot is entitled to dredge 85 out of 110 acres, area C, that the selection of the 85 acres to be dredged will be at the discretion of the Secretary, who will use his good judgment for the preservation of the wildlife by retention of a rim around the edge to rebuild the area by siltation and in all other necessary and proper ways.

Mr. FOLEY. The Secretary of the Interior will exercise the final selection of the land?

Mr. DINGELL. That is our expectation.

Mr. FOLEY. I was advised some time ago by representatives of the Garden Club of America and the Wildlife Federation people that they apparently feel opposed to this exchange of land. I am gratified to see that progress has been made to accommodate those people. Do they approve of these amendments?

Mr. DINGELL. Of course, I cannot speak for the garden clubs. I discussed it with Mr. Gutermuth, of the Wildlife Management Institute. He thinks these are good amendments and in the public interest.

We have agreed to permit the Secretary 1 year from the effective date in which to reserve lands needed for parkway purposes and so provide in the amendments. However, it is our expectation that in no instance will he use this discretion to alter the character of the marsh proper, or to use land for parkway purposes beyond the marsh line.

The marsh line or border of the marsh extends at some points to 500 feet from the highway, but we expect that the Secretary will surely not use more than 50 or 100 feet of land beyond the present highway for purposes in any way harmful to wildlife values.

The Potomac was once the scene of some of the finest hunting in the East. Its marshes were famous for rail and waterfowl. Listen for a minute to Dr. Elliott Coues of the Smithsonian Institution, writing in 1882:

> During the fall migrations these marshes afford refuge and food for innumerable hosts of rail, reed-birds, and red-winged blackbirds, which attract scores of "gunners" so that during the early days of September this locality reminds one of the firing of a skirmish line preceding a great battle. The crack of fowling pieces is incessant from early morn to twilight. All classes in society are represented, from the gentleman sportsman with his pusher and favorite breech-loader, hunting rail, to the ragged contraband with the cheap, old-fashioned, single-barreled muzzle-loader, or old-style army musket, "wading" the marshes from knee to waist deep, to whom all flesh is game, who takes in principally blackbirds and reed-birds, and is particularly happy when he can surprise an unsophisticated rail on the side of a "gut." The professional or market gunner is also well represented, and during the early days of the season reaps a good harvest. It is a common thing on the first day of the season for one gunner to secure from 12 to 20 dozen Carolina rail and as many reed-birds.

Waterfowling along the Potomac is almost a memory. Only a few blinds are still maintained at some of the creek mouths and at Dyke.

Several factors have contributed to the decline of our duck populations locally. Siltation and pollution have made the river less hospitable to game fish and waterfowl, cutting down light penetration and the growth of aquatic food plants. Marshes have been drained and filled with serious losses of shelter and food resources.

During the past few years, the role of marshes in maintaining waterfowl populations has received wider recognition. The Fish and Wildlife Service, the State game commissions and the conservation organizations have joined forces to halt the destruction of marshes, to acquaint the public with the values of marshlands, and to bring about a restoration of wetlands where possible.

The Dyke Marsh, on the Virginia shores of the Potomac below Alexandria, is a fine example of the type of marsh which game management experts value. As a symbol of the wetlands habitats that produce our best waterfowl hunting, the preservation of the Dyke Marsh is of interest to every duck hunter. If we have not the wisdom to preserve a marsh on the borders of the Nation's Capital, what chance have we to educate the public in sections of the country remote from our centers of conservation interest? If Government officials and members of the Congress join in condemning this marsh, who is there to affirm the values of marshes? And if we lose our marshes, how can we hope to maintain a semblance of a famous sport with large economic implications to all who derive a living from serving the interests of the sportsman?

Let there be no mistake about the value of marshes generally, of the Dyke Marsh particularly, as a habitat for game species. Here is the natural breeding ground for resident black ducks and for the beautiful wood duck, when bordering trees or boxes provide nesting sites. From fall to spring, the Dyke Marsh is home for significant numbers of all of the surface-feeding ducks—blacks and mallards, baldpates and pintail, green-winged and blue-winged teal and a number of others. On migration, it harbors woodcock and snipe and a variety of shorebirds. Marshes provide the best trapping areas for muskrat and mink.

A marsh in winter seems like a bleak place, but not to a hunter or to the waterfowl he hunts. Even if the Dyke Marsh is closed to all hunting, it is still important to the duck hunter, invoking memories of exciting days afield and giving assurance that the ducks he loves to watch have a home nearby.

To the uninitiated looking at a marsh, it seems like a monotonous place and one may ask why it is so important to birds and other wildlife. A marsh is a very special type of habitat, with its own peculiar forms of wildlife—ducks and rails, bitterns and herons, muskrats and mink, and many more. Take away the marsh and you have destroyed the wildlife that inhabits the marsh. The wildlife does not move elsewhere; the marsh animals and birds could not make a living anywhere else, and there are no longer other marshes to which they can move. The only way to preserve the game and other species that are adapted to marsh life is to preserve the natural character of the marsh.

The marsh is not just a sea of cattails, a shelter for waterfowl from man and the elements. It is a prolific producer of food. Wild millet, smartweeds, and a variety of other annuals drop their ripened seeds into the shallow waters where they are preserved as a food resource for the ducks during the winter. The arrow arum, which the botanist admires along with the other flowering plants of the marsh, is one of the very best food plants for the wonderfully brilliant wood ducks. The marsh is rich in insect life, some living an aquatic life and others airborne, but all food for rails and bitterns, for swallow and wren. No other natural habitat supports a richer wildlife population around the seasons.

Most of us hunt less for the bag that we bring home than for the release from the tensions of business that comes from getting away from it all. This is the greatest appeal of the duck marsh on a frosty fall morning. One can also get away from it all with a shallow draft duckboat in the Dyke Marsh. So long as we keep the present extent of the marsh, some 200 to 250 acres of genuine marsh, that quality of wildness will be preserved, but if we allow H.R. 2228 to become law without the safeguarding amendments that are being offered on the floor today the remnant of some 50 or 60 acres of the marsh will retain little of the atmosphere of the true marsh.

It has been said that we have to choose between protecting the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway and losing the Dyke Marsh. I do not see the choice in those terms. We can surely protect the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway without sacrificing the wildlife values of the marsh.

It has also been said that a marina will afford more recreation to the public than the marsh. But again, I say that that is a false choice. There are plenty of other sites for marinas. The marsh can be preserved and boating can be unrestrained, but it ought not to be based on the edge of the marsh as it now is.

As one who has known the pleasures and rewards of waterfowl hunting, I am opposed to any measure that leads to the needless destruction of a fine marsh. I support enactment of H.R. 2228, if these amendments are adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 minute to ask him a question.

Will the gentleman from Michigan tell the House whether he and the gentleman from Pennsylvania have consulted with officials of the Wildlife Service in the Interior Department and tell us what their attitude on this matter is?

Mr. DINGELL. We have consulted with biologists and technical people in the Fish and Wildlife Service; we have discussed this at considerable length, with Mr. Keith McCarthy, who is administrative assistant to Mr. Ross Leffler, Assistant Secretary of the Interior for Fish and Wildlife, Mr. James T. McBroom of Fish and Wildlife, and others.

They are well aware of the things I have discussed in my remarks today, and have furnished us at our request, data planning and drafting assistance in framing the amendments we offer.

Mr. MACK of Washington. They are agreeable to the amendment?

Mr. DINGELL. They certainly are.

Mr. MACK of Washington. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and that all Members who desire to do so may have the same permission.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REUSS].

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment to H.R. 2228 reserving the Dyke Marsh as a wildlife area for study and recreation is an excellent one.

Louis J. Halle, author of "Spring in Washington," describes why the Dyke Marsh is worth preserving:

For 2 hours I struggled through the marsh, filling the sky with ducks that took off from the inlets ahead of me, sometimes only 2 or 3, sometimes 15 or 20 at once. The quacking black ducks and mallards were heavy on the wing, circling in masses all about the horizon. Alongside them, the smaller baldpates, pintails, and wood ducks flew in swift, compact groups. They rose high in the air, circled, and came sweeping down in long curves over the reeds. They circled away again, exploring the whole marsh with its myriad veins, before they decided it was safe to put down and, on suddenly set wings, scudded all together over the grasstops and disappeared into some inlet hidden from view. When they put into the smaller inlets, they backed their wings and dropped vertically from 15 or 20 feet. Several times I flushed ducks no larger than pigeons, the green-winged teal, swiftest of all, sweeping like sandpipers over the marshes, here and away again before you knew it.

I could never hope to stalk any of these surface-feeding ducks for a closer view of them on the water, but the little groups of American mergansers on the two broadest inlets were not nearly so wary. I crept up to spy on their privacy from the rushes, until one of them would spy me. Then, croaking softly, they would all taxi along the inlet, splashing with wings and feet, at last rising from the water and, stretched taut, make off like arrows to the open river. On one inlet a horned grebe, when it saw me, sank down like a rock and did not reappear. On another, a coot pattered away from me about the bend. A greater yellowlegs flew across the outer edge of the marshes on its way north, far in advance of schedule according to the bird calendar (although that evening I saw half a dozen more migrating in a flock across the airport). Though it was not a warm day, little companies of gnats were to be seen about the wooded edges of the marshland.

To complete the picture, you have not only singing blackbirds and song sparrows to add: two eagles with white heads and tails were beating back and forth or soaring aloft; turkey vultures and a single female marsh hawk were circling or sweeping by; a red-shouldered hawk hung overhead; great blue herons traversed the grassy pastures with wings beating slowly and easily, alighting on their long stalks by the borders of inlets, taking off again with the peculiar buoyancy of their flight, as if they were not altogether heavier than air. Crews struggled into the wind. Gulls flapped past or circled out over the river. This abundance of life, virile and variegated, expanding over the countryside with the change of season, was worth an amphibious excursion from the highway.

In another description of the marsh, published by the Audubon Society of the District of Columbia in 1948, Halle mentioned other birdlife:

It is worth visiting Dyke well before dawn in May. All the red-wings in creation are there overnight, and at first light the marsh begins to give them off in black clouds. Kingbirds cannot wait for the real dawn to begin their cheepering, and other small birds have the same impatience. As the blackness begins to dim, it is already a sounding and resounding marsh. Most notable in the chorus are the long-billed marsh wrens, more at home than any other small birds among these reeds. In May the whole marsh becomes a wren city that wakes before dawn. By the time there is light enough to see, the wrenlets, carried off their feet by their own singing, are bobbing up and down above the reeds on fluttering wings, so that, as I have said elsewhere, you have the impression of an effervescence over the entire expanse of marsh. With the smoke of blackbirds billowing up at the same time, it seems to be releasing stored-up energy.

Summarizing the importance of the marsh, Halle said:

In some respects the marsh at Dyke is a more nearly inexhaustible field for the observation of birds than any other small area close to Washington. In absolute dimensions the Dyke marsh is smaller than the National Airport; but area is relative for the nature explorer. A small patch of woodland is bigger, for him, than a large expanse of lawn, if it takes longer to investigate. I have never thoroughly explored this marsh, though I have spent many hours struggling through it. A large part of its fascination is in the knowledge that more birds inhabit it than one has seen, so that one's expectations are never exhausted.

Moreover, this is the nearest thing to primeval wilderness in the immediate vicinity of the city; civilization has gone around it, leaving it still beyond the frontier. It combines this advantage for the lover of wilderness with that of being more accessible to Washingtonians than, say, Alaska.

I hope that the National Park Service will help to make the Dyke Marsh useful for amateur naturalists with serious and mature interests.

At the Audubon Society's Corkscrew Swamp sanctuary in the Everglades National Park in Florida, the visitor walks into the marsh on catwalks maintained for that purpose. A pair of catwalks strategically placed at Dyke would encourage its appreciation and enjoyment by the public.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MEYER].

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, it would seem to me from the remarks on both sides of the aisle that the amendments to this bill now assure that here in Washington we are going to set a good pattern for the rest of the country in maintaining our wildlife and recreational values.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I know of no further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in order to protect more adequately the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway, and to add further to its memorial character, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to carry out the following transactions with the Smoot Sand and Gravel Corporation:

(a) The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to acquire certain lands in exchange for certain dredging and other rights on land already owned by the United States on the east side of the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway in Fairfax County, Virginia, extending from approximately station 426 to station 516+50, shown as areas "A", "B", "C", and "D" on plan numbered 105.22–415 in the files of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission and more particularly set forth as follows:

(1) To accept on behalf of the United States of America a good and sufficient title in fee simple, free of all encumbrances, to that piece of land lying on the east side of the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway and extending from approximately opposite station 459 to station 516+50, approximately five thousand seven hundred and fifty feet in length and averaging approximately eight hundred feet in width, and containing one hundred and ten acres, more or less, and as further shown as area "A" on said plan.

(2) To accept on behalf of the United States of America a good and sufficient title in fee simple, free of all encumbrances, to area "D" lying between area "A" and the Potomac River, and containing one hundred and fifty acres, more or less; the Smoot Sand and Gravel Corporation reserving unto itself, its successors and assigns, the right to remove sand and gravel therefrom for a period of thirty years, and for the same period reserving such riparian rights as may exist in area "D".

(3) To permit the Smoot Sand and Gravel Corporation, its successors and assigns, to remove sand and gravel from that part of United States property lying east of area "B" and opposite stations 426 to 459, to the extent of eighty-five acres, more or less, of the total one hundred and ten acres in area "C", as shown on said plan, for a period of twenty years, and for the same period granting such riparian rights as may exist in this area.

(4) To require that the scope of dredging operations necessary to remove the sand and gravel in areas "C" and "D" be so limited and conducted as not to undermine the adjacent shores of areas "A" and "B" and to provide that the Government shall have the right of ingress and egress from the Potomac River to the lands marked on the plan as areas "A" and "B" for the purpose of depositing dredged material in those areas; and to allow the workmen employed in the dredging operations at the locations described above to have access to the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway for the purpose of going to and from work, and to park their cars at designated places.

(b) The Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of War are hereby further authorized to prescribe in any contract or contracts entered into pursuant hereto any other terms and conditions deemed necessary to protect the interests of the United States in the above transactions.

(c) All lands acquired by the United States pursuant to this Act shall be administered by the Secretary of the Interior through the National Park Service as a part of the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway and shall be subject to all laws and rules and regulations applicable thereto.

(d) All dredging shall be performed in accordance with plans recommended by the Chief of Engineers and authorized by the Secretary of War as provided in section 10 of River and Harbor Act approved March 3, 1899 (30 Stat. 1151; 33 U.S.C. 403), as amended.

Mr. JONES of Alabama (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered as read and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 6, after the word "Capital" strike out the words "Park and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, may I just wonder if the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee would mind withholding action on this until after the other amendments.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. I may say that these are clerical amendments. This bill was originally presented at a time when there was a Secretary of War. That title was inadvertently carried in the bill when it was introduced. These are clerical amendments and do not disturb the substance of the bill.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 8, strike out "War" and insert "the Army."

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I offer several amendments and ask unanimous consent that they be considered en bloc.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the amendments as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. SAYLOR: Page 1, line 4, after the word "Highway," strike out the word "and" and after the word "character," on line 5, insert the following: "and in order to acquire an area of irreplaceable wet lands near the Nation's Capital which is valuable for the production and preservation of wildlife."

Page 3, line 5, after the word "acres", strike out the words "more or less".

Page 3, line 12, after the letter "B", strike out the remainder of line 12, and lines 13 through 16 to the semicolon.

Page 3, lines 21 and 22, after the word "Interior", strike out the words "and the Secretary of the Army are" and insert the word "is".

Page 3, line 25, strike out the period and add the following: ", including conditions governing the conduct of dredging operations, the deposition of spoil, and the revegetation of spoil areas, so that these activities will be carried on in such a manner as to provide for the preservation of wildlife values in areas 'C' and 'D'."

Page 4, line 3, after the word "Interior", strike out the balance of line 3 through line 5 and add the following sentence:

"The Secretary shall administer all of the lands described in this bill as 'A,' 'B,' 'C,' and 'D' so that Fish and Wildlife development and their preservation as wetland wildlife habitat shall be paramount, except such portion thereof that the Secretary shall designate as a part of the George Washington Memorial Parkway within one year from the effective date of this Act."

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAYLOR. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the committee has had an opportunity to consider the amendments that have just been offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. They are acceptable to the committee. The author of this bill tells me that in his opinion they will strengthen the bill and remove certain questions that have arisen before these amendments were offered. Therefore, we accept the amendments.

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAYLOR. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Chairman, we on our side concur in the statement of our chairman. The amendments are acceptable to us.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAYLOR. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BOW. May I ask the gentleman whether his amendments will clarify an unfortunate situation we have in connection with the Potomac River and the pollution of that great body of water? Is there anything being done to help correct that situation that exists here in the Nation's Capital?

Mr. SAYLOR. I may say to the gentleman from Ohio that some things are being done to correct that situation, but they do not have an appropriate place in this bill.

Mr. BOW. There is nothing in this bill that will be helpful from that standpoint?

Mr. SAYLOR. No.

Mr. BOW. I wish there was some way to get that in here so that we could correct some of this unfortunate situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SAYLOR].

The amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 2228) to provide for the acquisition of additional land along the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway in exchange for certain dredging privileges, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 237, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN FOSTER DULLES

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, the Nation well may mourn the circumstances that have forced John Foster Dulles to relinquish the Cabinet post in which he has so faithfully and honestly served his Nation and the world. Truly, he has consumed himself in patriotice devotion to duty. There is no question but that his skillful diplomacy and thorough understanding of the peril of our age have done much to prevent a cold war from flaming into an atomic holocaust.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, the word that reached us earlier in the day that our gallant Secretary of State had given his resignation to the President has brought sadness and deep regret to millions both here and across the seven seas.

John Foster Dulles has served as few men have done, but he has determined that he can no longer carry the full burden of his great office, follows the same consecration as all the acts of his public life. Few men have brought to the Cabinet and to the Department of State greater knowledge of world affairs. Certainly no man has given so completely of himself as has this dynamic public servant. He now steps aside that the country he loves and the world as a whole may not be placed in jeopardy by his physical disability.

There are no words in which to express the sadness with which we accept his verdict. Surely there is no heart that does not bleed for him and for the exquisite woman, his wife, whose love and understanding are a vital part of his strength, his courage, and his indomitable will.

Let us hope for this gallant pair that they may now have a period of even closer companionship than they have yet had, blessed by the gratitude of these United States and of the people of the free world.

INVITE THE DALAI LAMA TO THE UNITED STATES

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, recent events in far-off Tibet, like those in Hungary 3 years ago, have caused widespread concern for the safety of a brave and proud people who have dared to oppose the dictates of communism.

The citizens whom I represent in Congress, residents of the Toledo, Ohio, area, have expressed to me their profound sympathy with the people of Tibet and with their temporal and spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama. It has been their suggestion, with which I wholeheartedly concur, that an appropriate invitation be extended to the Dalai Lama to visit this country and to remain here for whatever duration may meet his pleasure.

In light of the difficult diplomatic position of India, present sanctuary of the Dalai Lama, this suggestion would appear to be especially timely.

While Nehru has said that India "cannot ignore, forget, or look away" from events in Tibet, it is clear that India is in no position to jeopardize her diplomatic relations with Red China. Thus it becomes apparent that the Dalai Lama's presence in India will pose an uneasy problem. In this connection, it is noteworthy that Mr. Nehru has said that while India has no intention of placing "undesirable curbs" on his activity, he hopes the Dalai Lama "would not take away any steps here which would embarrass us and him."

Surely the implied restraint on the Dalai Lama's freedom of expression which Mr. Nehru's comment suggests, would evaporate upon his arrival to the United States.

Mr. Speaker, our country has won both gratitude and esteem from millions of freedom-loving people for the sanctuary which we have accorded Cardinal Mindzenty. I know that a like expression of readiness to open our doors to the leader of the Tibetan people would also have the approval of the civilized world. It is with these thoughts in mind that I have asked President Eisenhower to extend an appropriate invitation to the Dalai Lama, and I hope there will be others who express similar sentiments.

HERTER WINS ACCLAIM AS ACTING SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, it is not often that a substitute, called in to fill the shoes of a star regular, at a critical moment in the game, is able to play his position with the skill and dependability of Christian A. Herter.

The illness of Secretary Foster Dulles, aggravated by overwork, deprived the free world of his great services at a tense crisis in the cold war. The Communists moved in quickly to exploit this advantage.

They failed to evaluate the sound preparation and the diplomatic ability of Under Secretary Herter, who quietly stepped into the breach.

Schooled in his youth as a member of the U.S. Foreign Service, Herter gained valuable experience and knowledge as State representative, Congressman, Governor of Massachusetts, and Under Secretary of State.

Without fanfare, Herter has developed a reputation for "getting things done."

He became the right-hand man of Foster Dulles who recognized his talent for statesmanship.

Eventually, the Communists will discover his unobtrusive but expert leadership too late and to their dismay.

To inform our fellow Americans as to the qualities of our next Secretary of State, I include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following editorial entitled "Herter's Assets Many and Valuable," from the April 7, 1959, issue of the Evening Tribune, Lawrence, Mass.:

HERTER'S ASSETS MANY AND VALUABLE

Acting U.S. Secretary of State Christian A. Herter has been stepping more and more into the limelight of late during the prolonged illness and absence of Secretary Dulles.

It is now generally expected that he will succeed Dulles in due time. But this development has brought forth some expressions of concern that Herter will not show the bold leadership in foreign policy during the next 3 years that Dulles has shown in the past five.

This attempted belitting of Herter's statesmanship does not seem to be justified by his record. Dulles may be the more able international lawyer. Herter is by far the more experienced politician.

As Massachusetts Governor, Herter is credited with having established a State development commission and department of commerce. Both were successful in bringing new business to this State and overcoming local depressions.

Other Herter commissioners worked out programs of court and prison reform. He was active in setting up the Massachusetts student loan plan and a New England interstate compact on education, although the latter was never activated.

In all, Herter, as Governor, was credited with getting 85 percent of his program through the Massachusetts State Legislature.

Dulles has just turned 71; Herter 64. But it is interesting to note that as young men, both put in some years in the U.S. foreign service. Both were staff assistants to President Wilson at the Paris peace conference in 1919. Herter then directed the Hoover Relief Commission in Europe.

Returning to civilian life, Dulles went back to corporate law practice. He did not again become active in foreign affairs until he was made a delegate to the 1945 United Nations charter conference in San Francisco.

Herter went into poltics. He served 10 years in the Massachusetts Legislature, 10 years in Congress, 4 years as Bay State Governor. His record here showed plenty of talent as a leader and a maker of public policy.

In Congress, Herter served on Joint Economic and Foreign Relations Committees. His principal achievement there was in seizing the Marshall plan idea and lining up the support which put it through the Republican 80th Congress.

As chairman of the Herter subcommittee on foreign relations, he led his group on a first hand survey of Western Europe to determine its economic needs and capabilities. Over the years, Herter has probably given more support to the foreign aid program than has Dulles.

This experience in getting along with lawmakers has stood Herter in good stead in dealing with Congress. As an ex-member of their club, Congressmen respect him. Having good relations with Congress is important for any Secretary of State—as Dulles well knows.

In the 2 years that Herter has been Undersecretary of State he has necessarily worked more behind the scenes as operating head of the department. Dulles has been front man and spokesman.

But during Dulles' many absences from Washington, it has been Herter who has made the day-to-day decisions, held the staff conferences, seen the diplomats and run the operations control board which carries out the policy decisions.

And any effort to sell him short would be a mistake.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. THOMPSON] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Education and Labor I have taken a particular interest in the operation of the Fair Labor Standards Act, which is designed—in its own words—to safeguard the health, efficiency and well-being of American wage earners.

Every year since I have had the honor of sitting in this House, there has been discussion about the amount of the Federal minimum wage, the extent of the law's coverage, or both. Almost every year there have been hearings before the labor committee on various proposals to strengthen the law.

This year, I am glad to say, it seems likely that our discussion will bear fruit. I am sure that a substantial majority of this House, and a substantial majority of our distinguished colleagues in the Senate, share my view that wage-hour improvements can no longer be delayed.

The question that will confront us in the committee, and will later be raised when a bill is reported, is this: What improvements should be made at this time? How far can we safely go toward relieving the plight of the underpaid and exploited workers among us, without damage and disruption to the economy as a whole?

The answer to this question is, of course, a matter of opinion, on which we can expect differences. In committee we will hear a wide variety of witnesses, who will urge upon us a wide variety of conflicting actions. Each Member of this House, I am sure, has already begun to receive communications, equally conflicting in their views on this issue.

All these witnesses and all these communications—as my colleagues fully realize—are to some degree suspect. They are suspect, not because they intend to deceive, but because each of them presents and interprets the facts that best support a certain viewpoint. The task of the committee, and of the House as a whole, is to sift these various presentations, to analyze them, and to arrive, as best we can, at a fair and reasonable conclusion.

Fortunately, we have available to us in this effort a considerable volume of data which—in theory, at least—was not compiled to support any predetermined point of view. I refer to the continuing economic studies carried on by the Department of Labor, the Department of Commerce, and their various subsidiary agencies.

These studies, conducted by professional economists whose only interest is to learn and report the truth, tell us at regular intervals what is happening to wages, employment, hours of work, living costs, and many other aspects of our national life. They provide a yardstick against which we can measure the pleas and opinions of those who are urging us to move in one direction or another.

In addition, many years ago the Congress, in its wisdom, directed the Secretary of Labor to study the effects of each increase in the Federal minimum wage and to report his findings. It was recognized that a study of what happened in the past would be of invaluable assistance to Congress in deciding its future action.

Congress clearly intended the Secretary of Labor to make full use of the data regularly compiled by his Department, and to make whatever additional studies might be necessary.

And Congress clearly intended that these should be factual and scientific reports, unclouded by preconceived opinions or political prejudice. We do not need to pass a law in order to bring before us another special pleader. We get plenty of those, without legislation or invitation.

I am not suggesting that in submitting these reports to Congress the Secretary of Labor should refrain from adding his own interpretation of them. It is entirely proper for him to interpret the figures and to make recommendations based upon his interpretation.

But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary of Labor has a solemn obligation to interpret his reports honestly, sensibly, and factually. I submit that a Cabinet officer, even though he is of a different political party than the majority in Congress, has a moral obligation to correctly represent the facts gathered by his Department, and no officer has a right to distort the facts in an attempt to justify his conclusions.

Yet that is exactly what the Secretary of Labor has done this year. His treatment of his report on the impact of the $1 minimum wage—a report which I, for one, was awaiting with great interest—is a deceptive, classic example of deliberate deception.

Let me call your attention to the sequence of events involving this report.

On March 12, Secretary Mitchell submitted the report to Congress. More precisely, he sent copies to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the Vice President, as the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

Along with this report, which covered some 700 closely typed pages, he sent what purported to be a covering letter—a letter which supposedly summarized the report, and which contained his recommendations.

On that very same day, the 12th of March, the Secretary of Labor released to the press the text of his letter. This was duly reported, throughout the Nation, as a fair summary of the Department of Labor's findings, and the resulting recommendations of the Secretary of Labor.

Meanwhile, what had happened to the report itself—the 700 pages which supposedly supported the Secretary of Labor's position?

As I have mentioned, copies were in the hands of the Speaker and of the Vice President. But no copy was available to the members of the House labor committee, or the Senate labor committee.

No copies were available to the press, except one—and that one was in the Secretary's office, where it could be inspected by newspaper reporters who had the time to wait in line for the chance. In effect, it was not available at all.

Why was this so?

At the time—on March 12 and for the next several days—those of us who inquired were told that the mechanical task of reproducing so many pages had delayed the issuance of the report.

Even then this seemed like a lame excuse; for the matters contained in the report were not last-minute news, or stop-the-press bulletins. Presumably the report dealt with certain economic developments that took place in 1956—as, indeed, it did. Surely the data had been compiled long ago, and could have been printed in time to accompany the Secretary's letter.

The real reason for the delay became clear only after copies of the report began to emerge—slowly and painfully, one by one—from the Department of Labor.

I have now read this report. I have also studied an analysis prepared by the research department of the AFL–CIO, which seems to me to be accurate in every detail.

I fully concur with Mr. George Meany, the president of the AFL–CIO, who—in a letter to you, Mr. Speaker—charged that "there is not a shred of information" in the Secretary's report to justify his account of it.

I want to call attention to two sentences in Mr. Meany's letter, which strike at the root of this matter. He said:

> It is one thing for the Secretary to oppose an increase in the minimum wage on the basis of his own beliefs and prejudices. It is quite another, and we think reprehensible, matter for the Secretary to pretend to Congress that his opposition is based upon this report.

The report—the 700-page document prepared by the Department of Labor experts, the document that was so elusive a month ago—proves beyond question that the $1 minimum was readily absorbed by the economy; that it caused very little disturbance even in the lowest-wage industries and areas; and that whatever damage may have been caused by this small disturbance was more than offset by the beneficial effects to the communities involved.

That is what the report said. But what did the Secretary of Labor say?

He said the $1 minimum did cause disruption and damage to the economy. He said it caused unemployment, especially in certain low-wage industries. To back up this latter point, he even quoted some statistics.

The trouble is, the statistics were wrong.

Secretary Mitchell told this Congress that "according to monthly data published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, 16 out of 22 low-wage industries showed a noticeable drop in employment" as a result of the $1 minimum wage.

It is not quite clear just what period of time the Secretary has in mind. I assume he did not mean the period of the Eisenhower recession. What he is supposed to be discussing is the period directly after the $1 minimum went into effect in March 1956.

Let us see what the figures really show. And bear in mind, these are figures from the Bureau of Labor Statistics, an agency within the Department of Labor.

The BLS figures for the period from April 1955 to April 1956—a logical comparison—show that in these same 22 low-wage industries, employment declined in 12, not 16. And in 4 out of the 12, the decline was less than 1 percent.

On the other hand, in 10 out of the 22 low-wage industries, there was actually an increase in employment. And for the 22 as a whole, there was no change. The gains balanced the losses.

Considering that this constant employment was at generally higher wages, the sensible conclusion is that the net effect of the $1 minimum was good.

But the Secretary of Labor obviously did not want to arrive at this conclusion. Therefore he brushed aside the accurate, up-to-date figures of his own agency, the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and substituted vaguely identified figures of his own, which he claimed were from the same source.

I regret to say, Mr. Speaker, that the same sort of distortion and misrepresentation pervades many of the Secretary's interpretations and recommendations. Let me add just a few words about his view of the future.

Secretary Mitchell opposed an increase in the minimum wage on several grounds. For one thing, he said it would cause "disemployment."

I am not quite sure why the Secretary used that particular word, which I gather is his own invention. I suppose it is the domestic equivalent of disengagement, in the sense of workers being disengaged from their jobs. Or perhaps "disemployment" is a new ailment, developed under this administration—a sort of economic fallout.

Possibly the Secretary just wants to give us something to remember him by. Warren G. Harding gave us "normalcy"; Secretary Mitchell offers us "disemployment." For the Nation's sake, I hope the comparison is not carried too far.

In any case, "disemployment" is what the Secretary says would result from a higher minimum wage. Yet the only basis for such an argument is the record of previous increases; and as I have shown, that record—despite the Secretary's distortion of it—is favorable.

To be sure, it would be a different matter if the legislation we are proposing would have a far greater impact than previous increases in the minimum wage. However, that is not the case. The best available figures indicate that our bill would cause an increase of only about 1 percent in factory wage payrolls. That compares with an increase of eighty-five hundredths of 1 percent—85 percent as much—caused by the 1956 amendments, an increase that was taken in stride by our economy.

This leads me to Secretary Mitchell's second principal objection to a higher minimum wage. He argues against it on the grounds that too many workers are now earning less than the $1.25 we propose.

I submit that this argument is ridiculous by any measure.

If, indeed, an excessive number of workers are earning less than $1.25 an hour, I submit that it is high time for the Congress to act. As any number of studies—including studies by the Department of Labor—make clear, $1.25 an hour is barely enough to provide a minimum standard of living for a single, self-supporting individual.

The Secretary is saying, in effect, that we do not dare try to solve a pressing national problem simply because it is too pressing. This may well reflect the attitude of the present administration toward many aspects of our national life, but I do not think it is an attitude acceptable to this House.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to revert back, not to the merits of the wage-hour bill, but to the tactics of the Secretary of Labor.

He submitted to the Congress a letter which at best distorted and at worst flatly misstated the contents of a report which he was obligated by law to compile.

He failed to make available, until much later, copies of the report itself; so his letter could not readily be checked against the facts.

By this action, the Secretary of Labor deceived and confused those he was duty-bound to assist and inform. And by giving widespread publicity to his letter, when the report was not available, the Secretary of Labor attempted to deceive and confuse the American people.

We all know how difficult it is for the truth to catch up with such deception. The Secretary of Labor has provided us with an outstanding example.

Two weeks elapsed between the time the Secretary publicized his letter, and the time when the 700-page report could be located and analyzed.

In that interval, the affair had become "old news." The letter which Mr. Meany sent to you, Mr. Speaker, pointing out the Secretary's distortions and misstatements, received little or no publicity. Only a few of our fellow citizens are aware that the Secretary of Labor's statements were false and his recommendations without foundation.

I must say, with regret, that this is not the first time Secretary Mitchell has disregarded the facts—and disregarded what he privately expresses as his convictions—to serve the narrow, partisan interests of an administration dominated by big business. It is simply the most flagrant example.

For my part, I am tired of seeing the Secretary of Labor pose as the one liberal voice in a reactionary Cabinet, when every time the chips are down—whether on minimum wages, unemployment compensation or labor reform—he winds up playing the administration's game.

The performance of the Secretary in this instance was not, I regret to say, unique. On a number of other occasions, involving this and other issues, he has resorted to contradictions, rapid footwork and just plain hokum.

For example, there was the matter of the labor reform bill of last year, known in the Senate as the Kennedy-Ives bill.

This legislation was drafted, as you know, by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. KENNEDY], who, I am proud to say, is a Democrat, and by the then senior Senator from New York, who has since retired, the highly respected expert on labor-management affairs, Irving M. Ives, who is a Republican.

Mr. Ives had every reason to believe that in helping to draft the bill, he was reflecting the position of the administration, and in particular the views of the Secretary of Labor. He spared no effort to shape the bill in such a way that it would attract broad, bipartisan support. But what happened?

The Secretary of Labor, without any prior warning, and while he himself was in Geneva, Switzerland, caused to be issued in his name a scathing attack on the Kennedy-Ives bill. He denounced the bill even though he knew full well that it contained most of the provisions he himself had recommended in his public statements.

I do not maintain that the Kennedy-Ives bill included all the provisions Mr. Mitchell had advanced at one time or another. But I do say it came close enough to merit his support, and far too close to provide any basis whatever for his intemperate attack on it. Mr. Mitchell should know enough about the legislative process not to expect any bill to meet in every detail the specifications set forth by one point of view.

Then there is the matter of Federal standards for unemployment compensation. For 5 years the Secretary of Labor has been exhorting the State legislatures to improve their unemployment benefits to yield, on the average, 50 percent of weekly earnings. He has not succeeded. Last fall he acknowledged his failure, and announced that he had joined those of us who believe that only a system of Federal standards can achieve that desirable end.

That was last fall. Now it is spring, with the votes counted and Congress in session; and the Secretary has changed his mind. At any rate, he has changed his speech. He's not for Federal standards any more.

We find the same old refrain when it comes to the coverage of the wage-hour law. Time after time, the Secretary of Labor has expressed the view that coverage should be broadened. Only a few weeks ago, in a speech he delivered in California—with a picket line of unprotected and underpaid farm laborers outside the hall—he even came out for the extension of the Fair Labor Standards Act to agriculture.

But once again, when we get right down to cases, when we are trying to carry out some of these objectives and we look for the Secretary's support, we look in vain. We get the sort of thing he offered us in his letter—the extension of the provisions on wages, but not on hours, to a relatively few workers, many of whom are in establishments which have already been organized by trade unions and where, as a result, the need is least pressing.

I was glad to read in the newspapers last week that in his address to the AFL–CIO's unemployment conference, Secretary Mitchell confessed that the administration had not done as much as he would have liked to see done about the unemployment problem. I admire his candor on that point. I only wish he would be more candid more often.

There is a widely held belief that Secretary Mitchell, if he were free to follow his own convictions, would generally be found on the side of liberalism and progress. For all I know this may be true. Certainly the continuing personal friendship between the Secretary and the leaders of organized labor—despite their sharp differences on the policies the Secretary eventually has to advocate—indicates that they feel his heart is in the right place.

But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the location of the Secretary's heart is less important than the way in which he exercises his influence and his position. It does not help the Congress, and it does not help the people we represent, for the Secretary of Labor to believe in his heart that the minimum wage should be raised, when his actual recommendation is that it should not.

I would much prefer the Secretary to say what he believes, to believe what he says, and to base both his beliefs and his words on the facts as developed by his own professional experts.

As I have said, there have been other instances in which the Secretary of Labor, in order to serve the political purposes of the present administration, has ignored what he knows—or certainly ought to know—is in the public interest. I should like to discuss some of these instances.

As I have pointed out, the position which the Secretary of Labor has taken on the raising of the minimum wage under the Fair Labor Standards Act to $1.25 per hour is not justified by the facts available in his own Department Those facts make clear that an increase in the minimum wage has not caused any appreciable dislocation in the economy, has not forced any appreciable unemployment, even in the low wage sectors of the economy, and has not been a noticeable hardship for any employer. Nevertheless, the Secretary of Labor has continued to insist that an increase in the minimum wage above the present level of $1 an hour would be inflationary and would do serious damage to our economy.

The Secretary's position on the extension of coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act has been equally equivocal. When in 1955 the proposals were made to broaden the coverage of the act, as well as to increase the minimum from the then level of 75 cents an hour, the Secretary informed the Congress that he thought the coverage of the act should be broadened. When he was pressed, however, as to what the precise recommendations of the administration were for extension of the act's coverage to particular groups of employees, he refused to give the Congress any recommendations along this line. The Secretary then took the position that the devising of proposals for extension of the act's coverage was the task of the Congress, not of his administration.

By taking this position, the Secretary deliberately withheld from the Congress the benefit of the informed views of his Department—the Department which in fact administers the Fair Labor Standards Act—as to the areas in which extension of coverage was most needed and most justifiable. His action left the Congress in a most difficult position and the result was that while the minimum wage was raised to $1 an hour in 1955, no action was taken to broaden the coverage of the act.

Subsequently, after Congress gave the Secretary of Labor money to conduct an exhaustive study of wages in retail trade, the Secretary made certain recommendations to Congress for the extension of coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act. These recommendations, however, were grossly inadequate and simply did not meet the needs which his own Department, in report after report, had indicated were of paramount importance from the standpoint of improving the effectiveness of the act. Time and again the Secretary, when pressed by congressional committees for his proposals and his advice on extension of coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act, has failed completely to provide the Congress with any leadership in this vital field.

The Secretary of Labor has likewise failed to measure up to his responsibilities as a spokesman in the administration for the welfare of the wage earners of the United States by the vague and often contradictory positions he has taken on legislation dealing with abuses in the labor and management field and with amendments of the Taft-Hartley Act. Last year, for example, the Secretary at first opposed and then agreed with the inclusion of a provision in the Kennedy-Ives bill to permit him to exempt small unions with less than 200 members and having gross annual receipts of less than $25,000 from the application of the reporting requirements provided for in that legislation. Indeed, the Secretary's last-minute agreement to accept this provision was one of the principal factors that made possible the nearly unanimous vote in favor of the Kennedy-Ives bill.

This year, I am informed, the Secretary of Labor is once again opposing inclusion of a provision in the Kennedy-Ervin-Cooper bill which would give him the authority to exempt small unions having less than 200 members and gross annual receipts of less than $20,000. He has taken this position on the specious basis that many of the abuses revealed by the McClellan committee have taken place in small unions. In this connection, he has endeavored to direct particular attention to the so-called paper locals of the Teamsters' Union which were formed under the leadership of Johnny Dio in New York City. Anyone who has taken pains to study the provisions of the Kennedy-Ervin-Cooper bill and the hearings of the McClellan committee is aware, however, of the fact that the type of situation involving the paper locals in New York City which were formed under the domination of Johnny Dio would not and does not purport to be cured by the reporting requirements of the Kennedy-Ervin-Cooper bill. The situation of these locals would be dealt with by other provisions of the bill as to which no exemption for small unions is provided for. It is not known whether the Secretary will maintain his position in opposition to the exemption of small unions this year or will, as he did last year, agree to the inclusion of such an exemption. While we all hope that the Secretary will not obstruct the enactment of constructive labor-management reform legislation, it is already clear that we are not going to have the benefit of much guidance or leadership from the Secretary in dealing with this most difficult field.

In this connection, it is worth pointing out that by insisting on the inclusion of provisions dealing with secondary boycotts and so-called organizational picketing in labor-management reform legislation, the Secretary of Labor is deliberately jeopardizing the possibility of enacting fair and effective legislation in this field. In the first place, it is far from clear that anyone has yet been able to devise provisions that will adequately prohibit undesirable secondary boycotts and picketing that will not at the same time interfere with perfectly legitimate activities of labor organizations. The field of labor-management relations is difficult and controversial and it is most important that Congress be alert to prevent either side from gaining an undue advantage over the other as a result of legislation which is passed in this field.

Finally, while I think many of us applaud the frequently repeated assertion by the Secretary of Labor of his opposition to so-called right-to-work laws, the Secretary has consistently opposed legislation to repeal section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act. This section is the Federal statute that provides the legal basis for State right-to-work laws.

The Secretary of Labor has said that while he opposes right-to-work laws he hopes—and I am sure he hopes with his might and main—that the States that have right-to-work laws will repeal these laws. Yet the Secretary knows—he must know if he has any concern for the facts—that while a number of the States last November rejected right-to-work laws, few States that have such laws have taken steps to repeal them. It is indeed most unlikely that these laws can be gotten rid of by State action. Only Federal legislation repealing section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act will do the job.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. FOLEY. Does the gentleman believe the Secretary of Labor disremembers the 1953–54 recession and the economic dislocation; namely, unemployment, or, in the gentleman's opinion, does he disremember the close to over 5 million unemployed in the 1957–58 recession in his selection of "disemployment"? Is that a new term coined to euphemize unemployment?

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I think it is sort of a sweetening term, perhaps the least invidious he could think of to describe this particular situation. He says some rather engaging things, and I understand is going to eat a hat if things do not improve radically in the near future. Then he will be "disposed" of a hat, I suppose.

Mr. FOLEY. Would you say he might be indisposed if he ate a hat?

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Possibly, if it is the hat I saw him wearing last, I think he might be indisposed.

The only basis for his argument is the record of previous increases and, as I have shown, in that regard despite his distortion of it, it is favorable.

THE COFFEE PROBLEM—WE MUST ALSO PROTECT THE AMERICAN CONSUMER WHILE TRYING TO HELP LATIN AMERICA—INTRODUCTION OF TRADING CONTROL BILL

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PATMAN). Under previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Missouri [Mrs. SULLIVAN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mrs. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, this being Coffee Day in Latin America in observation of the importance of that commodity to the economies of nearly all of the Latin American countries, it is an appropriate time, I believe, to reemphasize the need for at least some minimum protection for the American consumer in case the hopes and aspirations of the Latin Americans should materialize for a substantial surge upward in green coffee prices.

Without in anyway detracting from the good neighborliness reflected in our ceremonies here yesterday in recognition of Pan American Week, I want to bring to the attention of the Congress, as well as to our friends of Latin America, the fact that stability in coffee prices is mutually important to all of us. Unfortunately, there has grown up a sense of antagonistic objectives as between the American consumer and the Latin American producer of coffee. When coffee prices are so high as to be a gouge on the American consumer—as happened 5 years ago—Latin America exults in a resulting prosperity. And now in this year, when coffee prices at the producing end are so low as to cause concern bordering on alarm in Latin America, the American consumer tends to rejoice in the comparative reasonableness of the grocery store price of this much-desired item in the menus of most American families.

STABILITY MUST BE TWO-WAY STREET

For the good of all concerned, we need, instead of periodic violent ups and downs in coffee prices—feast or famine in Latin American having a reverse effect of famine or feast in American consumer uses of coffee—we need instead sincere efforts toward assuring fair prices both for producer and consumer.

I am not proposing any formula. I do not possess one. We are all familiar with efforts of the producing nations to operate a quota program to cut down on exports of coffee, particularly in sales to the United States. We are also familiar with efforts of our own Government, through various programs, loans, and other devices, to help the governments of the Latin American nations to stabilize their economies.

All I want to point out is, that our effort should not and must not be all in one direction. For under present circumstances, we in this country, as consumers, are virtually helpless in case a combination of events and activities below the Rio Grande should suddenly result once again in an excessive rise in price to the American consumer.

GREEN COFFEE PRICE RISE WILL SHOW UP IMMEDIATELY IN STORES

The coffee importing industry here is coasting along right now on extraordinarily low inventories of green coffee. As the price of coffee at the producing end fell, purchases and imports by American firms also fell. The practices of the coffee industry in this country are such that we can probably look for a sudden spurt in coffee buying and in imports as the price in Latin America might rise. And as green coffee prices rise, grocery store prices go right along with them. That has been the experience.

Five years ago, in the wake of a fake shortage scare, American importers went wild in buying coffee, and as they bought to beat the alleged or imagined shortage, in effect they tended to cause one which had no basis in actual supply and demand. The Federal Trade Commission investigation of 1954 proved that. Five roasters in this country built up incredible inventories of green coffee under this fear psychology, leading to an incredible price rise to an ultimate level of $1.32 per pound in the grocery stores. Five years is not so long ago that we cannot remember vividly the coffee shortage hoax which cost American consumers hundreds of millions of dollars.

CHANGE IN AMERICAN COFFEE BREW

The American consumer—the housewife—learned a lesson in economics in that episode which has been a bitter thing to Latin America ever since. She learned that as coffee prices rose, she could satisfy her family's penchant for coffee only by cutting down on the strength of the brew. Instead of the customary 40 cups per pound, the housewife got into the habit of brewing 50 and 60 cups per pound—and many still do so. A coffee firm which had occasion to write to me the other day sent the letter on stationery printed with the company's advertising claim that its blend gives a guaranteed 70 cups of good coffee per pound.

In other words, we have been forced by economic circumstances of the terribly high prices of 5 years ago to develop what amounts to a new national taste in coffee—the blend we drink now is much different from that of 5 years ago, and it goes much further. And the soluble or instant coffees have spurted in sales primarily as a result of the high prices of 5 years ago. Certainly this is a headache for Latin American producers, since we drink more cups of coffee now without necessarily buying more green coffee.

This should serve as a warning to our producer friends of Latin America to recognize the need for keeping the American customer's buying habits and budgets in mind, and not seek to raise coffee prices excessively. There has to be a level of reasonableness—or we as consumers and they as producers all suffer far-reaching consequences.

FTC SUGGESTS REGULATION OF TRADING PRACTICES

However, Mr. Speaker, I did not ask for this time today in order to lecture Latin America. That is not my purpose. I speak primarily to the needs of the American consumer, merely pointing out to our Latin American friends that we have a mutuality of concern in a common problem, and that solutions must be fair to both groups.

The history of the coffee inflation of 5 years ago, based on false information about a great shortage which did not in fact exist, and aggrevated by a series of startling irregularities in coffee futures trading in the exchange in New York, brings to mind that one of the few suggestions made by the Federal Trade Commission in 1954 for avoiding this kind of hoax and scare in the future called for the passage of a simple bill by Congress to place futures trading in coffee under the Commodity Exchange Act.

The FTC also suggested better crop reporting, and we have made progress in that. Agriculture Department estimates on coffee supplies have been generally accurate in recent years, particularly when they disputed self-serving estimates sometimes put out by any of the producing countries. But we have not yet taken the simple step of providing for proper regulation of speculation in coffee futures. Bills which I introduced in previous Congresses to carry out this major recommendation of the FTC have all languished in committee and died with the 83d, 84th, and 85th Congresses. Today, Coffee Day, I am reintroducing this bill to add coffee to the list of commodities subject to the Commodity Exchange Act.

LARGE LIST OF COMMODITIES SUBJECT TO ACT

Other commodities currently subject to such regulation are: wheat, cotton, rice, corn, oats, barley, rye, flaxseed, grain sorghums, mill feeds, butter, eggs, onions, Solanum tuberosum—Irish potatoes, wool, wool tops, fats and oils—including lard, tallow, cottonseed oil, peanut oil, soybean oil and all other fats and oils—cottonseed meal, cottonseed, peanuts, soybeans, and soybean meal. That is a pretty comprehensive list.

Onions and wool were added to this list just in the past few years—since the FTC urged that coffee also be included. Onions and wool were added because of congressional concern over manipulation of the market by speculative practices previously not subject to regulation.

Now is the time to add coffee. There is no imminent danger right now of a runaway coffee market—at least there does not appear to be any. Therefore, action to add coffee to the list, when the coffee market is down, could not set off any alarming reactions in Latin America as would be sure to happen if we were to take this action in the midst of a sharply rising market.

PRICE RISE IN GREEN COFFEE WOULD SHOW UP INSTANTLY IN STORES

Those who say "Why bother right now when coffee prices are down?" are like the fellow who saw no reason to mend his roof when the sun was shining, because "it ain't raining now." Of course, when it is raining, the repair work cannot be done.

My bill is no pat solution for the problems affecting the coffee industry. It is a minimum safeguard, however, for the American consumer in case we should again run into the kind of thing we experienced in 1953–54. The Federal Trade Commission, which originally suggested that Congress take this step, has shown absolutely no leadership in recent years in pushing for this legislation, just as it has not been very active in most other areas of its responsibilities. All the more reason then why we in the Congress must accept the burden of leadership on this.

With current low inventories of coffee on hand in this country—the figures show inventories dropped more than 100 million pounds, or 29 percent, during 1958 to give us the lowest yearend stocks on hand since the bubble broke in 1954—it is inevitable that every minor rise in green coffee prices will again be reflected instantly in higher prices in the grocery stores. This is the practice of the big roasters—according to the FTC report, they price not on actual cost of their coffee on hand but on replacement costs. So we will be on the price-rise merry-go-round immediately with any improvement in producers' prices brought about by tighter export restrictions or by currency manipulations in Latin America.

WE HAVE NO PROTECTION AGAINST SPECULATIVE IRREGULARITIES

If, in addition, the coffee futures market remains vulnerable to all kinds of irregularities in trading and speculative practices because of the absence of any day-to-day governmental regulation such as we have for so many other commodities, the American consumer will certainly suffer for it.

And Congress will be derelict in protecting the people who elect the Congress.

Sure, we can blame the executive department for lack of leadership, or of imagination and energy on this matter. But we already have enough political ammunition of that nature to carry us well through 1960. The point is that instead of political ammunition to berate a complacent and unimaginative administration, we need continued strong leadership here to point the way to solutions of problems which cry for attention. And trading in coffee futures is one of those problems.

I sincerely hope that the Committee on Agriculture will soon schedule hearings on this bill, and particularly call in the Federal Trade Commission staff experts who pointed the way 5 years ago to one of the few means available to the United States to protect our consumers from trading irregularities and manipulated prices on coffee.

The State Department is busily seeking to help the Latin American economies, and we all go along with that idea. But let us not forget the American consumer. Five years ago, the State Department was completely taken in by the fake reports of a shortage of coffee and in correspondence which I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in 1954, flatly assured me there was nothing to be done about the high price of coffee because the coffee supplies were alarmingly low.

Seldom has an American Government agency been so completely wrong on its facts on a matter affecting so broadly the entire American public.

COFFEE IS OUR BIGGEST SINGLE IMPORT ITEM

Coffee, dollarwise, is the largest import commodity coming into the United States. It is one of the few over which there is absolutely no form of governmental control to prevent trading irregularities and manipulation of the market. This is an intolerable situation.

I salute Latin America on Pan American Week and on Coffee Day. The governments of Latin America are doing everything they can think of to raise coffee prices as a means of raising income levels. There is no reason why they should not obtain fair prices for this major crop. But, unless we pass legislation such as I am introducing today to place trading in coffee futures under the Commodity Exchange Act, what protection is there for our consumers if, as I said, the hopes and aspirations of Latin America for a great surge in coffee prices should materialize?

Considering that we need about 3 billion pounds of green coffee a year, it is easy to see what each 1-cent increase in the price means to us as consumers. We don't want to hold prices unfairly low; but we need at least minimum protection to keep them suddenly in the future from again going through the stratosphere, as they did in 1954, when the need for this legislation was so dramatically called to our attention.

THE OPPORTUNITY TO CREATE A FREE SOCIETY

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, the United States was built by people who dared every hardship for the opportunity to create a free society. For generation after generation, we opened our arms to the poor and oppressed peoples of Europe.

In every land, people dreamed of the day when they would be able to come to the United States, the sanctuary of freedom. Once here, they knew that we would never betray them to the oppressors from whom they had escaped.

The upheavals of World War II made it possible for many of these people to escape the clutches of communism. Millions of displaced persons and refugees found temporary safety behind the lines of the advancing American armies. The United States, dedicated to the principle of human rights, could not in good conscience, send these victims back to the doom that is communism.

Responding to their appeals for help, the Congress enacted the Displaced Persons Act, the Refugee Relief Act, and other laws to temper justice with mercy, so that those who fled to the United States would not have to fear that at some future time they would be forcibly returned to the lands where terror rules.

It is true that a few of them, in desperation, managed to reach the United States without the formalities of proper papers. Others, who did enter through regular channels, subsequently suffered mental breakdowns which could be traced to the nightmare of Communist persecution which has been known to break the mind and spirit of human beings.

Technically, they were still aliens. And, in the stilted language of the immigration laws, they were granted the dubious protection called "stay of deportation." In the Immigration Law of 1952, it was stated that:

> The Attorney General is authorized to withhold deportation of any alien within the United States to any country in which, in his opinion, the alien would be subject to physical persecution and for such period of time as he deems necessary for such reason.

No one paid any attention to this section because it was inconceivable that communism would ever abandon force and terror as basic policy. But now, the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service has notified a number of Poles in the categories I have referred to, that:

> Information available indicates a changed political situation in Poland necessitating reconsideration of the aliens' application for stay of deportation.

What changed political situation? The Immigration and Naturalization Service does not state, because it does not know. So it places the burden of proof on the alien in this country. The aliens are informed that they will be furnished a further opportunity to testify and submit any available evidence they may have, to support their claim of physical persecution if returned to Poland at this time.

This strange about-face in policy is fantastic, ludicrous, and heartless. It is demoralizing the refugees, and is arousing justified resentment among all fair-minded Americans. The sincerity of the United States, and its longstanding reputation of protecting those who found asylum here, is at stake.

What caused this switch, which now proposes to betray the promise of sanctuary, and hand the victims back to the Communists, and to the terrors of rehabilitation? Is it part of the new and flexible foreign policy of the United States, which, in the name of expediency, would conveniently ignore principles? Whatever the rationalization may be, it is both wrong and cruel.

The American public will never sanction the use of freedom-loving Polish refugees as instruments of international diplomacy. The Soviet record of broken pledges and of governing satellite nations by puppet regimes, is too well known to permit any wishful thinking on the part of the U.S. Government. Those who rule Poland today have Polish names, but from that point on, any similarity or relationship between them and the Polish people is a fiction and a fraud. The Polish Government is Communist. It is the captive of the Kremlin. It is the enemy of the Polish people and their imperishable devotion to freedom and to their Catholic faith. To forcibly deport anti-Communist refugees to Communist-dominated Poland would betray their confidence in us. This is but a first step in toward appeasement of the Soviet Union and recognition of its domination over Poland and every other satellite country.

The United States is being pressured and persuaded to participate in summit conferences to the dismay of those behind the Iron Curtain who look to us, and our professed ideals, as their last hope. Khrushchev wants to bargain at the top level. In the expectancy that we will weaken and disenagage and abandon Eastern Europe to communism.

The American people must make it plain to the U.S. Government that they will never support any sacrifice of principle for the illusion of "peace in our time," for that road of cowardly compromise leads to disaster.

The burden is on the Immigration and Naturalization Service to prove that the political situation in Communist Poland has improved to the extent that it would be safe for refugees. It has made no attempt to do so, because it knows that it has no case. The Immigration and Naturalization Service does not realize the consequences of its ill-advised decision. I am sure that it does not want to assume responsibility for the reenslavement of men and women who are now free. But that will be the end result if it continues with its present plans.

I, therefore, ask the Congress to revoke the discretionary and arbitrary power exercised by the Immigration and Naturalization Service in these instances. The immigration laws must protect, and not punish, those aliens and refugees who are of good character, and who are definitely anti-Communist.

Our long and loyal friendship with the Polish people, and our spiritual kinship with them as fighters for freedom, require that we stop this inhuman deportation program which is bereft of reason and conscience.

We must welcome instead of condemning to exile, the Polish refugees in the United States. And thereby prove to them; to the captive peoples of Europe; and to the civilized world; that our country is in truth, the haven for the oppressed who believe and trust in American justice and American compassion.

ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon when rollcall No. 28 was had, I was inadvertently and unavoidably absent because I had to attend the awarding of essay prizes at the Kenwood Country Club on behalf of the Civitan Club of Bethesda. Had I been present I would have voted "yea."

MR. HAROLD LOCKHEIMER

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ADDONIZIO] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADDONIZIO. Mr. Speaker, the Government has lost a most able and devoted public servant in the recent resignation of Mr. Harold Lockheimer from the exacting position of Director of the Federal Housing Administration Insuring Office for Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. Mr. Lockheimer assumed the post, which he held for 3 years and 4 months, at considerable personal sacrifice, and now finds it imperative to devote time to his business affairs, principally his public relations firm.

As acting chairman of the Housing Subcommittee of the House Banking and Currency Committee, I became well acquainted with Mr. Lockheimer and was most favorably impressed with the efficiency and enthusiasm with which he met an ever increasing workload. His splendid performance is reflected by the growth in the volume of FHA operations in Puerto Rico. During the first 17 years of the program, 1939 through 1955, inclusive, approximately $135 million in home mortgage loans were insured by the local office. By contrast, $108 million in home mortgage loans were insured by the office during Mr. Lockheimer's incumbency of 3 years and 4 months.

From those who are familiar with his record, Mr. Lockheimer takes with him into private life appreciation for a job well done and best wishes for the future.

NEW AREA REDEVELOPMENT BILL APPROVED BY SUBCOMMITTEE

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of Subcommittee No. 3 of the House Banking and Currency Committee, I wish to include in the record at this point a short summary of the changes which the subcommittee agreed upon yesterday in voting to report favorably to the full committee S. 722, the Area Redevelopment Act. Since these changes involve many different provisions of the bill, they were incorporated in a single amendment in the nature of a substitute. Because of the widespread interest in this badly needed legislation, I am sure it will be helpful to the Members to have this information. Chairman SPENCE has not indicated when the bill will be brought before the full committee for consideration.

EFFECT OF CHANGES IN S. 722 AGREED TO BY SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 3

1. Eligibility criteria for rural areas:

Administrator must designate any rural county on either of two 1954 lists of counties with lowest farm incomes and levels of living; may designate other counties under criteria of original bill.

2. Financing:

Loan funds must be appropriated (bill now allows borrowing such funds from Treasury).

3. Dollar amounts:

[In millions of dollars]

	Now	Proposed
Plant loans (industrial areas)	$100.0	$75.0
Plant loans (rural areas)	100.0	75.0
Public facility loans	100.0	50.0
Public facility grants	75.0	35.0
Retraining subsistence payments	10.0	10.0
Vocational training grants	(1)	[2] 1.5
Technical assistance	[2] 4.5	[2] 4.5
Total	389.5	251.0

[1] No amount specified.
[2] Per year.

4. Public facility loans and grants:

(a) no loans or grants to private organizations.

(b) interest rate lowered on loans (from 4 percent to 2⅞ percent under present conditions).

(c) loan may cover entire cost (bill now limits to 65 percent).

(d) requirement that public works project itself provide permanent jobs is eliminated.

(e) loans may be made where not otherwise available on "equally favorable" terms. (Bill now says "reasonable terms.")

(f) both loans and grants must be consistent with approved overall redevelopment program.

(g) loan or grant is prohibited for facility that would compete with existing privately owned public utility unless State agency finds need.

5. Urban renewal grants:

Not more than 10 percent of new funds authorized for total urban renewal program may be used under area redevelopment program.

6. Vocational training:

(a) dollar limit on financial assistance ($1.5 million a year).

(b) financial assistance must be channeled through State board for vocational education.

(c) authority for Secretary of Labor to issue vocational training regulations jointly with Administrator is eliminated.

7. Records and audit:

Recipients of plant loans or public facility loans or grants must keep records, submit to GAO audit.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ABOUT THE NEW POLICY OF TIGHT MONEY AND HIGH INTEREST

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, on Monday President Eisenhower renewed his campaign against what he calls inflation. According to the front page stories in the newspapers yesterday, the President made a speech on Monday to the Advertising Council, which is reported to be made up of top executives of advertising and communication firms, such as the Madison Avenue outfits, the broadcasting networks, the big newspapers and magazines, and so on. The President congratulated the advertising and communications industries for the sound dollar campaign which they have been carrying on, and promised to renew his fight against the so-called inflation.

The President's speech recognized that inflation is in the realm of the future, if not in the realm of imagination. He pointed out that the price indexes have been stable for many months. Nevertheless, he declared that since there is no present inflation, "This is exactly the time to think about the inflation."

I believe we may safely assume that this renewed campaign against inflation means the country will have more tight money and high interest and more price increases—plus, of course, continuing opposition to all legislation aimed at putting the unemployed back to work and putting the economy back on the road to growth. Tight money and high interest have been the tools used in the administration's past campaigns against inflation, and I see no indication that the tools will be changed. Nor can I imagine any tools that could be so agreeable to the Wall Street bankers and money manipulators.

If the new campaign against inflation means what it has meant in the past, it will mean still more profits for the big bankers and money lenders, and still more interest burdens on the general public. It will mean that the stock-market will be on its way up again. It will mean that the national stockbrokers will bring still more suckers into the market, selling them stocks whose dividend yields are less than the interest rates on Government bonds. And it will mean that the big boys in the market will make still more millions—taxable only as capital gains.

Actually the Government authorities who decide the money and credit policies of this Nation have already put the country back in a condition of tight money and high interest. Why?

Let us examine the arguments which have been made for the tight-money and high-interest rate policies. Let us take up the arguments in a systematic way and see whether the cold facts actually support the arguments. Let us examine these questions:

Mr. Speaker, are high interest rates needed to encourage more savings?

What is the evidence that high interest rates do in fact encourage savings? Have individuals saved larger percentages of their incomes when interest rates were high than when interest rates were low?

What is the reason for the Treasury's difficulty in selling securities to individuals and institutions who have savings to invest? Is the Treasury asking the public to carry a heavier load of Federal securities than in the past? Has a kind of saturation point been reached beyond which investors will not absorb more Federal securities except at higher interest rates?

Has the demand for investment funds from all sources, including demands from abroad, placed increasing requirements on our economy for savings?

Has the recent progress toward business recovery resulted in an increased demand for credit which is likely to exceed the rate of savings and thus bring about an inflationary excess of bank-created money?

Let us examine some of the evidence on these questions and then take up these additional questions: How much have the recent increases in interest rates added to the cost of carrying the Federal debt? How do these increased costs affect the prospects for reducing the Federal debt?

These are important questions, and I am afraid that many of us have been sold some unsupportable answers. The fact is, I think, that many of us have been inclined to accept the proposition that the high interest rates which have been imposed on the country over most of these past 5 or 6 years have actually had some justification in what seems offhand to be a new and larger demand for savings than has been encountered in previous years. True, in several recent years business investment has been at unprecedentedly high levels. State and local governments have been increasing their outlays for local improvements and issuing larger amounts of debt obligations. Finally, the Federal debt has hit an all-time high—$285 billion. And, as we know, the Treasury has a problem of financing this year's deficit of about $13 billion, in addition to which it will be faced with the problem of refunding within the next 12 months about $70 billion of the already existing debt, not counting refunding of savings bonds and new issues of Treasury bills.

But let us see whether or not the problem really is bigger than in the past. To find the answers to most of the questions I have posed, we can turn to the factual record of the past several years and see what the results have been. Since the Treasury-Federal Reserve accord was reached in early 1951, the money managers have, in general, been on a program of tight money and high interest rates—that is true. Yet there have been several times when the money managers thought they had overdone the tight-money policy and instituted periods of easy money and relatively low interest rates. In fact, these policy changes have covered some wide extremes, and interest rates in these years have undergone extremely wide variations.

THE PAST SAVINGS IN MONETARY PLOICY

By way of background, let me refresh the Members' memories concerning the times when new credit policies have been instituted and temporarily reversed.

The first period of tight money was instituted simultaneously with this administration's taking office in 1953. In fact, the Federal Reserve had already begun to tighten credit in November and December of 1952, before the administration took office. Then in February of 1953, the administration instituted its tight money policy officially. Its first issue of bonds—the notorious 3¼ percent bonds issued in February—was at an interest rate considerably above rates then prevailing in the market, this incident both influenced the upward trend of interest rates and confirmed investors' beliefs that the administration intended to pursue the tight-money policy which it had been proclaiming.

Perhaps the best way to mark the changes in credit policies which have taken place since is to note the changes in the rates on 91-day Treasury bills. It is in these bills that the Federal Reserve's Open Market Committee trades, and it is principally by increasing or decreasing its portfolio of these bills that the Federal Reserve increases or decreases the supply of money and credit in the banking system. In other words, the going rate on Treasury bills is generally accepted to be the most direct and sensitive index of the Federal Reserve's current credit policy.

The rate on Treasury bills, which had averaged 1.8 percent in 1952, was driven up to almost 2¼ percent by May of 1953. By late summer of 1953, however, business started on a rapid decline and there was much feeling in the administration, in the Federal Reserve, and elsewhere, that the program of tightening credit had gone too far and too fast. So in the late summer of 1953, the monetary authorities began loosening credit, and they made credit progressively easier until the rate on Treasury bills fell to about two-thirds of 1 percent by June of 1954. At this point, however, the money managers began tightening credit again, and by the third quarter of 1955 money was tighter even than at mid-1953.

Thereafter the monetary authorities continued to increase the squeeze. There were two brief reprieves in 1956; but, on the whole, money was much tighter in 1956 than it had been in the first quarter of 1953. The bill rate for that year averaged about 2.7 percent. Then in 1957 the brakes were applied progressively harder up to mid-November of that year. The average bill rate for 1957 was 3.3 percent.

By late 1957 the great business recession was then upon us. So, beginning early in 1958 the monetary authorities began loosening credit. The Treasury bill rate dropped to 2.6 percent in January, and continued down to about nine-tenths of 1 percent by June of that year.

Then, beginning last July credit began to be tightened again, and by December the bill rate had been brought up to 2.8 percent. Furthermore, since that time our money managers have taken action which indicates they intend to continue the new credit squeeze for some time, and even increase it. Early last month the Federal Reserve raised its discount rate from 2½ percent to 3 percent, and, simultaneously, the rate on Treasury bills jumped to above 3 percent and has ranged between 2.7 percent and 2.9 percent in the weeks since.

This, then, is the record in brief.

DO HIGH INTEREST RATES ENCOURAGE SAVINGS?

Many of the official pronouncements made in support of high interest rates have been, of course, that high interest rates encourage people to save more. Chairman Martin has often put it this way: "Interest is a wage to the savers as well as a cost to the borrower."

But if high interest rates actually do cause individuals to save more, we would expect to find some indication of this in the record. We would expect that people would have saved larger percentages of their personal disposable income in years when interest rates were high than in years when interest rates were low. Personal disposable income is, of course, personal income less taxes, which is the total income that individuals may use for both spending and saving.

As I have indicated, interest rates have varied widely between the years 1951 and 1958. But the fact is that the percentage of disposable incomes which individuals saved in these years varied within a rather narrow range, and furthermore, the highest percentages of savings were made in years when interest rates were lowest.

Table 1, which I will insert at this point, shows the percentage of disposable personal income saved in each of the years 1951 through 1958. And for comparative purposes the table also shows the average market yield on 91-day Treasury bills; the average market yield on taxable U.S. Government bonds; and the average market yield on prime commercial paper. It shows no correlation that I can discover between interest rates and the percentage of incomes that have been saved.

Here are a few comparisons. In the whole range of years individuals saved the lowest percentage of their disposable incomes in 1955, when only 6.4 percent was saved; and they saved the highest percentages in 1952 and 1953, when 7.9 percent was saved. In the 2 years of highest savings, interest rates were relatively low. For example, the yield on Treasury bills averaged 1.77 percent in 1952, and 1.93 percent in 1953. On the other hand, in the year when interest rates were highest, 1957, individuals saved one of the smallest percentages of their incomes—6.8 percent. And to continue the contrast, individuals saved a somewhat lesser portion of their income for 1958, when the average yield on Treasury bills was at 1.84 percent, than in 1957, when the yield was 3.27 percent.

Now for purposes of comparison here, it would perhaps be better to call attention to an interest rate which is more widely available to individuals on the form of savings which they are most likely to make. For example, we might compare prevailing rates being paid by the banks on time deposits. However, no statistics on the actual rates paid on time deposits are available, and the Federal Reserve System, which sets the maximum rate by regulation, has changed this maximum only once in this period of years when it was running interest rates up and down elsewhere.

The interest rates which we have compared, however, are fair indications of rates available to individuals on their savings. As for the 3-month Treasury bills, individuals can and do invest in these, although such investments must be made in an amount of no less than $1,000, and in multiples of $1,000.

Table 2 will throw additional light on this subject. It shows the percentage change in interest rates from one year to the next, and the percentage change in the rate of personal savings from one year to the next. As often as not when interest rates went up, the rate of savings went down. To cite two examples: Between 1954 and 1955 the average yield on 91-day Treasury bills jumped by 84 percent, but the rate of savings dropped 12 percent; between 1956 and 1957 the bill rate jumped 23 percent, but the savings rate went down 6 percent.

Individuals do invest in 91-day Treasury bills, however, as well as do banks, other financial institutions, and industrial corporations. And long-term Government bonds are, of course, quite commonly available for individual investment.

Table 2 will throw additional light on this subject. It shows the percentage change in interest rates from one year to the next and the percentage change in the rate of personal savings from one year to the next. Let me call attention to what the table shows:

From 1951 to 1952 the bill rate went up 14 percent, and the bond rate went up 4 percent, but the ratio of personal savings went up only 1 percent.

Then in 1953, the bill rate went up another 9 percent, and the bond rate went up another 10 percent. But the percentage of personal incomes which was saved went up not one iota.

In the easy credit period of 1954, the average bill rate dropped 51 percent and the bond rate dropped 13 percent. And in this year, whether because of the recession or because of the drop in interest rates, individuals saved 8 percent less of their incomes than in the previous year.

But then look at what happened in 1955. The bill rate went up 84 percent, and the bond rate went up 11 percent, but the rate of individual savings went down again by 12 percent.

In 1956, the bill rate went up another 52 percent, and the bond rate went up another 8 percent, and this time individual savings also went up—by 12 percent.

But in 1957 the bill rate went up another 23 percent, and the bond rate went up another 13 percent, and this time the savings rate dropped by 6 percent.

Then last year the bill rate dropped 44 percent and the bond rate 12 percent, and the individual savings rate went down again by 6 percent.

In none of these years was the magnitude of the change in the savings rate in any way related to the magnitude of the changes in interest rates. In fact, in 3 of the 7 years the savings rate changed in the opposite direction from quite large changes in interest rates; and in one of the 7 years the savings rate changed not at all despite large increases in interest rates.

TABLE 2.—Changes in interest rates compared with changes in rate of personal savings

Year	Percent change from previous year
	Interest yield on 91-day Treasury bills	Interest yield on long-term Government bonds	Rate of personal savings
1952	+14	+4	+1
1953	+9	+10	0
1954	−51	−13	−8
1955	+84	+11	−12
1956	+52	+8	+12
1957	+23	+13	−6
1958	−44	−12	−6

In short, the record of the past 7 years does not support the contention that individuals save more of their income when interest rates are high. The rate of savings has varied somewhat from year to year, and the available evidence suggests that when interest rates are increased individuals are as likely to save a smaller percentage of their incomes as a larger percentage.

ARE THE AMERICAN PEOPLE CARRYING THE LARGEST FEDERAL DEBT IN HISTORY?

One of our questions is, of course, whether the Federal debt has mounted to the point that the American people simply cannot carry a larger debt without some encouragement in the form of greatly increased interest payments.

The fact is that in 1957 and 1958 on a per capita basis the gross public debt, including securities guaranteed by the Federal Government, was the lowest of any years since 1944. At the end of 1958 the per capita debt was $1,588; in 1954 it was $1,671; in 1952 it was $1,650; and in 1948 it was $1,721.

So we cannot say that increased interest rates are justified by the fact that the American people are now carrying a greater Federal debt than before. Considering the population increase, they are carrying a smaller Federal debt than at any time in the years 1945 through 1952 when interest rates were relatively low.

I will insert here table 3 which shows the per capita debt at the end of each fiscal year from 1939 to 1958:

HAS THE DEMAND FOR PRIVATE SAVINGS INCREASED?

Now, of course, to appraise the impact on savings of increases in the Federal debt, we cannot stop with looking at the Federal debt alone. We must also consider what the total demand for investment funds in the United States has been. As we know, there have been several recent years, prior to 1958, when business investment in new plants and equipment was at record levels. The State and local governments have been issuing large amounts of bonds to finance public improvements. Furthermore, there has been an increased demand from abroad for investment funds which has been met in part by private investors in the United States and in part by Federal agencies. Demand for investment funds from all these sources makes up the picture of the total demand made on savings in United States and upon the commercial banks for newly created money, to the extent that savings do not meet the demand. Financing a Federal deficit makes a demand on savings in competition with business demands for investment funds. And net foreign investment—that is, the amount of foreign loans or investments made in any year in excess of repayments from abroad—is money which must be raised in competition with domestic business, and in competition with the fund-raising efforts of the Federal, State, and local governments.

On the other hand, a surplus in the Federal budget makes funds available for investment elsewhere. And so, too, does a net surplus in the budgets of all the State and local governments taken together.

So to find the net demand for savings in any 1 year we might proceed as follows:

First. We take the gross private domestic investment. This includes the total amount of money spent by business and agriculture for productive plant and equipment. It includes all private construction, including residential construction, and it includes changes in business inventories. It is called "gross" private investment because it is the total amount of money invested in the domestic economy without respect to the question of how much the plant and equipment previously in place may have depreciated.

Second. We add to the gross private domestic investment the net amount of U.S. funds invested abroad. Or, if the investment funds returned from foreign countries are greater than the new foreign investments, we subtract the difference.

Finally, we add the total net government deficit in the year, taking account of the combined spending and the combined incomes of the Federal, State, and local governments. Or, if all governments combined have a surplus, we subtract the amount of the surplus.

Source: Computed from data in Economic Report of the President, 1959, pp. 139, 157.

The result gives us the total demand for private savings in the United States within the particular year, though, of course, to the extent that this demand is not met by savings it is met by increases in bank-created money.

I would like now to invite the Members' attention to table 4, which sets out the total demand for private savings, computed in the manner I have just discussed, for the years 1951 through 1958. Here we may see that the demand for private savings was $50.5 billion in 1951, that it increased almost steadily—except for the recession year 1954—until it reached a total of $67.1 billion in the calendar year 1957. Last year, with the slump in business, the figure dropped back to $63.6 billion; yet this was considerably more than had gone into investment in any year prior to 1957.

The question is, however, have these increases in the demand for investment funds been any larger than the increases in our economy? Considering the increased output of our economy available for both consumption and investment, have the demands for investment funds increased disproportionately? Actually, no.

In fact, the percentage of our gross national product which has gone into investment, and into financing Government deficits, has been remarkably stable throughout these years. Last year, during the recession, the total demand for private savings dropped to 14.5 percent of the gross national product, but in the previous 7 years the total demand for private savings had ranged from 15.1 percent to 15.4 percent. Furthermore, the largest percentages of the gross national product going into investment and financing Government deficits were in the years 1951 and 1952, when interest rates were lowest.

In other words, these data suggest that all of the talk of recent years about raising interest rates to stimulate savings which were said to be needed to meet an unprecedented investment boom has been nonsense. Financing the unprecedented investment boom, plus the deficits of Federal, State, and local governments, plus investments abroad, has required no greater percentage of our gross national product than in 1951 or 1952, but actually a slightly less percentage.

And by the same token, all of the talk we have heard about squeezing credit and raising interest rates to prevent a runaway investment boom has also been nonsense. In none of the recent years has the runaway investment boom taken quite as high a proportion of our gross national product as did the investment boom of 1951 and 1952. Furthermore, the increases in the general price level accompanying the investment boom of 1951 and 1952 were a great deal less than the price increases which have accompanied the tight-money and high-interest policies imposed for the stated purposes of trying to dampen the investment booms of the more recent years.

Where then is the evidence that this country was suffering from a runaway investment boom in 1956 and 1957? It was this alleged boom that the Federal Reserve authorities said had to be dampened. It was this alleged boom that these people have cited to justify the big credit squeeze of those years.

Where also is the evidence that investment in those years was outrunning savings and was thus causing the banks to create money? Such evidence is hard to find. It is much easier to find evidence that what actually happened is this—as the money managers raised interest rates to higher and higher levels, business firms more and more shifted their long-term credit needs away from the bond market, temporarily, and to the commercial banks, because they did not wish to contract for long-term financing while bond rates were at fantastically high levels. In short, it was the high interest rates that were causing the greatly increased demand for bank credit, which is, of course, met by increases in the money supply. In other words, there are good grounds for thinking that the high interest rates which the money managers imposed not only failed to stimulate savings, but they caused the demand for bank-created money, which was what the money managers claimed they were trying to check.

HOW BIG IS THE NEW DEMAND FOR BANK LOANS?

Let us consider next whether the money managers' new tight money policy is justified by any increasing demand for bank loans.

The usual reasons which the money managers give for tightening money is, of course, that demand for borrowed money is so greatly in excess of savings that the commercial banks are called upon to create great quantities of new money to meet the demand. And too great an increase in the money supply is, they say, inflationary.

Any and all increases in the money supply are not, of course, argued to be inflationary. On the contrary the whole justification for the fractional reserve system on which the commercial banks operate is to have an elastic money supply, permitting expansions to meet increased needs for commercial credit.

Where then is the great resurgence of demand for borrowed funds, and for bank loans particularly, which justifies the money managers putting on another credit squeeze at this time and raising short-term money rates from 2½ to 3 percent?

The Wall Street Journal on Monday, March 23, stated it this way:

> A special feature of the business recovery of the past 11 months has been its slight influence on demands for borrowed money and on the interest rates charged for such borrowings. Furthermore, this special condition, as of now, seems likely to last for a good many months.

Then in support of this observation, this report continued:

> In New York City commercial and industrial loans show no stronger trends than during the 1957–58 recession of a year ago.

And I might add that up until April 1 demand for commercial and industrial loans all over the country was only imperceptibly larger than at the depth of the recession last year. On April 1 industrial and commercial loans of member banks that report weekly to the Federal Reserve were $30.6 billion, as compared to $30.4 billion on April 2 of last year. Furthermore, these loans had declined by $208 million since the beginning of the year.

Certainly then the return to a policy of tight money and high interest at this time becomes more and more puzzling. The country is still in a recession with 1 out of every 16 people looking for a job and unable to find a job. The demand for bank loans—and in fact for all credit—continues almost at the level of the worst period of the recession. Yet credit is tightened and interest rates are raised.

HOW MUCH WILL THE NEW HIGH INTEREST RATES COST TAXPAYERS?

We come now to a matter which affects the pocketbook of every family. The interest-bearing Federal debt which was outstanding at the end of February would have cost $7.9 billion each year in interest charges, even if the interest rates had not been raised since that time, and even if we were not faced by an additional debt by the end of the year. This interest cost of $7.9 billion is greater than the entire Federal budget of 1938. It is no small item.

Let us consider how the average interest rate on the Federal debt has been increased and what this means in actual costs of carrying the debt. What is the real interest rate?

When word gets around that the Treasury is issuing long-term bonds at 3½ or 4 percent, many people assume that this is the rate on the whole Federal debt. Actually, however, the rate on the whole debt is much lower for two reasons. First, a large part of the debt outstanding at any one time is in very short-term securities, such as the 91-day Treasury bills. And, of course, short-term securities can be sold in the market at much lower rates than would be required to sell long-term securities. For example, of all the interest-bearing debt outstanding at the end of last year, about 11 percent was in Treasury bills, mostly issued with a 3-month maturity date. Another 13 percent of the debt was in certificates which represent borrowings of 1 year or less.

A second reason why the average interest rate on all of the Federal debt is lower than private bond rates—or has been in recent years—is, of course, that some of the securities which were issued at more reasonable rates are still outstanding. Some of the older debt issued at these lower rates is almost constantly coming due and being refunded at higher rates. When market rates are being pushed up there is always some lag before the rates which the Treasury actually pays catch up.

Since 1942, the computed average interest rate on all of the interest-bearing debt has ranged from a low of 1.929 percent in 1944 to a high of 2.730 percent in 1957. Last year, 1958, the average was 2.638 percent. These figures are all from the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and I will insert in the RECORD at a later point a table showing these rates for each year since 1942.

Here then are some comparisons on what increasing interest rates have cost in dollars and what this policy is likely to cost in the years ahead.

The Federal Government is now faced with a debt of at least $285 billion. At the end of February this year, the average interest rate on the interest-bearing debt then outstanding was 2.781 percent. At the high interest already achieved by February—before the Federal Reserve boosted them again in March—a Federal debt of $285 billion would have cost the taxpayers $7.9 billion a year in interest charges. This was $700 million more each year than it would have cost to carry the same debt if interest rates had been left where they were only last August. At that time the average rate on the whole debt was 2.534 percent.

It is $1.3 billion more each year than it would have cost to carry a debt of the same size if interest rates had been left at their 1952 levels. It is about five times the amount of money provided in the area redevelopment bill which the President vetoed last year because the administration thought the country could not afford the money to make loans to the State and local governments for needed local facilities.

It is $2.4 billion more each year than it would have cost to carry the same debt of $285 billion if interest rates had been left at their 1946 levels. This would build 48 one-million-dollar schools in each of the 50 States each year or a total of 2,800 such schools each year.

Yet these comparisons do not take account of the increased costs yet to be reflected by the latest boost made in March. We can, however, make some reasonable estimates of these new costs, on the basis of the increased rate which has already been reflected in short-term Treasury bills.

The yield on 91-day Treasury bills changes much more quickly than long-term rates. In fact, the rate on these bills may show, for a quite brief period, a rise or fall which is never reflected in long-term bond rates. But over the long run all interest rates—short-term and long-term—tend to rise or fall proportionately.

The average rate at which new 91-day Treasury bills were issued in 1958 was 1.839 percent. If we assume that in the future the bill rate will average 3 percent in line with the 3.062 percent reached on March 14 and in line with the Federal Reserve 3 percent discount rate, this will mean a bill rate 63 percent higher than the average for 1958.

And ultimately we can expect that the average interest rate on the Federal debt will rise 63 percent. In other words, the average rate on the whole debt in 1958, which was 2.638 percent, will go up to 4.300 percent. This will mean that a Federal debt of $285 billion will then cost the taxpayers $12.3 billion each year, instead of the $7.5 billion this debt would have cost at the 1958 rates, and the $6.6 billion it would have cost at the 1952 rates. In other words, we are presently confronted with the prospect of paying almost twice as much to carry the Federal debt as we would have paid to carry the same debt if interest rates had been left at their 1952 levels.

Yet as I have already pointed out, debt per capita is less than it was in 1952 and the total demand for investment funds from all sources is a smaller percentage of the national income than it was in 1952.

Why? We all ought to ask ourselves this question. Does this show good management of our Government's affairs? Or does it show very bad management of the interests of the vast majority of the people.

At this point I will insert table 5 which shows the amount of the interest-bearing Federal debt outstanding at the end of each year since 1942, the computed average interest rate on this debt, and the computed annual interest cost on this debt:

HAS THE AVERAGE MATURITY OF THE FEDERAL DEBT BEEN INCREASED?

Let us consider briefly now one other question which bears on the justification, or the lack of justification, for the increases in the average interest rate on all of the Federal debt which has been made in recent years.

At various times when the Treasury has issued bonds at above-market rates, there have been official announcements that the Treasury was reorganizing the debt to put more of it on a long-term basis, and thus relieved what was said to be the problem of going constantly to the money market for short-term borrowings. Since interest rates on long-term securities are inevitably higher than on short-term securities, then obviously there would be some justification for increases in the average rate on the whole debt if the average maturity of the debt had been increased.

But the fact is that the average maturity of the debt has been shortened, not lengthened.

Although the average interest rate on the debt has gone up almost steadily since 1951, the year of the Treasury-Federal Reserve accord, but in no year since has the average term of the outstanding marketable debt been as long as in that year. In only one year of this administration has the average maturity been as long as it was in 1952. That was in 1955, when the average was pushed up to 5 years and 10 months. In 1952, the average was 5 years and 8 months. Last year, 1958, it was 5 years and 3 months.

So I think we may say that there is nothing in the length of the debt which justifies any increase in interest rates.

At this point I will insert table 6, which shows the average term of the marketable interest-bearing debt outstanding at the end of each fiscal year, beginning with 1951:

HOW WILL THE COST OF HIGH INTEREST PROLONG THE FEDERAL DEBT?

The time will soon come when we will have no choice but to make a serious effort to reduce the Federal debt. Most of this debt is, of course, a carryover from the monumental expenses of World War II. In the years immediately following the war some considerable progress was being made toward reducing the debt. But in more recent years this matter has been neglected.

At the end of 1945 the gross Federal debt plus securities guaranteed by the Federal Government came to $278.7 billion. This was reduced by $22 billion in the 5 years following, or to $256.7 billion at the end of 1950. With the Korean expenses, however, the debt went up to $267.4 billion by the end of 1952, only about $11 billion less than at the end of World War II. Since that time it has increased to a new high of $285 billion as of the end of last month.

Recently several Members of this body have earnestly proposed that some fixed schedule for paying off the Federal debt be adopted. My colleagues the gentlemen from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. IKARD], particularly, have been urging such a proposal. And in this have been doing a wonderful public service.

For example, on March 4 the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT] put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a proposed schedule for liquidating the Federal debt completely within a hundred years. Beginning with a debt of $280 billion, this schedule proposed a reduction in the principal of the debt of 1 percent, or $2.8 billion, in the first year, and a reduction of $2.8 billion in each year thereafter until the whole debt is paid off—100 years from now.

This scheduling calls for an interest rate on the outstanding amount of 3½ percent which, according to the figures I have already cited, would mean a quite substantial increase in the average rate paid on the debt last year, and a quite substantial increase from the rate being paid even now. It seems to me, therefore, that we should be entertaining the idea of an interest rate of 2½ percent, or perhaps 2 percent, but not 3½ percent. In other words, we should divert the money managers from their folly in raising interest rates higher and higher.

As is indicated by table 5, which I have discussed, the computed average rate on all of the interest-bearing debt outstanding was less than 2½ percent in each of the years 1942 through 1955. In the years 1943 through 1946, it was less than 2 percent. In the notorious tight-money year of 1957, it rose to 2.730 percent; and last year, 1958, it was 2.638 percent. The average for the tight-money years of 1953 through last year was less than 2½ percent, so we might consider 2½ percent as the maximum.

On the other hand, if our money managers could be persuaded to get interest rates down to the World War II level, the average rate would be less than 2 percent. In the war years 1943 through 1946, the average rate on all of the Federal debt was less than 2 percent, or about 1.9 percent.

To many people such differences in interest rates as I have been discussing seem rather small matters. But these do not seem small matters to the big moneylenders, because these people well know that such differences mean astronomical differences in the actual amounts of money which they receive and which the taxpayers will have to pay.

Let us consider for a moment what these differences actually will mean to the taxpayers over the period it will take to pay off the present debt. One way to do this is to take the schedule which has been proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT] for paying off the debt over the next 100 years, and compare what the cost to the taxpayers will be if we substitute interest rates more nearly in line with those which the country has recently had to pay, rather than a 3½ percent rate used in the proposed schedule.

Consequently, I have taken the same schedule that was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 4, 1959, by Congressman WRIGHT, used his same rate of repayment on the principal—$2.8 billion a year—but computed the interest charge on the unpaid balance at 2 percent, first, and second, at 2½ percent to find how the total interest costs at these rates would compare with a cost to the taxpayers at a rate of 3½ percent.

Here are the results.

In this proposed schedule for paying off a debt of $280 billion over the next 100 years with an interest rate of 3½ percent, the interest charges in the first 10 years alone would come to $94 billion. At an interest rate of 2½ percent, however, the interest charges in the first 10 years would amount to $69 billion; and at an interest rate of 2 percent—which was the average rate paid between 1942 and 1948—the interest charge in the first 10 years would come to $53 billion.

Over the entire 100 years the interest costs would compare as follows: At 2 percent the total interest charges which would be paid while a debt of $280 billion was being reduced to zero would come to $283 billion. In other words, even at 2 percent, we would pay more in interest charges than we would pay on the debt itself. At 2½ percent the total interest charges would come to $354 billion; and at 3½ percent the total interest charges would come to $495 billion.

At this point I will insert table 7 which presents a schedule for the reduction of a debt of $280 billion over the next 100 years with annual payments on principal of $2.8 billion, and showing the annual interest charges at the three alternative rates of interest:

A DEBT WHICH WOULD TAKE 100 YEARS TO PAY OFF AT 3½ PERCENT INTEREST COULD BE PAID OFF IN 49 YEARS AT 2½ PERCENT INTEREST

Let us consider now how much sooner the Federal debt could be liquidated if we paid more reasonable interest charges on the debt.

Let us take the same initial payment for both interest and principal which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT] has proposed but compute the interest charges at 2½ percent instead of 3 percent, and apply the rest of the payment on reduction of the principal. The initial payments which have been proposed are $2.8 billion on principal and $9.8 billion in interest, or a total of $12.6 billion in the first year. At an average 2½ percent interest charge, the interest cost would be $7 billion and the remainder of the payment which is $5.6 billion could go to retire the principal. Then, if we continued to pay $5.6 billion each year thereafter, the total cost to the Government of both interest and principal would in no year exceed the total cost which would be made according to the schedule calling for a 3½ percent interest rate. On the contrary, in only the first year would the total payment for both interest and principal be the same as on the 3 percent schedule, and every year thereafter the total payment on both principal and interest would be progressively less.

Yet at an interest rate of 2½ percent, the whole debt would be paid off in 49 years instead of 100 years; and the total interest cost would be $178 billion instead of $495 billion. At this point I will insert table 8, showing the computations for each year at an interest rate of 2½ percent for carrying charges, and also table 9, showing the computations at a carrying charge of 2 percent.

If the Federal debt of $280 billion were liquidated on the same basis but with a carrying charge of 2 percent, instead of 3½ percent, it would take only 39 years to pay off the entire debt instead of 100 years. And the total interest costs would be $112 billion instead of $495 billion.

EDGAR A. BROWN

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RIVERS] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks, I include a statement by State Senator Edgar A. Brown before a subcommittee of the U.S. House Judiciary Committee on proposed civil rights legislation, Tuesday, April 14, 1959, Washington, D.C.

The statement follows:

I am Edgar A. Brown of Barnwell, S.C. I am president pro tempore of the State Senate of South Carolina, and National Democratic Committeeman from South Carolina.

For 45 years, I have served continuously as an official of the Democratic Party, and for 39 years I have served continuously in the Legislature of South Carolina.

As a matter of fact, due to the generosity of the people of my home county of Barnwell, I have been privileged to serve continuously longer in public affairs in the last half century than any other man in South Carolina.

Speaking from this background of intimate knowledge, I would declare without qualification that no further Federal civil rights legislation is necessary for freedom, justice, peace, and happiness among all the people of South Carolina.

I go even farther: I declare that those forces outside of the South who advocate such legislation are doing a terrible disservice to the well-being of all races and all people in South Carolina when they deliberately agitate such issues.

For reasons of year-to-year political expediency, these forces outside the South are threatening, by every new move they make, to disrupt the peace and harmony of the most deep-rooted, patriotic, God-fearing section of this great Nation.

Both national political parties are equally guilty of shortsighted political judgment. This is asserted by me with great shame for the Democratic Party after 45 years of unswerving and loyal devotion.

If both the national Democratic and Republican Parties had requested Nikita Khrushchev in Moscow to draw up a program of baseless propaganda to utterly misrepresent and persecute the South, Khrushchev himself could not have done a more thoroughly reprehensible job than have the policymakers of our own American political parties. I say this with apologies to no one.

I tell my fellow Democrats here and now that those of us who have held the South together politically, believing that the Democratic Party means more to the welfare of the people of the Nation—that stalwart regular Democrats, as I claim to be, cannot be expected in the future to continue to keep our majority together if you pursue further the vicious affronts against our people. You insult white and Negroes alike when you engage in such false and useless methods.

Being a lifelong Democrat, I express appreciation to the Republicans among you for letting your party miss the boat politically when you decided to send paratroopers to Little Rock, and otherwise vented your political disdain of the responsible people of the South.

Often in politics we talk about the good people among our own constituents. Sometimes we try to pretend in a campaign that all people are good people. Actually, however, we know that in every section of the Nation there are people of real substance who have made this the greatest Nation in the history of the world. These people of substance are not in any particular class, race, or party. There are people of substance in all classes, races, and parties.

Now, I charge that both national parties have completely disregarded the people of substance in the South, including the responsible Negro people. We have a large number of worthy and highly respected citizens among the Negro race in the South, citizens who serve the State increasingly well, and who serve their own race faithfully and well.

What have you on this committee heard from responsible Negro citizens in South Carolina, or any other Southern State, about civil rights?

If you have heard anything at all from them, I am confident that you have been told that our Negro population now enjoys all the civil rights afforded to all free Americans.

Oh, yes, we have insisted upon maintenance of segregated public schools in South Carolina and, make no mistake about it, we will continue to insist upon segregated education in whatever form it must take, but the people of South Carolina, both white and Negro, have received and will continue to receive their full civil rights under the true meaning of the U.S. Constitution.

These guarantees are fulfilled without discrimination as to race. No need exists for a special agency or Federal supervision.

Constant agitation of the question, as though need did exist, serves as a dangerous and unwarranted irritant. Carried to an extreme, outside pressure will further seriously interfere with race relations that an official branch of State government (the Gresette committee on education) has just described as being most harmonious.

The term civil rights means the constitutional guarantees such as freedom of expression and assembly, fair trial, equal justice and other rights of free citizens—ownership of property, freedom to do business and so on.

The voting rights of qualified Negro citizens are not impaired in South Carolina. Nor is the right of Negroes to serve on juries. An increasing number of colored citizens have become eligible for voting and jury service, as anyone familiar with South Carolina polls or courtrooms can verify. South Carolinians of all races resent groundless suspicion cast on them by setting up Federal police authority in the name of a civil rights commission. They rightly regard it as an invasion of States rights which is also guaranteed by the Constitution.

We have adequate and proper civil rights laws within the State. State laws, with respect to separation of the races in some long established and generally accepted phases of activity, do not infringe on civil rights. These laws are designed to protect civil rights of both races, and to maintain the peace. On the other hand deviously conceived pretenses of so-called rights threaten our peace and happiness among all races.

This I say with a sense of deep responsibility and sincerity: leave South Carolina's affairs to South Carolinians, or the consequences are apt to be disastrous from several viewpoints, not the least of which might be the smashing of the solid political South.

The civil right of parents to have a voice in the schooling of their children does not curtail constitutional civil rights as spelled out in the Bill of Rights or elsewhere in the U.S. Constitution. Negro citizens have identical rights of exclusion in these same areas.

Without these State and local protective laws and customs, based on many decades of friendly and satisfactory actual experience, the civil rights and indeed the lives of citizens of both races may be endangered.

Without going into the details of each of the hodgepodge of bills before your committee, I declare that no further Federal legislation will serve any worthwhile purpose on race relations in the South. If you want to spend some time on bad race relations, we strongly recommend that you go into other parts of the Nation where race riots and incidents are almost every day news occurrences. We suggest that you look into teenage terrorism, and adult terrorism, among the melting pots of such large cities as New York, Philadelphia, Detroit, and Chicago. You find none of this mob racial unrest in South Carolina.

I like to point with pride to the fact that, after all of the sound and fury stirred up by propagandists from outside, the real proof of the solid friendship among the races in the South has been fully proven by the fact that we continue to live on the best of terms with our Negro population enjoying full measures of progress and prosperity. We have more Negro teachers, doctors, businessmen, home and automobile owners, and otherwise successful Negro citizens per square mile in South Carolina than will be found in any other State of the Nation outside of the South.

Since most of the racial hullabaloo has originated and has been tragically exploited by irresponsible political opportunists outside of the South, I have placed heavy emphasis upon the misguided political aspects, because that is where it belongs.

Concluding, I wish to point out respectfully that my 45 years of continuous political service and experience dates back to the days of men like Woodrow Wilson, William Jennings Bryan, Champ Clark, and many other notable figures. Never during all of the time of those strong men in the Democratic Party was there any evidence of any desire, just for political purposes, to single out any section of the Nation for such political skulduggery.

And I charge that when any of you from the rest of the country deliberately agitate such issues for political gain, you are being both unwise and unpatriotic. You are doing the Negro and other racial minorities, all of whom live in peaceful and happy circumstances in the South, an enormous injustice. You are striking at the very roots of individual freedom—the kind of freedom which has brought together from all over the world so many citizens of different races and nationalities into a Nation which stands as a symbol of individual freedom for the rest of the world—a world which is suffering in so many areas from so many shortcomings and hatreds which do not now exist in this country.

I urge you on this committee and all Members of Congress to consider well the present happy and harmonious life of all Southern people before you make any more false moves under the pressure of political opportunists, misguided do-gooders or others who either do not care about the South, or who would deliberately destroy the well-being of our people, for some selfish reason which has nothing to do with the real peace and progress of the Negro race in the South.

L. MARION GRESSETTE, ROBERT E. McNAIR, AND THOMAS H. POPE

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RIVERS] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, as a part of my remarks, I include the statements of L. Marion Gressette and Robert E. McNair, chairmen of the Judiciary Committees of South Carolina State House of Representatives, respectively, and Thomas H. Pope, chairman of the South Carolina State Democratic executive committee.

The statements follow:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we appear here primarily as citizens of the United States, for the preservation of the Republic is a cause that should be uppermost in the minds of all of us. And as advocates of the preservation of the rights and powers of the States, we believe we serve that cause above all others.

This Nation was founded upon a covenant among 13 sovereign States which banded themselves together to provide for the common defense and to advance the common welfare. To do this, they conferred certain powers upon the central government, mainly to present a united front against the enemy from without and regulate such internal matters as interstate commerce.

But they specifically reserved unto themselves all other powers. They took definite steps to guard against the development of a despotic Federal Government. In clear and unmistakable language, they said that all powers not delegated to the Federal Government were reserved to the States and ultimately to the people. The constitution of our State contains a similar clause, saying, in so many words, that the people have the power at any time to change the form of their government.

And as lifelong residents of the State of South Carolina and as present and former members of its general assembly, we know they can do it, for we have seen it done many times. The people of South Carolina are a proud people and they take their government seriously. They have amended their constitution many times.

Furthermore, no citizen of South Carolina is denied the ballot by reason of race, color, religion, or national origin. Some years ago, our State, by action of the general assembly and by overwhelming vote of the people removed from the constitution the so-called poll tax requirement for voting. Anyone who meets the reasonable minimum requirements as set forth in the constitution is allowed to vote—and we are proud to say that most of our citizens vote their consciences rather than the dictates of some pressure group.

It is claimed by the advocates of the so-called civil rights legislation that their main purpose is to insure to all people the right to vote. Our State already has insured that right, and it is protecting it in a most zealous manner. So is every other State of the Union. So wherein lies the need for the bills under consideration here today?

The obvious answer is that they are not needed.

Our State has on its statute books ample laws for the protection of the rights of all of its people. Anyone who intimidates, threatens or interferes with the rights of another is subject to severe penalties.

Our State has all but outlawed clandestine organizations formed for the purpose of intimidating others or committing violence against anyone. And there are in our penitentiary persons who have been convicted by South Carolina juries in State courts of violating these statutes. It is our purpose to prevent extremism and violence of all sorts, from whatever motive they may stem.

And the peace and good order among our people, the absence of violent agitation and disturbance is evidence enough that it is working.

Let's face the bald facts about the proposed legislation. Its sole purpose is to advance the political careers of those who have become subservient to a coalition of minorities by seeking to further the cause of integration of the races. It is that, and nothing more.

We in South Carolina, and in other States similarly situated, are doing all in our power to advance the best interests of both races. And we know from generations of practical experience that, now and in the foreseeable future, that cause can best be served on a basis of equal opportunity provided within a framework of segregation. We do not have interracial gang wars in our State, and we do not intend to have them. We are taking positive steps to prevent them by giving all of our people something better than an incentive for social strife in the pursuit of a false goal.

We are submitting as part of our testimony two documents taken from the official archives of the government of our State.

The first of these is the Sixth Interim Report of the South Carolina's Special School Committee. This group was created in 1951 to study the possible results of the decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court in the public education cases and to recommend courses of action to meet the problems that were sure to arise.

Even a cursory reading of this report should reveal that it is the firm purpose of our State to avoid arousing passions and to allay the fears and racial hatreds which have been caused by actions of the Federal courts and the Congress of the United States. This report shows also that public education has continued to make progress in South Carolina, even while it has been damaged by racial feuds in other areas, most especially in those which are loudest in their demands that the South change its pattern of living.

The second document we offer is a joint resolution unanimously adopted by the General Assembly of South Carolina on March 15, 1956.

That resolution asserts the intention of the State of South Carolina to "exercise all powers reserved to it to protect its sovereignty and the rights of its people." More than 3 years have passed since that resolution was adopted, but the temper of our people has not changed.

Mark you well, gentlemen, that statement did not originate in 1956, nor is it merely an idea grabbed from abstract thinking in 1959. It goes back to the very beginning of the Republic itself. It is a restatement of the principles enunciated by the men who freed this country from the tyranny of the British Crown, the men who shed their blood and gave of their personal property from 1776 onward.

More to the point, it is a restatement of the fundamentals of the Constitution of the United States as written and adoped by the Thirteen Original States, among whom our State is proud to this day to have been a leader. The rights and powers of the States to order as they see fit their own internal affairs is the keystone of the foundation of these United States. Destroy that, and you invite anarchy or, even worse, the absolute tyranny of the demagog who happens to be able to bind together the votes of enough self-seeking minorities to win power.

In opposing this legislation, we of the South are not fighting a sectional battle; we espouse the cause of national freedom. The measures under consideration may be aimed at us today, but they will apply to all of the 50 States of the Union.

The enabling legislation admitting the last two States to the Union specifically provided that they shall have the power to regulate their schools without Federal intervention. The laws admitting many other States after the Union was formed contain similar provisions. We, as one of the Thirteen Original States, ask no more than that.

It boils down to this:

This legislation is not sectional in its scope, whatever its intent may be. It will affect every one of the 50 States, and may lead to their destruction. And the citizens of the States whose Representatives in the Congress, for purely selfish political reasons, are clamoring for its passage will live to see it rise up and haunt them as a real and malevolent Banquo's ghost.

DANIEL R. McLEOD

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RIVERS] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks, I include a statement of Daniel R. McLeod, attorney general of South Carolina, before Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights before House Judiciary Committee, April 1959.

The statement follows:

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am grateful for the opportunity of appearing before this distinguished committee. I concur wholeheartedly in what has been said by my colleagues from the State of South Carolina and, in an attempt to avoid repetition, I shall direct my remarks at the specific details of certain bills which are now before you.

OBSTRUCTION OF ORDERS REQUIRING INTEGRATION

S. 955 and H.R. 4457, title I, create an additional Federal offense by amending the present Federal statute relating to the obstruction of justice. This is clearly a pointed attempt to oppress a section of our Nation where school problems are rendered more difficult by recent decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court with additional retaliatory and vindictive measures. Under the present law there are ample and adequate methods of preventing interference with orders of the U.S. courts. This is apparent from a comparison of the wording of the present statute with that submitted to the Congress. The proposed bill reads, as follows:

"Whoever corruptly, or by threats of force, or by any threatening letter or communication, willfully prevents, obstructs, impedes, or interferes with or willfully endeavors to prevent, obstruct, impede, or interfere with the due exercise of rights or the performance of duties under any order, judgment, or decree of a court of the United States which (1) directs that any person or class of persons shall be admitted to any school, or (2) directs that any person or class of persons shall not be denied admission to any school because of race or color, or (3) approves any plan of any State or local agency the effect of which is or will be to permit any person or class of persons to be admitted to any school, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both."

Compare the foregoing with Title 18 USC, paragraph 1503:

"Whoever corruptly, or by threats or force, or by any threatening letter or communication, influences, obstructs, or impedes, or endeavors to influence, obstruct or impede, the due administration of justice, shall be fined not more than $5,000.00 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both."

As I shall subsequently refer to, it is to be noted that although the statutes relating to the obstruction of justice have, in the most part, been upon the statute books for many years, none of them carry the proviso that injunctive relief may be sought against the actions prohibited by the statute, yet in the bill under consideration by you, specific provision is made for injunctive relief with the proviso that such injunctive relief shall not be conditioned upon the ground that the conduct complained of is a crime.

Our present statutes specifically relate to assault on process service, resistance to an extradition agent, influencing or injuring jurors or witnesses, theft or alteration of court records, and picketing and parading before courthouse.

In none of these is the injunctive feature provided yet, in a measure aimed at a sphere where Federal interference has already produced nothing but discord, injunctive relief, contrary to a general rule of law, is specifically provided.

The present existing law has by a Federal court been declared to be "all embracing and designed to meet any corrupt conduct in an endeavor to obstruct or interfere with due administration of justice."

The present statutory law is, therefore, clearly comprehensive and adequate enough to provide for the enforcement and carrying out of the orders of the Federal court. The proposed legislation is not only needless but is pointedly aimed at a field in which there is already too much legislation and too much interference.

This bill makes it a Federal offense to obstruct or impede any order of a Federal court which directs the admission of a child to school, directs that a child shall not be denied admission to a school, or approves a plan by which a child is to be admitted to school. If such an order is handed down by a Federal court, the people of my State and of other States will be in peril of Federal prosecution if they should meet together to discuss action to be taken by them after such an order is passed or if they indulge in public meetings or make radio or television broadcasts or if they adopt plans of their own to meet the contingency with which they are faced, or if they place advertisements in the newspapers calling for concerted action to deal with the situation with which they are faced.

Their actions in such event could be construed by a Federal court in the language of Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 52; 86 L. ed. 192, to "create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evil."

The proposed bill is contrary to a sense of fair play and sound reason in that it relates only to court orders admitting persons to schools. It nowhere provides that orders of court denying a child admission to school shall be obstructed or impeded. If a child is admitted to school in a manner that I consider improper, my protest against such admission is made at the risk of Federal prosecution; but if, for some reason, a child is denied admission to school, those who object to such denial are not subjected to Federal prosecution no matter how vociferously or in what manner they object to such an order of denial.

The bill operates also upon the wrongful assumption that orders must be passed admitting children to school. The President's message to the Congress uses such phrases as "desegregation programs" and "desegregate." Other bills before the committee refer to the school cases handed down since 1954 by the Supreme Court as "desegregation cases" and "antisegregation cases." The truth of the matter is that there has been no desegregation case nor has there been any integration case. After the case of Briggs v. Elliott, which arose in my State, was handed down, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the lower court for implementation. The late John J. Parker, Chief Judge of the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, concisely stated the import of that decision:

"It is important that we point out exactly what the Supreme Court has decided and what it has not decided in this case. It has not decided that the Federal courts are to take over or regulate the public schools of the States. It has not decided that the States must mix persons of different races in the schools or must require them to attend schools or must deprive them of the right of choosing the schools they attend. What it has decided, and all that it has decided, is that a State may not deny to any person on account of race the right to attend any school that it maintains. This, under the decision of the Supreme Court, the State may not do directly or indirectly; but if the schools which it maintains are open to children of all races, no violation of the Constitution is involved even though the children of different races voluntarily attend different schools as they attend different churches. Nothing in the Constitution or in the decision of the Supreme Court takes away from the people freedom to choose the schools they attend. The Constitution, in other words, does not require integration. It merely forbids discrimination. It does not forbid such segregation as occurs as the result of voluntary action. It merely forbids the use of governmental power to enforce segregation. The 14th amendment is a limitation upon the exercise of power by the State or State agencies, not a limitation upon the freedom of individuals."

Compare this with what the Supreme Court said in the case of U.S. v. Reese (92 U.S. 214, 23 L. Ed. 563):

"The 15th amendment relates to the right of the citizens of the United States to vote. It does not confer the right of suffrage upon anyone. It merely invests citizens of the United States with the Constitutional right of exemption from discrimination in the enjoyment of the elective franchise on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude."

The bill contains the further obnoxious feature which provides:

"No injunctive or civil relief against the conduct made criminal by this section shall be denied on the ground that such conduct is a crime."

This is a departure from the well established principle of law that the violation of criminal laws will not as a general rule be enjoined. It is but another demonstration of the tendency throughout the bills which are before the committee to substitute the injunctive process as a means of trial and enforcement of laws. The abuse of the injunctive process, which is evident in these bills, results in evils which strike at the freedom and liberty of the individual. The objection to such power being arbitrarily vested in the courts is well known: it deprives the defendant of his jury trial; it deprives him of the higher degree of proof required in criminal prosecutions; after punishment for violation of the injunction, he may be subjected to punishment under the criminal law for the same acts; it substitutes legislative punishment with a judge's punishment for contempt; it is often no more than a circumvention to overcome the supposed reluctance of jurors to convict; and it may result in the arbitrary exercise of power and in Government by injunction.

It is no mere oratorical figure of speech to say that the abuse of the injunctive power leads to Government by injunction; that Government by injunction can quickly degenerate into Government by edict; and that Government by edict is the handmaiden of dictatorships.

FLIGHT TO AVOID PROSECUTIONS FOR DESTRUCTION OF SCHOOLS OR CHURCHES

The objection raised to this legislation is that it is unneeded, unwarranted and insulting because it is tied up with a mass of legislation relating to school affairs. The implication in this type of legislation is that the States are not able or are unwilling to prosecute or to extradite and prosecute persons accused of these heinous offenses. I have personally assisted in the preparation of a bill which is in the course of passage at the present session of the General Assembly of South Carolina, the effect of which is to make the destruction, attempted destruction, threat of destruction or giving of false information as to destruction of public buildings an offense against the laws of South Carolina. In one case which has arisen in South Carolina and which involved only white persons, there was a vigorous prosecution as the result of a bombing. Except for the unfortunate death of a confessing witness prior to trial, there is little doubt but that a conviction would have been obtained.

The insulting feature of this type of legislation is illustrated by another case which arose in South Carolina and concerned a colored minister who was charged with assault with a deadly weapon, an offense precisely set forth in title 18, U.S.C. 1073, as one which is subject to prosecution in a case of flight. Yet the Department of Justice refused to prosecute in this clear-cut and obvious case and the Governor of New York refused to extradite the person charged for the purpose of subjecting him to prosecution in South Carolina. The President himself in his message states that State authorities have been vigilant in their execution of local laws dealing with crimes involving bombings.

We do not condone violence in South Carolina. We have been and we shall continue to be diligent in the prosecution of offenders against our laws; and if such persons flee across State lines to avoid prosecution, the remedy of extradition is available to return them to stand trial.

INSPECTION OF FEDERAL ELECTION RECORDS

The authority invested in the Attorney General of the United States under the terms of this proposed law and the provisions relating to the preservation of election records are truly shocking. Traditionally and constitutionally elections are State affairs. There is no such thing as a Federal election. There is no Federal election machinery. Every election is a State election and conducted under provisions of State law. The intrusion of Federal authority in purely State affairs is an arrogation of power which is not warranted. It is a dangerous grant of power which an Attorney General could ruthlessly use to interfere in, disrupt, and control an election.

South Carolina has adopted a statute (sec. 23-67.1) which requires that registration to vote must be made upon application therefor on a form prescribed by statute. The statute prescribes that such applications "shall become a part of the permanent records of the (Registration) Board to which it is presented and shall be open to public inspection." We have nothing to hide in our election process and the intrusion of unwarranted Federal meddling cannot help but be viewed with resentment and alarm.

We have, moreover, a simple statutory procedure provided for appeal by anyone denied the right to register. The findings of the board of registration are not conclusive, but a de novo hearing is provided for before a circuit judge. Additionally, the statute provides that if urgency demands it in order to decide the matter in time to permit the appellant to vote if properly qualified, an extra term of the Supreme Court of South Carolina shall be called.

In South Carolina not one single case has been appealed under the provisions of this law. Certainly if the need for Federal surveillance existed, complaints would already have been made.

Federal interference in elections is not only a violation of the traditional rights of the States but is unwarranted and unnecessary.

EXTENSION OF CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION

My views on this Commission were stated before a committee of Congress in 1957 when the original legislation creating the Commission was pending at that session of the Congress. What was said then by me and by others is borne out by subsequent events. The Commission serves no useful purpose and has only generated discord and strife. It has gone to the ludicrous extent of asserting that State election officials cannot resign their offices but must, contrary to the constitutional provisions of the State of Alabama, remain in the status of dual officeholders for the purpose of being subjected to Federal prosecution.

It was prophetically stated in the House Minority Report, following the hearings on the Civil Rights Act of 1957, that this same Commission would not die a natural death at the end of its statutory 2-year period of life. The report stated:

"Anyone who believes that this Commission will cease to exist in 2 years can rightfully be accused of believing in fairies. The 2-year limitation upon the duration of the Commission will mark its first milestone to perpetuity. There will be so many leftwing pressure groups howling for its permanency as now demand its creation. Consideration of political expediency which spawned it will not let it expire. Its hordes of employees and snoopers will perpetuate themselves on the public payroll."

FEDERAL GRANTS FOR SCHOOLS

The President has recommended a program of financial and technical aid to States for the purpose of assisting them in desegregation processes which they do not care to undertake. This is a monumental example of Federal interferences and it is difficult to understand why the administration would, of its own motion and without any request by the States affected, seek to thrust upon the States enormous sums of the taxpayer's money for a purpose not consonant with constitutional principles. One of the most glaring defects in the proposed bill is that which foists on the people of the State grants-in-aid even though a State has made no application therefor, and has indicated that it does not desire to receive any of these Federal funds.

More repulsive are the terms of title VII of H.R. 4457 and title IV of S. 810, which authorizes grants-in-aid for the purpose of "conciliation, persuasion, education, and assistance."

These bills are predicated upon the wrongful assumption that schools must integrate. The opinion of Judge Parker in the Clarendon County case should be required reading for the framers of such legislation as this. They should be reminded again and again what was said in that case and which is more in point than any other Federal decision:

"The Supreme Court has not decided that the Federal courts are to take over or regulate the public schools of the States. It has not decided that the States must mix persons of different races in the schools or must require them to attend schools or must deprive them of the right of choosing the schools they attend. * * * The Constitution does not require integration."

Yet this legislation would permit the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to promulgate a plan providing for the elimination of segregation; if this plan is finally determined by the Secretary to be one which should be imposed upon a State or political subdivision thereof, he is authorized to promulgate the plan and request conformance therewith by the State; and if the plan is not complied with the Attorney General of the United States is then granted authority to compel conformance to the plan by the institution of a suit in the name of the United States.

If this is not striking at the heart of American education, if this is not a direct attempt by the Federal Government to nationalize education, if this is not an unwarranted, unjustified, and unconstitutional step toward abolition of State functions, then it is difficult to imagine a more drastic means of reaching those improper objectives.

The American Legion, which can hardly be considered a sectional or biased or subversive group, at its 1958 annual convention in Chicago visualized the alarming tendency of the Federal Government to encroach into the field of education. At that convention there was adopted a resolution which should also be placed upon the list of required reading for those who would seek to federalize the education of our children by legislation such as is now being considered by this committee. The resolution reads, in part:

"The National Government should avoid interference, control, supervision, or direction in the educational processes, programs, activities, or systems of the respective States or local school districts, either directly or indirectly, by grants-in-aid, appropriations, gifts, or loans for construction of schools, buildings, or facilities, teachers' salaries, general student scholarships, equipment, or other purpose; by curriculum or program control, or by action of any officer, agency, branch, or department of the U.S. Government.

"The American Legion believes that the real vitality of our country lies in decentralization of the powers of government. We have an abiding faith in private enterprise and local initiative. We are convinced of the necessity to allow each community to decide its own educational policies and programs."

Throughout these bills there is specific authority, in many instances, for the Attorney General to bring suits, even upon the mere written complaint of an individual, in the name of the United States. The danger of this is that it strikes at the heart of the American jury system. It is analogous to the unwarranted grant of authority to use injunctive process similarly found throughout these bills. Ordinarily, in the case of contempt, a defendant is entitled to trial by jury which shall conform as near as may be to the practice in other criminal cases, but a vital distinction is made in cases which are brought or prosecuted in the name of, or on behalf of, the United States. A defendant cited for contempt is then not afforded the right to demand a trial by jury.

Section 603 of S. 810 is typical. It provides:

"The Attorney General has authority, upon receipt of a signed complaint to institute for or in the name of the United States a civil action or other proceeding for preventive relief—against any individual or individuals."

The devious means are therefore adopted to permit actions to be brought ex parte and a defendant cited for contempt would not be, as in the usual case, entitled to trial by a jury.

If this legislation is appropriate for enforcing the rights of individuals, it is difficult to see where it is to stop. Why may not Congress with equal show of authority, enact a code of laws for the enforcement and vindication of all rights of life, liberty, and property? There is no justification for iniquitous legislation of this sort which cuts through fundamental liberties and rights and places the United States in the position of being a parent-guardian for anyone who claims his rights have been adversely affected.

The President's proposal for the creation of another FEPC to supervise those who contract with the Government and tell them who they shall and shall not hire again demonstrates disregard for fundamental constitutional rights. The objections made to the FEPC and similar enactments, may as well be directed here. This legislation is abhorrent to our way of life and should not be adopted.

We have made wonderful strides in South Carolina. Our economy is advancing. There is no friction or discord among the races. There are no complaints that anyone's constitutional rights are being, or have been infringed. We desire to pursue our lives peacefully and harmonously and we intend to do so. The adoption of these measures will serve only to be a disrupting and discordant force. They offend the Constitution and the sensibilities of Americans who believe that the people can best engage in the constitutional objective of the pursuit of happiness unhampered by Federal intrusion such as will be brought about by these measures.

HON. ERNEST F. HOLLINGS

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RIVERS] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks, I include a statement of the Honorable Ernest F. Hollings, Governor of South Carolina, before the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights Legislation of the Judiciary Committee of the U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

The statement follows:

The first words of President Eisenhower in his special message on civil rights to the Congress this year were:

"Two principles basic to our system of government are that the rule of law is supreme, and that every individual regardless of his race, religion, or national origin is entitled to the equal protection of the laws."

To his two subjects, of law, on the one hand, and race and religion, on the other, I would first address myself to the latter.

Disraeli stated years ago that "No man will treat with indifference the principle of race. It is the key of history." Racial differences did not originate in nor are they confined to, the South. In Nehru's India there is more caste, race and religious prejudice than anywhere in the world. We see today Great Britain having difficulty trying to integrate the Turk with the Greek on the island of Cyprus. The racial differences of the Israelites and Arabs are threatening the world peace. The Catholic in the Scandanavian countries suffers the same difficulty as the non-Catholic in Spain or in some of our Latin American countries. In this country on the west coast there is the Chinese and Japanese problem. In Southwestern United States there is the Mexican problem. Not long ago a colored school principal at El Paso, Tex., threatened to quit because of the admission to his school of Mexican children. In New York there is the Puerto Rican problem. Last year in Florida a white family was promptly ousted from a colored neighborhood by Negroes who did not desire white neighbors. Billy Graham reports from his travels all over the world that wherever he found a difference in race, he found a problem.

As Governor of South Carolina I represent a State of tolerance and understanding. We have lived in peace and harmony with racial and religious differences for many years. There's no such thing as a restricted hotel in South Carolina. The Man of the Year in my hometown of Charleston recently was a distinguished Jew named Edward Kronsberg. To public office another Jew, Solomon Blatt, has been the unanimous choice for years as the speaker of our house of representatives. Just last week a Greek boy, Jimmy Leventis, was elected without opposition as president of the student body at the University of South Carolina. One of the largest Irish-Catholic societies in South Carolina, the Hibernian, last year had a protestant president, who is a Mason. The point I want to make and emphasize is that you can belong to and be president of any club or society in South Carolina regardless of religious affiliation.

For the Negro, South Carolina is a State of opportunity. There are colored leaders with their own insurance companies, bus lines, outstanding Negro members of the legal and medical professions, and in the teaching profession we have more than 7,200 Negro teachers in the school system of our State. This is more than there are in New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, and Connecticut combined. We don't just speak of opportunity—we give it.

We would like to continue this climate of tolerance and understanding but we cannot if the President and Congress insist on attempting to legislate away racial differences. A distinguished South Carolinian, Bernard Baruch, once stated of prosperity a principle which is true of good race relations. He said· "Prosperity cannot be created by law. Prosperity can be created and can only be created by industry, intelligence and thrift." He warned, however, that prosperity could be destroyed by law, and he spoke of the danger of high taxes and government controls. Good race relations likewise cannot be created by law. Good race relations are created and can only be created by understanding, tolerance and respect. But good race relations can be disturbed by law, and today we have only to look to Little Rock to see its destruction by the so-called law of the land.

In South Carolina, despite some minor setbacks, the races continue to live in peace and harmony with mutual respect. In our schools peace patrols the school corridors; unlike New York, we do not need armed guards. The Negroes of our State feel as all of us feel—that schools are intended for education and not integration or social experimentation. They know that their Governor and general assembly are making a maximum effort to provide for their children the best educational program and the best opportunity to succeed on an individual basis. Let alone we shall continue to provide this opportunity, and as a practical matter, it can only be done in the separate pattern. The only way that children in South Carolina can continue to receive the efficient public school education so necessary for their future success and well-being is in conformity with the social patterns and customs ingrained in our way of life. Legislative attempts to change that pattern will only serve to destroy the well nigh boundless store of goodwill and understanding now existing among all races and beliefs.

The fact that such mutual respect and goodwill does exist in South Carolina is proved conclusively by the fact that there has not been a single complaint made to the Civil Rights Commission from any South Carolinian of any race.

As Governor of all the people of South Carolina, the Negroes as well as the white people, I beg of you not to destroy the friendship, education, culture, and opportunity of both races by enacting the proposed civil rights bills pending in this subcommittee.

I would refer next to the President's statement that the rule of law is supreme in our system of government. Immediately comes to mind the questions "What is the law of the law of the land?" or "What is the supreme law of the land?"

The law of the land, is the same today as it was the day this Nation was founded in 1787—that is the Constitution of the United States. As Mr. Charles Warren, eminent historian of the Supreme Court, stated: "However the Court may interpret the provisions of the Constitution, it is still the Constitution which is the law and not the decision of the Court."

Article VI of the Constitution tells us what the supreme law of the land is:

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

You will note that neither the U.S. Supreme Court nor their decisions is the supreme law of the land. The law student is taught in early days the difference between the law of the land and the law of the case or decision, and too often in this field we do find the law of the case in the segregation decisions being mistakingly referred to as the law of the land.

As Governor I have sworn before God and my people that I will preserve and defend the constitution of South Carolina and the Constitution of the United States. The constitution of our State has been amended so many times that it is difficult to recognize the original—but it has been amended legally. The Constitution of the United States has been amended illegally by the Supreme Court and today we struggle to recognize the original. This noblest document ever penned has been defiled by careless men of less nobility. Our U.S. Constitution, like all great things, finds its greatest strength in its permanency—and when that permanency is casually handled, its greatest strength suffers, and weakens, and perishes.

With clear conscience, and complete conviction, I state to the Congress that we are a government of laws and not of whim—that our deep sense of civic responsibility demands a respect for the law—that if the slightest law is to be respected, then the greatest law is to be hallowed. We recognize that the U.S. Constitution is an epic document—a great gift and hope to mankind—but when the form and letter and spirit of that Constitution is ignored, a gestation period of chaos erupts into a miscarriage of conscience and propriety. We find a U.S. Attorney General pledging economic blackmail against our Southland. We see both political parties competing to hurl the greatest insult and defamation at our door. And worse, we find a badly advised Chief Executive assuming command of a marching army, this time not against Berlin, but against Little Rock. This same Commander admonishes the southern Governors that in taking the oath to support the U.S. Constitution, they swear allegiance to the Supreme Court and the Court's version of "the law of the land." Or to be specific, he and others insist that the Governors are sworn to integrate the public schools.

The men who assembled and drafted our Constitution and those who have subsequently lawfully amended it made it apparent and definite that the individual, the State, and the Nation, were all to have rights. As a matter of course the rights must be different in scope since the needs are different in scope. Note carefully, I have emphasized "in scope"—they are not different in degree, for the National Government can no more take away a man's life or property without due process of law than can that same individual refuse to serve in our Armed Forces. Equally true is this with regard to the powers of a sovereign State over the individual. While some States allow 18-year-old to vote, other States forbid it, and the individual citizen of 18 in a forbidding State is not denied equal protection of the laws because he can't vote.

Paramount among these powers reserved to the States, therefore, is that of regulating elections, and equally paramount is the power of providing and regulating public education. Both of these powers remained undisturbed by the 14th amendment. The right to vote without regard to race was not guaranteed until 2 years later by the 15th amendment. It is clear by law and intent that the 14th amendment did not disturb the fixed boundary between the right of the individual and the power of the State in providing public education. Both the Congress that framed the amendment and the States that ratified it continued to operate separate schools. When the doctrine of "separate and equal" was sanctioned by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1896, neither Congress nor any court or State protested. On the contrary, everyone understood this doctrine as the basis upon which the States could conduct public education. The correctness of this understanding was confirmed repeatedly by the highest State and Federal courts in an unbroken line of decisions. The boundary line remained fixed. There is today no law and no provision of the Constitution requiring racially integrated schools. Until the Constitution is lawfully amended and the boundary line changed, the South stands on this boundary and on this principle. Until the Constitution is lawfully amended, my refusal to integrate the schools will not conflict with my oath as Governor.

In fact, the contrary is true. I could not conscientiously take an oath to protect and defend the Constitution of the United States and not object to the Supreme Court usurping the amendatory power that constitutionally is vested in three-fourths of the States. To do so would give us a government of men and not of laws. This danger was foreseen by our forefather in the founding days of this Republic, for it was George Washington who said in his Farewell Address:

"If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the Constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an Amendment in the way which the Constitution designates, but let there be no change by usurpation; for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed."

Nevertheless, the danger grows and members of the Court claim for it the function, and even the duty, of amending the Constitution at will. In his dissenting opinion in Green v. United States in March 1958, Justice Hugo Black, with the concurrence of Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justice William O. Douglas, said this:

"Indeed, the Court has a special responsibility where questions of constitutional law are involved to review its decision from time to time and where compelling reasons present themselves to refuse to follow erroneous precedents; otherwise its mistakes in interpreting the Constitution are extremely difficult to alleviate and needlessly so."

In other words, when these Justices disagree with earlier and long-standing interpretations of the Constitution, such interpretations are mistakes and should be corrected by the Court, because the amending process is "extremely difficult," and "needlessly so" when the Justices can so easily take the place of the constitutional three-fourths of the States.

The Supreme Court of our land was established to decide litigation in the light of past decisions and not in spite of past decisions. It is not the Court's function to lay down "the law of the land" by judicial fiat. It is the Congress under the American system that makes law. Flagrantly, baldly usurping the amendatory power of three-fourths of the States, the Justices of the Supreme Court apparently take their gospel from Richard III, whom Shakespeare caused to say:

"Strong arms shall be our conscience, swords our law.
March on, join together to pell mell
If not to Heaven, then hand in hand to Hell."

It is distressing that the Justices don't know where they are trying to force us, but it is even more distressing that they, like Richard, apparently don't care.

As Governor I believe the duty of the Court to be that as expressed by the great Chief Justice Edward Douglass White. His opinion was joined in by Justice John Marshall Harlan, a grandfather of the present Justice. Chief Justice White stated:

"The fundamental conception of a judicial body is that one hedged about by precedents which are binding on the Court without regard to the personality of its members. Break down this belief in judicial continuity, and let it be felt that on great constitutional questions this Court is to depart from the settled conclusions of its predecessors, and to determine them all according to the mere opinion of those who temporarily fill its bench, and our Constitution will, in my judgment, be bereft of value, and become a most dangerous instrument to the rights and liberties of the people." Pollock v. Farmers Loan & Trust Co., 157 U.S. 429, 652.

We therefore object generally to these civil rights proposals as inappropriate and dangerous approvals by the Congress of the Supreme Court's violation of its duty.

You should have the same objection. What is happening is obvious to all America. The Court has goofed. In their zeal to pioneer in the field of human rights, the justices have disobeyed the law for judges. Rather than being the heroes they thought they would be, they have incurred the wrath of everyone. The American Bar Association, the Association of State Supreme Court Justices, the State's Attorney General's Association, the Association of Secretaries of State, and leading jurists have all condemned the Court. Even the Civil Rights Commissioners are throwing up their hands in despair. Comes now the President and Attorney General asking the Congress to build into the law a respect for the Court and its disobedience of the law. They want the Congress not as a coequal branch of government with the Court, but to be its hatchetmen. The justices learn now a simple law of physics. A legal structure, like any other structure, must be built from the foundation up—not from the top down. The people through their Congress is the foundation of law and though the Court has manufactured some supreme stories at the top, they continue to fall around at their feet for want of proper foundation. Like all the king's horses and all the king's men, all of these civil rights proposals and all the Congress can't put Humpty Dumpty together again.

As the State's Governor I specifically object to attempts on the part of the Federal Government to take over the police powers of the States. We have law and order in South Carolina and we will maintain law and order in South Carolina. We don't need further Federal authority. We believe not only in States rights but in States responsibilities. Accordingly, where needed, we have enacted our own State statutes for the proper exercise of the police power in order to give equal protection of all the laws to all our citizens regardless of race. We will not allow persons to take the law into their own hands. We will not have mob violence in our State. As a member of our house of representatives, I authored the antilynch bill which is the law in South Carolina today. This law describes a mob as an assemblage of two or more persons without authority of law for the premeditated purpose of committing an act of violence upon the person of another. It provides strict penalties for mob violence. It is, I am informed, the strictest antilynch measure within the 50 States.

I can tell you as Governor of South Carolina that in any incident giving rise to a threat of mob violence, be it a labor dispute, racial tension or from whatever cause, South Carolina's laws will be enforced and there will be no mob violence. The Federal statute suggested by the Attorney General is unnecessary in South Carolina.

We have sound, fair election laws. Everyone believes in the free exercise of the Negroes' privilege to vote. He exercises this right unhampered. I reiterate there's not a single complaint from South Carolina to your Civil Rights Commission on any voting right infringement or denial. None of us condones violence, and although we have a malicious injury to property statute, when I took office in January I recommended a strict, clear-cut penal provision for those who would take the law unto themselves and deface and damage church and school property. A bill has been introduced by our senate judiciary committee providing for this, and additionally providing for threats of such misconduct, and I and the legislative leaders present can assure you that though it is not needed, we will have such a law in South Carolina within the next few days.

When it comes to civil rights, South Carolina has a civil rights statute. Before I read the State statute, I want to read to you the original Federal Civil Rights statute so that you can recognize the striking similarity. Section 241 of title 18, U.S.C.A., entitled "Conspiracy Against Rights of Citizens," is as follows:

"If two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having so exercised the same; or if two or more persons go in disguise on the highway, or on the premises of another, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege so secured, they shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both."

Section 16–101 of the 1952 Code of Laws of South Carolina, entitled "Conspiracy Against Civil Rights," reads as follows:

"If any two or more persons shall band or conspire together to go in disguise upon the public highway or upon the premises of another with intent to injure, oppress or violate the person or property of any citizen because of his political opinion or his expression or exercise of the same or shall attempt by any means, measures or acts to hinder, prevent or obstruct any citizen in the free exercise and enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution and laws of the United States or by the constitution and laws of this State such persons shall be guilty of a felony and, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $2,000 or be imprisoned not less than 6 months or more than 3 years, or both, at the discretion of the court, and shall thereafter be ineligible to hold, and disabled from holding, any office of honor, trust or profit in this State."

Now what is the matter with using either one of these statutes to deter the use of force or threats of force to obstruct court orders? The point is here that the technical difficulty presumed by the Attorney General in contempt proceedings in persons not being parties to the suit or the court not being in session is obviated. Court orders or no court orders—if persons interfere with the citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of a right guaranteed by the United States Constitution, then they can be held under the State or Federal law. I realize the lack of individual applicability, but it is mob violence that the President and Attorney General were after. The truth is that the U.S. Attorney General doesn't like this statute. He would rather it be kept a secret because it is so easily applicable to labor violence. Time and again labor strife in this country could have been arrested by proceeding under section 241. If there was some way to measure labor strife and racial strife, there is no question that the former would far outweigh the latter. Labor disorder is of national concern. Racial disorder is of no such concern, but rather politically conceived.

If the Congress were to adjourn for 10 years, the Negro in South Carolina would continue to receive excellent education—his voting rights, his civil rights, his constitutional rights. But, on the other hand, if the Congress fails to meet and in the next 10 years fails to regulate labor violence, we are lost.

The Attorney General should start enforcing the laws he now has at hand and quit trying to play politics with minority and racial groups.

As Governor I intend to enforce the law in South Carolina. Without the Civil Rights Commission and without these so-called civil rights statutes, law enforcement will be an easy task.

Although there has been some deterioration since the Supreme Court decision of 1954, there is still a feeling of respect for the law. There is a revulsion against pressure groups like the NAACP and Ku Klux Klan. The candidate who opposed me in the general election, James W. Cole, was a Klan leader. He is now in jail—not for opposing me, I may add, but for opposing decency.

We have the highest respect and the most friendly relations with the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

South Carolinians respect their Federal judges and Federal courts. Grand juries are quick to indict for violations, and the U.S.

attorney will tell you he has complete cooperation. This will all go out of the window with the enactment of the proposed legislation. The people will feel—and they have a right to feel—that here are unnecessary laws being enacted against a minority South in the name of civil rights to gain political capital with other minority groups over the Nation. Rather than upholding the Federal Government and the Federal laws, they will feel that they are only political measures and the contest will be who can play the best politics rather than who can maintain law and order.

For myself, rather than dedicating my time to the furtherance of educational progress and industrial development to provide a future for all our people, I will be spending all of my time trying to maintain law and order.

Our State's attorney general will adhere to the specific bills at hand. I will complete my statement with observations on the recommendations of the President that have prompted the proposed legislation. I have already commented on the President's first recommendation about prohibiting the use of force to obstruct court orders in desegregation cases. I have stated how the original Civil Rights Act would cover this proposal. I believe the obstruction of justice statutes title 18, sections 1501–1507 are sufficient to cope with any threat of mob violence. The bill including the President's first recommendation states in effect that persons who do violence to school court orders shall be punished for a crime, but those that do violence to other court orders shall go free. If the Federal Government needs further power to enforce its order in school cases, then it needs this power in all cases. I have already pointed out that there is more labor dispute than school dispute, and if needed, the Congress in its drive for equality should give equal authority in labor disputes. The point is that this is special legislation for a special offense designed against a special section of our Nation, all in the pretended cause of equal protection of the laws. Our section of the Nation is known for peace and order. Our public leaders are known for their contribution and dedication to constitutional government and the preservation of all the freedoms for all the people. Anyone familiar with South Carolina and its people will tell you that rather than promoting civil rights these bills if enacted will create civil disorder. As a Governor I am particularly concerned. The police power is vested in the States and not in the National Government, and the primary duty of the State's chief executive is to administer this police power. Whether Gov. Orval Faubus was right or wrong will be argued from now on. Whatever your conclusion, the Attorney General now agrees that troops never should have been used and even Harry Ashmore has reported that desegregation cannot now be had in Little Rock. Be that as it may, Faubus as Governor used force to preserve law and order. The people, the real law of the land, vindicated his judgment by an overwhelming majority at the ballot box. These are facts. There is no doubt that despite these facts, Brownell would have arrested Faubus had this bill been the law. Governor Shivers of Texas, Governor Clement of Tennessee, and Governor Faubus have all used force to maintain law and order in these school matters. There should never be the enactment of a statute by the Congress that would cause the arrest of a State's chief executive for performing his primary duty.

The creation of this new offense makes a mockery of the double jeopardy provisions of the fifth amendment. For a single offense the Federal Government could prosecute under: First, the obstruction of justice statutes; second, the original Civil Rights Act; and third, under this proposal. If the offender were a party to an injunction, then he could be punished yet again, making four Federal trials. That all these punishments are applicable for one offense illustrates both the unnecessary and dangerous features of this proposed legislation.

This proposal in effect makes all Americans second-class citizens, and Communists first class. A Communist can threaten to overthrow the Government but unless this threat is accompanied with an overt act, there is no violation. Here the threat by an American citizen against a court order is punishable even though it is unaccompanied by an overt act. The Congress will not be giving equal protection to its U.S. citizen. If you think this is a ridiculous approach, read the proposal carefully. Moreover, words of disagreement can easily be interpreted as threats. No one in the South has agreed with any of the Court orders respecting the school decisions. They have so expressed themselves. The enactment of this bill would make criminals of them all.

Commenting on the President's second recommendation to give investigative authority to the FBI in school and church destruction cases, I would reiterate the police power is vested in the States and were it otherwise proper then such authority should be given for all crimes. There has been no indication that any Federal authority is needed in this field. No one has escaped prosecution for such an offense in South Carolina and I know of no flights from such prosecution. The President stated "State authorities have been diligent in their execution of local laws dealing with these crimes." The Attorney General when he appeared before this committee stated that "local officials have been diligent in their efforts to apprehend offenders" and at the same time he gave no instances wherein this proposal was necessary. He didn't cite a single case. This recommendation, therefore, is only an attempt to insult the South. While any type incident of this nature in the South receives national headlines, similar incidents in other sections of the country go unreported. Last October I was in attendance at the United Lutheran Church Convention in Dayton, Ohio.

On the first evening of our conference we were saddened to hear of the passing of one of the world's greatest church leaders, the late Pope Pius. We were even more shocked that when the news was announced at approximately midnight in Dayton, it was greeted by a group of people proceeding to the cathedral grounds in the city of Dayton, tarring a beautiful marble statue of the Pope, placing tinder sticks at the bottom and setting the likeness ablaze. There is no such anti-Catholic feeling anywhere in the State of South Carolina. When I came home and told of what had happened, my story was received with disbelief. I have yet to see this incident reported in any national publication. If it had occurred in South Carolina, the U.S. State Department would have been apologizing, and I believe it should have.

As to the President's third recommendation, I reiterate there hasn't been a single complaint of the violation of voting rights to the Civil Rights Commission from South Carolina. Persons in the South have resisted turning over election records to prevent fishing expeditions by the Federal authorities. When the election records were needed, they were obtained through the grand jury in Alabama. To vest the Attorney General with power over election records is highly dangerous. In addition to the usual historical observations of grand jury indictment and trial by jury being written into our Constitution to protect persons from judicial tyranny, I would like to warn of the political danger that this poses—not so much to the South, because we are a one-party State, but to those States that have vigorous two-party systems with close elections. Attorneys General are often selected more on the basis of their political ability than for their legal ability. Given the power to seize election records at a time of his own choosing, close elections could be controlled from Washington. I think the Attorney General should work through the local grand juries in this respect as they have always done.

I should refer here to the companion measure, S. 456, introduced by Senator JAVITS, and S. 810, introduced by Senator DOUGLAS, which undertake to give the Attorney General power to institute civil suits in behalf of any person who is denied equal protection of the laws on account of race, religion, or national origin. These bills again are concerned with select offenses for select groups. Done in the name of equality, they violate equality. That they are designed especially is best evidenced by the Attorney General's response to Senator ERVIN'S suggestion that a statute be expanded to allow the institution of suits for the denial of equal protection of the law on account of religion. Mr. Roger's response in opposing such a suggestion, stated that it would not be wise, and said this: "I think it would require the Government to become involved in a great deal of litigation which might very well harden the resistance that is already apparent in many areas to the point where it would be impossible to make any progress in the future." We are dangerously near that point in South Carolina due to the Supreme Court school decisions, and this bill would have exactly the effect that Mr. Rogers fears in the religious field. To use Mr. Rogers' words, this bill would "curtail progress, rather than advance the progress in this field."

The fourth and fifth recommendations dealing with Federal aid and authority in public schools is a typical camel's nose under the tent that probes continuously for those wishing to nationalize education. It is surprising that we have allowed the Federal Government to advance as far in this field as having a Department of Education. The people of this country will never stand for Federal schooling. Even Chief Justice Earl Warren has agreed, as stated in Brown v. The Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483; 98 Law Ed. 873: "Today education is perhaps the most important function of State and local governments." Two years ago the special Presidential Commission studying the so-called national emergency in public schooling found that in only 13 States in America is a child not being denied an education for the lack of a classroom or a school teacher. Low per capita income South Carolina is one of these 13. We don't need Federal aid. We don't want Federal aid because we don't want Federal controls. To give Federal authority over public schools beyond a military reservation or other Federal property is unthinkable. That these steps are only a foot in the door is best evidenced by the President's sixth recommendation that the Committee on Government Contracts be resolved into a Commission on Government Contracts. What was a committee is now to be a commission. It is the same national F.E.P.C. proposal that has been rejected as an unconstitutional assumption of State sovereignty and power by this Congress on numerous occasions.

As to the President's final proposal to extend the life of the Commission, South Carolina reiterates her position of opposition to the original institution of this Commission. A continuation would only mean extended uselessness and increased discord. Whether the Commission has had time enough to do what certain politicians desired is probably doubtful, but certainly we have had enough time to determine the necessity of this Commission. This Commission was spawned by the flimsy testimony of news reports, hearsay, and political talk. Seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars was appropriated for the expected tremendous volume of violations of civil liberties. There has been no case in South Carolina. The case in Alabama has been dismissed. The Commission has a doubtful case in Georgia, and if we are interested in the rights and freedoms of persons, there are far more incidents of rape, murder, and bank robbery in this country and a Commission for these offenses would be more logical even though equally unwarranted.

The real truth is that thinking leaders of both races in the South realize that integration is unwise, impractical and will never be accomplished.

The South has stood the acid test. With all the opinions and predictions of psychologists, sociologists and special interest groups, despite the heavy pressure of the national leadership of both political parties, despite the millions of dollars expended for airborne troops, hearings, court proceedings and what have you, only 165 colored children have been integrated in the schools of 10 States in the last 5 years. In Arkansas there have been 78; North Carolina 13; Tennessee 44; Virginia 30. In the other six Southern States, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana, there has been no integration. The southern Negro knows he is getting the best education and the best opportunity on an individual basis. We are denying him nothing on account of his race and we will give him nothing on account of his race. Lopsided internationalists may talk of the shame that racial incidents have visited upon these United States with the nations of the world. These nations know and understand racial differences. Rather than alarm for these incidents, the people of Europe were far more shocked at the striking similarity between Eisenhower and his use of troops to maintain law and order in Little Rock and Khrushchev's use of troops to maintain law and order in Hungary.

So-called civil rights legislation such as you have before you will drive deeply the shaft of division into the national body. Such bills would hurt our domestic and international efforts. They will hurt everyone, the white and the Negro alike. They will promote civil discord rather than civil rights. Law enforcement will depreciate as in the days of prohibition with local law officers opposing the Federal officers. They will make it extremely difficult for Governors of our States to maintain law and order. They will be a grievous disservice to our beloved America.

JOHN FOSTER DULLES

Mr. GLENN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I join in what I am sure is the unanimous sentiment of this body in expressing regret that a truly great and distinguished American has today found it necessary for reasons of health to relinquish an office that this patriotic public servant has filled with courage, perseverance, and unusual wisdom. It may be properly said that few people have served the cause of peace with greater dedication and effectiveness than has John Foster Dulles, our Nation's esteemed Secretary of State. That health now causes him to set aside the responsibilities of his office is a matter of serious moment to himself and is a consequence of utmost concern to the Nation he has served so selflessly and so well.

The political obscurants who recklessly in the past attempted to malign the dedicated steadfastness and infallible foresight of Mr. Dulles now have tragic reason to recant their carping and to acknowledge their own failure to measure up to his achievements for peace and the protection of mankind against Communist enslavement.

It is our fervent prayer that Mr. Dulles may recover from his illness so that we may continue to benefit from his wise counsel and so that he may enjoy with his beloved wife a rich period of private life.

TVA TURBOGENERATOR AWARD

Mr. GLENN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, on February 6, 1959, the Tennessee Valley Authority awarded a contract for a 500,000 kilowatt steam turbogenerator to C. A. Parsons & Co., Ltd., of England.

On February 27, the Authority issued a statement defending its action. This statement clearly indicates to me that the Authority's preference for the foreign bidder was due primarily to considerations of price.

The two American bidders have now petitioned the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization to upset this contract on the grounds that transfer of such major defense production potential to a source 3,000 miles from our shores threatens to impair our national security. The American companies and the Authority seem to agree on the fact that this huge generator is highly important to national defense. Therefore, the argument is primarily concerned with the question of whether or not its manufacture abroad will impair our national security potential.

So that our colleagues may have an understanding of the importance of this matter, I would like to cite a few facts about this turbogenerator. A 500,000 kilowatt generator is no trinket, no mere statistic. No such huge piece of equipment has yet been built and put into service. It will be one of the three largest steam generators that man has ever undertaken to build.

Such a generator is approximately 112 feet long, 60 feet wide, 19 feet high, and will weigh 1,812 tons. With a capacity of 670,000 horsepower, this generator, operating at an estimated 95 percent capacity, day in and day out, would produce continuously 636,500 horsepower. To visualize this vast output of power, it might be helpful to my colleagues to point out that 636,500 horsepower is the equivalent of more than 3,000 Fords or Chevrolets running at top speed day and night, 365 days a year, year in and year out. To put it another way, it is enough power to lift the 76,000-ton U.S.S. Forrestal 138 feet in 1 minute flat. This one piece of equipment could generate the entire annual power supply for the whole District of Columbia.

EMPLOYMENT

Manufacture of this generator in the United States would have provided a years' full-time employment for at least 700 American workers engaged directly in the fabrication of this machine and its component parts, and would have contributed to the employment of many other supporting and service personnel inside the plant of an American electrical manufacturer. I would hasten to add that this is not all the employment which would be affected. Based on data from the American Tariff League and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce indicating the importance of manufacturing jobs to a community, it can be estimated that these 700 jobs mean additionally $2,520,000 in annual retail sales; $1,890,000 in bank deposits; 749 automobile registrations; 784 households; 28 retail establishments; 518 jobs in other enterprises.

Thus, the 700 workers directly employed would cause 518 other jobs to exist in the community or a total of 1,218 jobs.

Given the substantial unemployment in our Nation today—amounting to 6.1 percent of our working force—I would question the wisdom of public policy which places this rather substantial number of jobs in the United Kingdom where the unemployed represent only 2.8 percent of the working force. In fact, Britain is enjoying great prosperity. I note, for example, that on April 2, 1959, the Wall Street Journal carried a dispatch from London which reads in part as follows:

> The British Government published an economic balance sheet indicating the nation has emerged from recession into the biggest boom in years.
> Rising incomes, near-stability in prices, and the most buoyant trade figures since World War II were reported in the treasury's economic survey for 1959.

And additionally, I note that the four areas where such generators can be produced here at home are all classified by the Department of Labor as areas of substantial unemployment. In my view, the domestic unemployment situation should be one overriding concern in these contract awards.

PRICE VERSUS DEFENSE

Another overriding concern should be our national security—the productive capacity we have available for defense; and our laws explicitly so state.

The price in the British bid is far lower than that in the domestic companies' bids. This is quite understandable in view of the lower wages and lower general costs of doing business in Britain. When the Japanese start building big generators, their price will, no doubt be even lower, and for the same reasons.

If we are to follow a theory of basing all defense-essential purchases primarily on price, we will inevitably find our essential defense productive capacity moving even closer to the Soviet boundaries.

On this matter of national security, the Authority comments:

In the event of total war, the problem of repair or replacement of generating units would be about the same whether they had been manufactured domestically or abroad. Any realistic contemplation of such a war must assume that American turbogenerator manufacturing plants could be destroyed or damaged in the same attack which might damage or destroy the unit installed in the Colbert Steam Plant. Early repair or replacement would seem unlikely no matter where the unit had been built.

In event of a less extensive attack or acts of sabotage, it should be recognized that generating units manufactured by all the major American suppliers are incorporated in the TVA system. Widespread damage to the system could result in heavy demands on all these suppliers, both by TVA and by utilities in other sections of the country. Addition of the Parsons unit to the TVA system increases the number of suppliers who can be called on in the event of such an emergency and thereby reduces the risk of delay in getting maximum capacity back into service.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleagues if those two paragraphs make much sense?

The Authority seems to feel that, if we have a big war, it will not make any difference where we bought the generator. Not prescient, I cannot say whether the Authority is right, but I still feel, both instinctively and from our past experience, that the more capacity we have 3,823 miles from the Iron Curtain—rather than just 477 miles away—the better off we will be.

Then the Authority seems to feel that, if we have a smaller war or sabotage, the British source of supply would, in effect, be an advantage—one more string in our bow. The experience of World Wars I and II does not bear out this line of reasoning. Even in the unlikely event that the Britsh would be in a position to assist us, I doubt that future adversaries would make shipment of massive, defense-essential electrical equipment across the ocean any easier than the Kaiser or Hitler did. Looking at this past experience of wartime production going eastward and not westward across the Atlantic, I personally would feel more secure if the production and repair facilities were in Schenectady or East Pittsburgh.

Since we cannot predict what a future war will do to productive capacity and since we do know what has happened in every war of this country, I would suggest that we might be wiser as a Nation were we to base our public policy upon what we do know and not upon what we do not know.

THE ECONOMICS OF THE SITUATION

Long concerned with electricity, fertilizers, flood control and related matters, the Authority is now branching out into a new field—the economics of foreign trade. Its experience in this field is scarcely remarkable.

The Authority says:

TVA would regret any real net loss of employment for American workers from its purchase of an English turbogenerator. However, it seems more likely that there will be a net benefit to American labor. TVA will make payment in dollars for its purchase from Parsons. It can reasonably be assumed that these dollars will be used to finance British purchases of other goods either in the United States or in third countries which will in turn use the dollars to make purchases in the United States. Those dollars can be expected to create and pay for as many man-hours of work in the United States as would have resulted from domestic manufacture of the turbogenerator.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that my colleagues will be glad to know that the Authority would "regret any real net loss of employment for American workers from its purchase of an English turbogenerator."

The logic underlying the rest of the economics in its statement can but leave us mystified.

Apparently the Authority has never heard the parable often, although perhaps apocryphally, attributed to President Lincoln:

If we spend $100 to buy iron rails from the English, we have the rails and they have the $100.

If we buy the rails from ourselves, we have both the rails and the $100.

Nor, apparently, has the Authority noted the diminution in our gold reserves. At the end of 1958, American gold holdings stood at $20.5 billions as compared with $22.8 billions at the end of 1957. The Wall Street Journal pointed out, on December 16, 1958:

The national gold reserve declined by $2.2 billion between February 19 and November 26; Federal Reserve Board experts estimate that foreign, mostly European, net acquisitions of gold and dollars during the entire year will be about $3 billion.

The United States gold reserve, at $20.6 billion, is at its lowest figure since the end of the war. The current slide in the gold stock is the sharpest on record, except for a precipitous decline during the first year of the Korean fighting.

Frankly, this disturbs me. It doesn't take much arithmetic to see that, if depletion of our gold supply continues at even a modest proportion of this rate, our stock could be exhausted in 10 to 15 years.

It is thus obvious that the Authority's economic theory, that dollars spent abroad are a lot of homing pigeons, does not bear up under close scrutiny.

And further, even if one accepts the Authority's "homing-pigeon theory" of international dollar transactions, I fail to see the validity of their contention that $12 million spent abroad can ever make as many jobs as $18 million spent here. Yet on this the Authority says:

Those dollars can be expected to create and pay for as many man-hours of work in the United States as would have resulted from domestic manufacture of the turbogenerator.

The Authority's mathematics escape me. Even in the unlikely event that the whole $12 million were to return to our shores, it could only provide two-thirds as many jobs as the $18 million spent here.

CONCLUSION

But, Mr. Speaker, even if we ignore these curious economic considerations and even if we ignore the relationship between this purchase and American unemployment, I fail to understand how our Government can refuse to recognize the threat this purchase poses to our national security. Must we dismantle our defense-essential productive capacity because of price? Must we produce defense-essential goods in plants thousands of miles from our shores when repair and maintenance are such important factors?

I am sure that every Member of this House is aware that our very survival as a Nation, in the event of a nuclear attack, can depend to a great extent on the speed with which we can restore our domestic productive capacity. One of the vital bases of domestic productive capacity is the availability of electric power. How then can our Government fail to see the questionable nature of this decision by the TVA?

In this deliberate courting of disaster, America appears to stand quite alone. Other nations of the world recognize the intimate relationship between electric power and their national security. As just one example, I would like to point out that the United Kingdom has never purchased its turbogenerative equipment from overseas sources.

For at least a score of years, the British have embargoed, or virtually embargoed, foreign-manufactured electrical machinery, chemicals, and many other products—for example, American automobiles for which Britain has an import quota of 650 cars a year as against approximately 140,000 British cars imported into the United States during 1958.

Recently, and after many, many years' urging, the British have allowed American companies to bid on British heavy electrical-equipment contracts—presumably secure in the knowledge that, if their extremely low labor rates permit them to bid lower than American companies in Tennessee, American bids will not trouble them in England.

I would become discursive, Mr. Speaker, were I to transfer this subject from the large turbogenerator to a discussion of the United Kingdom's highly protectionist or "Buy British" foreign trade policies. I will, therefore, close by urging that this decision of the Authority be reversed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ROUSH, for the balance of the week, on account of official business.

To Mr. MAHON (at the request of Mr. RODINO), for Wednesday, April 15, 1959, on account of official business: To be present at the commissioning of submarine Skipjack at New London, Conn.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to Mrs. SULLIVAN, today, for 15 minutes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, permission to extend remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or to revise and extend remarks, was granted to:

Mr. GEORGE and to include an address.

Mr. FORAND.

Mr. WOLF.

Mr. BROYHILL and to include extraneous matter.

Mr. DORN of New York (at the request of Mr. GLENN) and to include extraneous matter.

(At the request of Mr. FOLEY, and to include extraneous matter, the following:)

Mr. BOLAND in two instances.

Mr. HECHLER.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, April 16, 1959, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

849. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of Defense (Properties and Installations), relative to the Department of the Navy requesting approval to proceed with a project for the Naval Reserve for the necessary repair of damage, alterations and improvements to permit the continued utilization by the Naval Reserve of a portion of Building 36, known as the Fargo Building, Boston, Mass., at an estimated cost of $112,730, pursuant to section 2233a(b) of title 10, United States Code; to the Committee on Armed Services.

850. A letter from the Director, Legislative Liaison, Department of the Air Force, relative to the number of officers assigned or detailed to permanent duty in the executive element of the Air Force at the seat of government for the period ending March 31, 1959, pursuant to section 8031(c), title 10, United States Code; to the Committee on Armed Services.

851. A letter from the Administrator, Veterans' Administration, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to modernize the pension programs for certain veterans and their dependents"; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

852. A letter from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, U.S. Department of Justice, relative to the case of Alexander Kaszuba, A–2990961, involving suspension of deportation, pursuant to the Immigration Act of 1917; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

853. A letter from the Acting Secretary of State, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill for the relief of Colbert Colgate Held and Charles W. Shellhorn"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. THORNBERRY: Committee on Rules. House Resolution 245. Resolution for consideration of H.R. 5674, a bill to authorize certain construction at military installations, and for other purposes. Without amendment (Rept. No. 272). Referred to the House Calendar.

Mrs. PFOST: Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. H.R. 2497. A bill to add certain lands located in Idaho to the Boise and Payette National Forests, with amendment (Rept. No. 273). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 4 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ANDERSON of Montana:

H.R. 6407. A bill to amend the Federal Credit Union Act; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

H.R. 6408. A bill to provide a more equitable method for computing the self-employment income of farmers under the Social Security Act for taxable years ending during the period commencing January 1, 1955, and ending December 31, 1959; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ANFUSO:

H.R. 6409. A bill to authorize appropriations for the Federal-aid primary system of highways for the purpose of equitably reimbursing the States for certain free and toll roads on the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Works.

H.R. 6410. A bill to express and effectuate the policy of Congress with respect to the disposal of surplus agricultural commodities, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. BALDWIN:

H.R. 6411. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that all transportation furnished to members of the Armed Forces (instead of only transportation costing 2½ cents per mile or less as under present law) shall be exempt from the tax on transportation of persons; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BASS of Tennessee:

H.R. 6412. A bill to amend the Federal Employees Salary Increase Act of 1958 to grant certain increases in compensation to employees of the agricultural stabilization and conservation county committees, to bring employees of agricultural stabilization and conservation county committees within the purview of the Civil Service Retirement Act and the Federal Employees' Group Life Insurance Act of 1954, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

By Mr. BERRY:

H.R. 6413. A bill to amend the act of September 2, 1958 (72 Stat. 1762, Public Law 85–915), concerning payment of debts out of compensation for trust land on the Standing Rock Sioux Reservation taken by the United States; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. CELLER:

H.R. 6414. A bill to authorize appropriations for the Federal-aid primary system of highways for the purpose of equitably reimbursing the States for certain free and toll roads on the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Works.

By Mr. CRAMER:

H.R. 6415. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that the cost of all medicine and drugs for the taxpayer and his spouse, rather than only the excess over 1 percent of adjusted gross income as otherwise provided, may be included in computing the medical expense deduction where such taxpayer or spouse is 65 or over; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DELANEY:

H.R. 6416. A bill to authorize appropriations for the Federal-aid primary system of highways for the purpose of equitably reimbursing the States for certain free and toll roads on the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Works.

By Mr. DORN of New York:

H.R. 6417. A bill to provide for the establishment of a commission to study the shortage of doctors of medicine in the United States; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

H.R. 6418. A bill to amend section 3853 of title 10, United States Code, to provide for the retention in an active status of certain members of the Army Reserve; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. FARBSTEIN:

By Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER:

H.J. Res. 341. Joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to sell certain war-built vessels; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. THOMPSON of Louisiana:

H.J. Res. 342. Joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to sell certain war-built vessels; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

MEMORIALS

Under clause 3 of rule XXII,

Mr. LANE presented a memorial of the General Court of Massachusetts memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States to enact no legislation restricting the further importation of residual oil from nations friendly disposed toward the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CRAMER:

H.R. 6440. A bill for the relief of the estate of Samuel Grier, Jr., deceased; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FOGARTY:

H.R. 6441. A bill for the relief of Arsene Kavoukdjian (Arsene Kavookjian); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FOLEY:

H.R. 6442. A bill for the relief of Vincent J. Reilly; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GUBSER:

H.R. 6443. A bill for the relief of Donald P. Sevrens and W. A. Busch; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H.R. 6444. A bill for the relief of Lee Ee Ai; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. IRWIN:

H.R. 6445. A bill for the relief of Miss Anna Gentile; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H.R. 6446. A bill for the relief of Luciano Soto y Carballal; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LANE:

H.R. 6447. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Maria Luisa D. Furtado; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MONAGAN:

H.R. 6448. A bill for the relief of James Joseph Shaker; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MOORE:

H.R. 6449. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Virginia Miles; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PELLY:

H.R. 6450. A bill for the relief of Roland Mishutani; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H.R. 6451. A bill for the relief of Mary Miharu Takahashi; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SISK:

H.R. 6452. A bill for the relief of Antonino Catania; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Business in the 86th Congress

OF

HON. CARL HAYDEN

OF ARIZONA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 15, 1959

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], a good neighbor of Arizona, delivered an address to the Western Highway Institute convention in Phoenix, Ariz., on April 6, which is recommended reading for anyone who wants information as to the march of population and industry in the great Southwest.

In it is an accurate summary of what the Congress has done to develop a highway system which has for its objective the movement of persons and things from where they are to where they are needed at less cost and in less time. He also has illustrated what needs to be done in furtherance of this purpose.

There is a nationwide demand for water, and there is no one better qualified than the Senator from New Mexico to state, as he did in his address, the progress which has been made toward meeting this imperative demand.

All the Senator from New Mexico said in Phoenix was informative, and to make his remarks available to a wider audience I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BUSINESS IN THE 86TH CONGRESS

Your program committee gave me an easy topic for this noontime talk: "Business in the 86th Congress"—easy because it admits of many different treatments. I might confine my talk solely to the way the 86th Congress is likely to conduct its own business, the interferences that may come from extraneous issues, and the delays in enacting legislation that may result. Or I might discuss what business can expect from the 86th Congress—what laws we will pass with reference to income taxes, life insurance, trucking, water development, atomic energy, and allied subjects. Finally, in view of the great number of investigations already under way or about to be authorized, my theme might well be "Who Gets the Business, Why, and Where."

Naturally I will have a little trouble restraining myself on my favorite theme. Rather steadily these past few months, I have been talking and writing about the atom, its place in the home, its role in industry, its effect upon our laws and our lawyers, and the general problem of fallout; and today I could try to tune you in on what I regard as one of the most fascinating subjects now before the people of the earth.

Perhaps I might better start with a few words about what the 86th Congress has been doing these first 3 months, particularly as its actions relate to business.

Of first importance is the passage of the Hawaiian statehood bill, the addition of a 50th star to the flag. Today we are in the State which gave the 48th star to the flag and for 47 years held the distinction of being the last State admitted to the Union. For nearly half a century, when a new Representative of Arizona came into the Congress, he took the bottom of each committee list because committee assignments go by seniority and if seniority is equal, then by the order in which the States were admitted to the Union. Many times I've heard your Arizona people remark how they went to the absolute foot of the totem pole. Now come Alaska and Hawaii to move Arizona and New Mexico up a couple of notches, and we join with you in pleasure at our new prominence.

The Senate has passed a housing bill which provides $2.7 billion; has extended the Draft Act for 4 years in the pattern that the President requested; has passed an airport bill providing $465 million over a 4-year period; has added $48 million to the funds available to the new Space Agency to advance Project Mercury—the man in space—and to develop and test a new rocket engine. And finally, because it relates directly to business, it has passed a depressed area bill involving $390 million. Democrats thought the sum a minimum. Most Republicans thought it too large. One party's meat is the other party's poison. We learned that again when we extended some special unemployment compensation benefits, which we did in the final closing hours before the Easter recess.

Here in Arizona, I surely should mention the fact that the Senate Committee on Finance has been busy with hearings on a new proposal to change the basis for the taxation of life insurance companies. That deserves mention in Arizona because in 1950 there were two life insurance companies domiciled in New Mexico and three in Arizona. Today there are still 2 in New Mexico and 81 in Arizona. This State chartered more new life insurance companies than any State in the Union except Texas and if you add the State of Texas, Arizona and Texas started about as many new life insurance companies as all the rest of the Nation put together. I don't know what makes life insurance suddenly so attractive for Arizona and Texas companies, but perhaps an examination of the tax-free income possibilities could supply you with an answer.

The Senate has authorized the Joint Economic Committee to make an economic inventory of the United States. There is a background for that. The Senate Finance Committee on which I serve has made a long study on the financial condition of the United States, has filled 1,606 pages of printed testimony with theories, explanations and comment on what has been going on in our financial world. You and I will not need 1,600 pages to understand it. We know that if we deposited $100 in a bank 2 years ago, never wrote a check against it, just allowed it to lie in the bank, subject to the erosion of the dollar now going on, that $100 is worth $93 today. Inflation did that. And when there is that much inflation in the United States, whether creeping or galloping, interest rates will go up, true values will go down, businessmen will be affected, and people will want to see what Congress can learn about inflation as it sweeps across the land.

So that's a part of what the 86th Congress has been doing so far this year that might be of direct interest to business.

But my mail would indicate that businessmen are not concerned alone with taxes, inflation and unemployment. Through all the rather dull pattern of these inquiries there is woven in like a red thread the question of Berlin.

"What's going on?" they want to know. "Is Khrushchev bluffing? What will happen in May? If my children go to Europe this summer, will they be caught in a nuclear disaster? If war starts, how long will it last?"

If you find someone with exact answers to all these questions, send him to the missing persons section of the State Department; we have needed him a long time. But exact answers may not be required. What the Russians do may be influenced by what the free world does. Maybe I can give you one man's opinion.

A united front by the United States and her allies is essential if we are to deal successfully with the recurring world crises.

More important is unity among U.S. leaders, and the stand taken by the country's leaders must be understood and supported by the people. Businessmen like you must make a serious effort to be and remain informed on the problems facing your Nation's Government.

The U.S. position on Berlin is united. Democrats and Republicans alike are in agreement with the sentiments expressed on the floor of the Senate last month by Senator FULBRIGHT, new chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Senator FULBRIGHT listed three points on which there is complete unity in this country:

The United States will make no separate deals with the Soviet Union.

It will not be driven or enticed from Berlin or West Germany.

It will not accept, even tacitly, any propositions designed to formalize the subjugation of the once-free satellite peoples.

Berlin is the world's most important symbol of freedom. Because of this, more than because of its value as a city, it must be protected. It is an island of freedom in a sea of communism, and it must remain free.

Once the Russians understand that, and respect it, then there may be points that can be negotiated.

This is one audience that may be interested more than most others in the Berlin crisis, because here we have a problem that revolves around the highway—the highway which connects the island of West Berlin to the Bonn Government which in turn is tied to the rest of Western Europe. Remember that the United States, France, and Britain have their own zones and spheres of influence in Western Germany, and they are attempting to keep open their lines to Berlin. Over the highway which connects West Berlin with Bonn, roll constant thousands of trucks supplying the city. It was the blocking of the highway which precipitated the first Berlin crisis in 1948. Now the East Germans are threatening once again to cut off the highway which is the lifeline of the new city.

We need to keep constantly in mind the fact that it is not distances but distinctions which cause a fair share of this trouble. The end of World War I saw the establishment of the Polish corridor through Germany. It was a narrow strip of land, but it had high significance. After World War I, I talked with a distinguished statesman of a European nation. I asked him why that little strip of land disturbed him so. His reply was that the Polish corridor was not wide, but it was wide enough to bar forever the guarantee of peace for Europe as long as it existed.

Now again another little strip of land, the little highway that leads into West Berlin from West Germany, may embrace scant acreage, but may be sufficient to promise that a Berlin crisis or something similar to it, can fret us constantly as long as you live and as long as our children may live. It is a tiny highway but it could be the path over which we could travel to world war III.

Maybe I am a pessimist, but I do not look for any quick and easy relief from the tensions that now grip the world. Today it is Berlin; yesterday it was Lebanon, and the day before that it was Quemoy. Last week it was Korea; tomorrow, God knows. Wherever the force of worldwide communism can reach, even into the sacred temples of Tibet, the drive will be on. You and I and our children must be prepared to adjust our lives to it, to stand firm against it, and as Senator FULBRIGHT has suggested, to "chip away relentlessly at the encrusted Communist mixture of dogma, braggadocio, and fear that contributes so much to keeping world peace in a recurring state of serious jeopardy."

World tension, then, is part of the task of the 86th Congress and part of the responsibility the Congress feels toward business. Our world, which was once so large that it defied man's imagination, is now so small that we live neighbor to all creation. Instead of going around the world in 80 days—an unbelievable feat in the time of Jules Verne—we can travel by jet around the world in 80 hours. A missile or spaceship with a man aboard will soon be making the circuit in 80 minutes. Photon propulsion may sail us from Venus to Mars, and nuclear retrorockets may guarantee safe landing on the farthest planet. I'm no pessimist on space travel.

But the world is being shrunk by means other than jets and missiles and communications. One of the biggest problems which we will have to face in the future will be the shrinking of the world's available living space by a population growth which has properly been termed an explosion.

For Old Mother Earth is in the midst of her greatest baby boom. The United Nations population commission now estimates that in 16 years the earth will contain a billion people more than it does today. It believes that the rate of population increase during the second half of the present century will be twice that of the first half. In numbers, the U.N. predicts by the year 1976 a world population of 3,830 million; by the year 2000, a population of 6,280 million. And there is reason to believe that the U.N. forecasts are conservative.

The population explosion creates new pressures and new problems.

It is creating an irrepressible demand for elbow room, for more space, for new land for overcrowded nations. It is creating the same types of pressures which have historically led to the world's great wars.

The problems are magnified by the fact that the greatest population increase is coming in the lesser developed countries—brought about by a spectacular decline in death rates coupled with little change in traditionally high birth rates. The population is growing so fast in countries like China and India that they are unable to develop their economies. They are hard-pressed to maintain even their present low standards of living. Naturally they are looking around at other countries, rich industrial countries with high standards of living. Their leaders are coveting their neighbor's riches.

China by 1975 will have a population of more than 900 million, according to U.N. estimates—more than a quarter of the total world population, nearly 4 times the population of the United States. China's population by 1975 will be more than twice the combined population of the United States and Russia. China is regarded as a satellite of Russia, but by 1975 the satellite, three times as big as its Communist brother, may become the star.

China today has too many people to realize her economic or military potential. But she is apparently bent on converting her weakness into strength by revolutionary economic methods. She is outcommunizing

Russia. By the tightest of controls she is directing her masses into productive channels, trying to avoid the dissipation of scarce capital which would result if these masses were allowed to live on more than a bare subsistence level. She is transforming her excess people into economic betterment by vast schemes of public construction.

If China's population and economic growth continue at their present rates, she obviously will soon become the strongest contender for world leadership. Such a mass of humans, equipped with modern arms and disciplined by a dictatorship, would prove difficult to contain if it were bent on conquest at any cost.

John King Fairbank, professor of history at Harvard, in his book, "The United States and China," says: "As the earth shrinks and the peoples proliferate, we will soon be living on the same planet with a billion Chinese. We have something to think about."

So you can see to what crises the world's population explosion might lead. These are the types of world problems which must be reckoned with by every individual.

But the baby boom has meaning at home. The population of the United States today is 176 million, but by 1967—only a few years away—it is expected to reach 250 million.

Where will these new people be going? Where will they live? And how?

Every time God skims the milk of civilization, He pours the cream over the western side of the bowl. As a region the West, particularly the Far West and those southwestern areas that we refer to fondly as the Spanish borderlands, are growing faster than the rest of the country. Take a look at some figures:

The Bureau of the Census reports that between 1950 and 1958, population in the 11 Western States increased 27.6 percent, while growth for the United States as a whole was 15 percent. Nevada led the national parade with a growth of 66.7 percent. Florida had 60.3 percent, and Delaware and Maryland were in the first 10; but for the West, Arizona had 52.1 percent, California 35.4 percent, Colorado 29.1 percent, Utah 25.5 percent, and New Mexico 23.6 percent. Texas, I am happy to report, ran a little behind New Mexico. Washington and Oregon were just above the national average.

As with the States, so with the cities. Los Angeles has been adding population at the rate of 16,000 per month, adding every year about the equivalent of a city the size of Des Moines, Iowa, or Hartford, Conn., or—to stick with the West—of Spokane, Tucson, El Paso, or Albuquerque.

This stupendous growth is amazing arithmetically, but brings problems that seem to increase in geometric proportion. In Los Angeles alone enough dwelling units were built between 1946 and 1956 to house the combined populations of Philadelphia and Boston, or if you would rather keep your thoughts farther west, enough new houses to take care of the combined populations of Houston, Dallas, Denver, and St. Louis.

Naturally the 86th Congress has to keep looking at population growth and try to determine the problems posed to business and all segments of our economy by this growth. It needs to ask and answer what must be done to meet them.

First of all in your interests are roads. We live in an area of magnificent distances, and when we turn to the trail, it's a long, long trail that winds from Seattle to San Diego or from the Columbia River to the Rio Grande. Through the years we have been learning that if the road job is to be done, the Federal Government must be a partner to the State, the county and even to the city.

That is due not alone to our distances but to the share of land publicly owned within the borders of each of the 11 Western States. Federal and Indian land ownership in Arizona account for 69 percent of its total land area. The Federal Government owns 44.6 percent, or 32,414,635 acres, of the State's total area of 72,688,200 acres. In addition there are 19,344,971 acres of Indian land. None of this acreage is on the tax roll. If Uncle Sam did not help to build roads in Arizona, the task with modern transportation standards would be impossible.

In Nevada, the total area is 70,264,960 acres. The Federal Government owns 61,644,005 acres, or approximately 87.7 percent of the total land area. In addition to this, there are 1,149,700 acres of Indian lands not on the tax roll.

In comparison to these Western States, New York has a total land area of 30,684,160 acres. The total Federal land area is 258,519 acres, or 0.8 percent. Iowa, for instance, has a total area of 35,868,800 with the total Federal holding of 122,244, or a 0.3 percent Federal acreage.

Fortunately, the problem was recognized long ago and a man who helped develop—if he did not invent—modern policy is still Arizona's senior U.S. Senator, CARL HAYDEN. This is to be no historical survey: suffice to say that the original Shackleford proposal recognized the need to apportion Federal aid to highways on the threefold basis of population, area, and mileage of post roads. Such a bill was enacted in 1916, providing a total of $75 million for the next 5 years. That sum, of course, was utterly inadequate and more money was pumped in.

The act itself was amended first to include a larger percentage for areas of unappropriated public lands in the public land States and then by Senator HAYDEN to consider as well untaxed Indian lands. That raised the Federal participation in Arizona from a 50–50 basis to a 72–28 basis, and it helped New Mexico and other States as well.

That was primary Federal aid. In the Hayden-Cartwright Act of 1934, aid to secondary roads was specifically earmarked. More recently we have moved into the more publicized Interstate Highway program where Senator GORE prepared a liberal bill and reported it from the Senate Public Works Committee of which the senior Senator from my State, DENNIS CHAVEZ, is chairman. So the West continues its interest in roads and its reliance on the Federal Government for a large share of funds to do the needed work.

I am sure that you have already heard—or will hear from succeeding speakers—all you want to know about roads, but it seems appropriate to suggest that the rising tide of population plus the factor of more rapid growth in the Western States may make all our present plans and standards inadequate.

We have learned that lesson in our American cities. In 1850 only 15 percent of our population lived in our metropolitan areas; but 65 percent lived there by 1950, and that is where most of our future growth will take place. I have mentioned what it meant to housing in Los Angeles, but there isn't a city in the fast-growing West that will not feel the pinch in its transportation problems.

Who knows what road system you will need through and around your cities? Will you be forced to cut off from traffic the heart of your cities? Or can you plan now to make them usable?

Fort Worth has a plan. It now has a population of about half a million, but expects to double that by 1970. What to do? Someone had an idea.

The Fort Worth plan would set aside 15 city blocks for central shopping and install there stores, shops, banks, restaurants, and theaters. There wouldn't be a single car or truck on the surface of that area. Giant parking garages would be developed at lower levels and moving stairways would bring shoppers to the surface. The idea seems to be to keep cars and trucks out so that people may come in.

Have you an idea for your metropolis? Last week a Texas multimillionaire who had just made a big investment in the future of Albuquerque predicted that that city's present population of around 200,000 would reach 2 million by the year 1970.

Can you imagine a population of that order of magnitude in my home town? Can you dream up a plan to serve downtown Albuquerque in that day and generation? Can you foresee the strain on such narrow streets as Copper, Gold, Silver, and Lead, whose very names remind us of our almost-forgotten mining history? I say it will be a problem to convert the traffic lanes of the old cowtown to the freeways of a metropolitan area of even a half million people, and it can only be done with the help of the Federal Government. We simply cannot find money fast enough to match the growth that we know is ahead. The task of finding it is upon the 86th and succeeding Congresses.

And the school problem is like unto that, where the Government owns large tracts of land but moves in huge numbers of people whose families include children of school age, the problem is now greater than the community can bear. Hence the Congress responded to the situation by passing in 1951 Public Law 815 to provide assistance in construction of facilities in these areas and Public Law 874 to pay part of the operating expenses—laws which have been extended from time to time and are now effective until 1962.

Between 1951 and 1958 under Public Law 815, 24 school districts in New Mexico received $26,720,587. In all, 98 building projects were finished containing 986 classrooms for 27,608 children. During the same years, Arizona received $21,886,553. Nationwide for this fiscal year $50 million is to be spent for school construction and $150 million for maintenance and operation of schools in impacted areas under these laws—and there is still need for vast additional sums for Federal aid to education. Senators and Representatives must try to do this badly needed job in the 86th Congress. But that fight is always a tough one. What will we do when the tidal wave of population finally reaches us?

Schools, roads, and then houses. In Los Angeles County alone building permits issued have exceeded a billion dollars a year since 1950. But the new homes create a long list of necessities—shopping centers, office buildings, drive-in banks, doctors' offices, golf courses and other recreational facilities. The trucking business is bound to be good with all the materials that the new cities will require.

Congress keeps on responding: a highway act for roads, aid to education to provide and maintain schools, housing and home finance for new residences, airport assistance so we can travel and land at jet age speeds, and Hill-Burton money to build hospitals when we become ill. No field of expanded endeavor seems able to keep with the pace unless it has aid from the Central Government.

Most of the new projects require water—as do our new habits of living. Recently an eastern newspaper carried a picture of a southwestern residence development with a swimming pool behind every home. That's a new demand for water and it is growing fast. Air conditioning is another claimant. That is why the Interior and Insular Affairs Committees of Congress have before them so many bills which include domestic water supplies, such as the Arkansas-Fryingpan project of Colorado. Water may be the most difficult to supply of all the new needs of the growing West.

So you might be interested to know that about 10 days ago, the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs reported out Senate Resolution 43 which contemplates an exhaustive study of water conditions throughout the United States. We did not concern ourselves with any shortage of water that there might be in the Colorado River and thus bother with a problem that is tied into the lawsuit of Arizona v. California or in any way involves the claims of the lower basin States against the upper basin States in the Colorado River. We know that under present circumstances there is not enough water in the Colorado River to supply all the people who want to use it, but we also know the problem 20 years from now is to be even more formidable.

Does the 86th Congress merely fold its hands and express its regrets? Not at all. There are several rays of sunshine—and we intend to pursue them all.

First, there is the intriguing promise of atomic energy. We raise water to high temperatures when it is used as a coolant in creating electric current from uranium. We need to raise sea water to high temperatures if it is to be made free of salt. Somewhere, somehow we may learn to coordinate the two processes and obtain an abundant supply of both products.

Second, there is the general program of desalinization of salty and brackish waters, and I was happy to be the author of the bill under which the construction of five large plants can now move ahead. The first site is soon to be selected, and there a plant to remove salt from sea water will be built. It offers much to the West. It could remove from many cities the ceiling on population which limited water supplies now threaten to impose. It could in time assure expanding—almost exploding—Los Angeles an unlimited and eternal supply of good water from the Pacific Ocean. Such a realization might remove California from the more active candidates for water from the Colorado River, could then assure a pleasing outcome of the suit between Arizona and California, and as a final byproduct, let Arizona, California, and Nevada tell the upper Colorado River Basin States that the days of fighting over the water of that river might someday be at an end.

Third, there is the possibility of weather control through the seeding of clouds. Congressman CRAIG HOSMER has been a leader in the current program to establish a cloud-seeding project that might add a million acre-feet of water to the Colorado River, and thereby relieve the shortage in the flow of the river below the estimates upon which the Colorado River compact was based.

Considerable quantities of water are still available in the West to meet its needs for several years to come. However, there may be a rearrangement of priorities now assigned to water use.

Edward A. Ackerman, a scientist and water authority attached to the Carnegie Institution in Washington, in January delivered a paper to a symposium on cloud modification and water resources. In it, he wrote:

"Past western irrigation development usually was undertaken in the absence of other seriously competing demands for water * * * there are signs that this situation is changing."

Mr. Ackerman concludes that there are population and industrial demands upon the West's water supply which may reduce the priority of development of water for irrigation. Domestic and industrial uses may become first and second priorities, and irrigation may be third.

However, the 86th Congress again must move ahead with weather control, with money for the desalinization plants, including one for the arid region of the Southwest, with funds for the Atomic Energy Commission which has already had a "feeler" from California on a possible test plant to combine salinity control with electric power, with approval of projects like the San Luis Dam which ultimately might add substantially to the water supply of southern California cities. This is truly the subject of my talk, "Business and the 86th Congress," because business is dependent for its development and continued growth on the availability of funds and programs that mean new homes, schools, roads, hospitals, airports and an adequate supply of water.

As a closing word, may I suggest that the ability of Congress to meet and solve these problems may be somewhat dependent on business itself. Many groups associate themselves with political endeavor. Business, in my experience, has remained a little aloof. Do you think you should? Do you deeply care who goes to Washington? Do you get pleasure or pain when you see and visit with the man you have helped send to the Senate or the House?

Businessmen can worry less about the tasks of the 86th and succeeding Congress, when—if I may steal a business slogan from my greeting card friend Joyce Hall—"When you care enough to send the very best."

DAV Services in Virginia

OF
HON. JOEL T. BROYHILL
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 15, 1959

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, an exceptional record of vital rehabilitation services freely extended to thousands of Virginia citizens has recently come to my attention. These splendid humanitarian services are not sufficiently appreciated by those who have benefited thereby, directly and indirectly.

Among the several congressionally chartered veterans' organizations, which have State departments and local chapters in Virginia, is the Disabled American Veterans. The DAV is the only such organization composed exclusively of those Americans who have been either wounded, gassed, injured or disabled by reason of active service in the Armed Forces of the United States, or of some country allied with it, during time of war.

DAV SETUP

Formed in 1920, under the leadership of Judge Robert S. Marx, DAV legislative activities have very substantially benefited every compensated disabled veteran. Its present national commander is another judge, David B. Williams of Concord, Mass. Its national adjutant is John E. Feighner of Cincinnati, Ohio. Its national legislative director is Elmer M. Freudenberger, its national director of claims, Cicero F. Hogan, and its national director of employment relations, John W. Burris—all located at the DAV National Service Headquarters at 1701 18th Street NW., Washington, D.C.

Inasmuch as less than 10 percent of our country's war veterans are receiving monthly disability compensation payments for service-connected disabilities—some 2 million—the DAV can never aspire to become the largest of the several veterans' organizations. Nevertheless, since shortly after its formation in 1920, the DAV National Headquarters, located in Cincinnati, Ohio, has maintained the largest staff, of any veterans' organization, of full-time trained national service officers, 138 of them, who are located in the 63 regional and 3 district offices of the U.S. Veterans' Administration, and in its central office in Washington, D.C.

They there have ready access to the official claim records of those claimants who have given them their powers of attorney. All of them being war-handicapped veterans themselves, these service officers are sympathetic and alert to the problems of other less well-informed claimants.

DAV SERVICES IN VIRGINIA

The DAV maintains a fulltime national service officer in Virginia. He is Mr. Richard Frazee and his office is located in the VA Regional Office, 211 West Campbell Avenue, Roanoke. The department commander is Charles M. Nightingale, 4301 South Eighth Street, Arlington, and the department adjutant is Arnold H. Sells, 819 South Irving Street, Arlington.

There are three VA hospitals in Virginia in each of which the DAV has a nationally authorized VA voluntary service representative. They are as follows: Dr. Peter Leginus at the 2,000 bed neuropsychiatric hospital at Roanoke; Mr. Garland H. Branch of Ellerson, Va., at the 1,100 bed general and medical hospital at Richmond; and, Mr. Tyler Hatchell of Portsmouth, Va., at the 2,225 bed VA center at Kecoughtan.

During the last fiscal year, the VA paid out $95,396,000 for its veteran program in Virginia, including $24,270,430 disability compensation to its 26,687 service disabled veterans. These Federal expenditures in Virginia furnish substantial purchasing power in all communities. Only about 8 percent, 1,935, are members of the 36 DAV chapters in Virginia.

SERVICE ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE DAV

This 8 percent record is strange, in view of the very outstanding record of personalized service activities and accomplishments of the DAV national service officers in behalf of Virginia veterans and dependents during the last 10 fiscal years, as revealed by the following statistics:

Claimants contacted (estimated)	40,793
Claims folders reviewed	33,994
Appearances before rating boards	15,671
Compensation increases obtained	1,894
Service connections obtained	694
Nonservice pensions	457
Death benefits obtained	69
Total monetary benefits obtained	$984,997.17

The above figures do not include the accomplishments of other national service officers on duty in the Central Office of the Veterans' Administration, handling appeals and reviews, or in its three district offices, handling death and insurance cases. Over the last 10 years, they reported 83,611 claims handled in such district offices, resulting in monetary benefits of $20,850,335.32, and in the central office they handled 58,282 reviews and appeals, resulting in monetary benefits of $5,337,389.05. Proportionate additional benefits were thereby obtained for Virginia veterans, their dependents and their survivors.

SERVICES BEYOND STATISTICS

These figures fail properly to paint the picture of the extent and value of the individualized advice, counsel and assistance extended to all of the claimants who have contacted DAV national service officers in person, by telephone and by letter.

Pertinent advice was furnished to all disabled veterans—only about 10 percent of whom were DAV members—their dependents, and others, in response to their varied claims for service connection, disability compensation, medical treatment, hospitalization, prosthetic appliances, vocational training, insurance, death compensation or pension, VA guaranty loans for homes, farms and businesses, etc. Helpful advice was also given as to counseling and placement into suitable useful employment—to utilize their remaining abilities—civil service examinations, appointments, retentions, retirement benefits, and multifarious other problems.

Every claim presents different problems. Too few Americans fully realize that governmental benefits are not automatically awarded to disabled veterans—not given on a silver platter. Frequently, because of lack of official records, death or disappearance of former buddies and associates, lapse of memory with the passage of time, lack of information and experience, proof of the legal service-connection of a disability becomes extremely difficult—too many times impossible.

A VA Claims and Rating Board can obviously not grant favorable action merely based on the opinions, impressions or conclusions of persons who submit notarized affidavits. Specific, detailed, pertinent facts are essential.

The VA, which acts as judge and jury, cannot properly prosecute claims against itself. As the defendant, in effect, the U.S. Veterans' Administration must award the benefits, provided under the laws administered by it, only under certain conditions.

A DAV national service officer can and does advise a claimant precisely why his claims may previously have been denied and then specifies what additional evidence is essential. The claimant must necessarily bear the burden of obtaining such fact-giving affidavit evidence. The experienced national service officer, will, of course, advise him as to its possible improvement, before presenting same to the ajudication agency, in the light of all of the circumstances and facts, and of the pertinent laws, precedents, Regulations and Schedule of Disability Ratings. No DAV national service officer, I feel certain, ever uses his skill, except in behalf of worthy claimants with justifiable claims.

The VA has denied more claims than it has allowed—because most claims are not properly prepared. It is very significant, as pointed out by the DAV acting national director of claims, Chester A. Cash, that a much higher percentage of those claims, which have been prepared and presented with the aid of a DAV national service officer, are eventually favorably acted upon than is the case as to those claimants who have not given their powers of attorney to any such special advocate.

LOSSES BY REVIEWS

Another fact not generally known is that under the overall review of claims, inaugurated by the VA some 4 years ago, the disability compensation payments of about 37,200 veterans have been discontinued, and reduced as to about 27,300 others, at an aggregate loss to them of more than $28 million per year. About 1 percent of such discontinuances and reductions have probably occurred as to disabled veterans in Virginia with a consequent loss of about $28,000 per year.

Most of these unfortunate claimants were not represented by the DAV or by any other veteran organization. Judging by the past, such unfavorable adjudication will occur as to an additional equal number or more during the next 3 years before such review is completed. I urge every disabled veteran in Virginia to give his power of attorney to the national service officer of the DAV, or of some other veteran organization, or of the American Red Cross, just as a protective measure.

The average claimant who receives helpful advice probably does not realize the background of training and experience of a competent and expert national service officer.

COST OF DAV SERVICES

Measured by the DAV's overall costs of about $12,197,600 during a 10-year period, one would find that it has expended about $3.50 for each claim folder reviewed, or about $8.80 for each rating board appearance, or, again, about $22.70 for each favorable award obtained, or about $123 for each service connection obtained, or about $54 for each compensation increase obtained, and has obtained about $14.10 of direct monetary benefits for claimants for each dollar expended by the DAV for its national service officer setup. Moreover, such benefits will generally continue for many years.

METHODS OF PROVIDING SERVICES

Evidently, most claimants are not aware of the fact that the DAV receives no Government subsidy whatsoever. The DAV is enabled to maintain its nationwide staff of expert national service officers primarily because of income from membership dues collected by its local chapters and from the net income of its Idento-Tag—miniature automobile license tags—project, owned by the DAV and operated by its employees, most of whom are disabled veterans, their wives, or their widows, or other handicapped Americans—a rehabilitation project in thus furnishing them with useful employment. Incidentally, without checking as to whether they had previously made a donation, more than 1,400,000 owners of sets of lost keys have received them back from the DAV's Idento-Tag department, 6,571 of whom during the last 8 years were Virginia residents.

Every eligible veteran, by becoming a DAV member, and by explaining these factors to fellow citizens, can help the DAV to procure such much needed public support as will enable it to maintain its invaluable nationwide service setup on a more adequate basis. So much more could be accomplished for distressed disabled veterans, if the DAV could be enabled, financially, to maintain an expert service officer in every one of the 173 VA hospitals.

MEMORIAL HONOR ROLL

During the last 10 years, the DAV has also relied on appropriations from its separately incorporated trustee, the DAV Service Foundation, aggregating $3,300,000 exclusively for salaries to its national service officers. Its reserves having thus been nearly exhausted, the DAV Service Foundation is therefore very much in need of the generous support of all "serviced" claimants, DAV members and other social-minded Americans—by direct donations, by designations in insurance policies, by bequests in wills, by assignments of stocks and bonds and by establishing special types of trust funds.

A special type of memorial trust fund originated about 3 years ago with concerned disabled veteran members of the DAV chapter in Butte, Mont., which established the first Perpetual Rehabilitation Fund of $1,000 with the DAV Service Foundation to which it recently added another $100. Since then, every DAV unit in that State has established such a special memorial trust fund, ranging from $100 to $1,100, equivalent to about $4 per DAV member—an excellent objective for all other States. Benefactors from 29 States have, up to this time, become enrolled on the memorial honor roll.

Inasmuch as only the interest earnings from special donations will be available for appropriation to the DAV for its use in maintaining its National Service Officer program in the State of residence of each such benefactor, this is an excellent objective also for Virginia. Each such special benefactor is enrolled on a permanent memorial honor roll which, updated, is then included in the annual report of the DAV and of its incorporated trustee, the DAV Service Foundation, to the U.S. Congress.

Each claimant who has received any such free rehabilitation service can help to make it possible for the DAV to continue this excellent rehabilitation service for other distressed disabled veterans and their dependents in Virginia by sending in donations to the DAV Service Foundation, 631 Pennsylvania Avenue NW., Washington, D.C. Every such serviced claimant who is eligible can and should also become a DAV member, preferably a life member, for which the total fee is $100—$50 to those born before January 1, 1902, or World War I veterans—payable in installments within 2 full fiscal year periods.

Every American can help to make our Government more representative by being a supporting member of at least one organization which reflects his interests and viewpoints—labor unions, trade associations and various religious, fraternal, and civic associations. All of America's veterans ought to be members of one or more of the patriotic, service-giving veterans' organizations. All of America's disabled defenders, who are receiving disability compensation, have greatly benefited by their own official voice—the DAV. I consider it a privilege and an honor to belong to the Disabled American Veterans.

Community Enterprise at Grassroots Builds Portland, Oreg., Zoo Railway

OF
HON. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 15, 1959

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, many of us in the Federal Government are continually encouraging action at the grassroots level to combat juvenile delinquency, to provide healthful recreation, and to stimulate interest in scientific and technical devlopments.

All three of these goals have been attained by my home community of Portland, Oreg., in its construction and expansion of the Portland Zoo Railway, which will be the most elaborate and farflung recreation railroad ever built in our land.

The city government, business firms, labor unions, schools, and civic organizations all have cooperated to launch this undertaking. In addition, some 20,000 local people have purchased shares of stock in the enterprise; many of these are children, making an investment for the first time in their lives.

Business Week magazine for March 28, 1959, has published a most comprehensive and thorough description of the history of the Portland Zoo Railway. Furthermore, I myself wrote an article about this extraordinary project for the issue of Railway Progress magazine of January 1958, under the title "Portland Builds a Railroad." The Business Week article is entitled "A Railroad So Popular It Must Expand."

Indeed, expansion has occurred even since the Business Week article was printed. The vast Weyerhaeuser Timber Corp. has agreed to build a fire train for the Portland Zoo Railroad system, which traverses magnificent stands of fir and cedar forests. The Portland Trust Bank has loaned $20,000 to the Portland Zoological Society for enlargement of the railway, and no security was demanded. Charles Francis Adams, president of the bank, has described the action as welcome because his institution desires loans which are good for the customer, good for the community and good for the bank. A loan to the Zoo Railway is in that category.

The 104th Infantry Division, of the U.S. Army Reserves, has agreed to construct two-thirds of a mile of track for the Zoo Railway at the Oregon Centennial Exhibition and Trade Fairgrounds, for this is a prime feature of our State's 100th year. The commander of the division, Brig. Gen. Eugene Cushing, will bring 200 men to tackle the job as a training exercise. General Cushing is arranging for division chaplains to conduct Catholic and Protestant services to be held at the centennial rail track site Sunday, April 19.

Advising and assisting the soldiers in the track laying will be executives of the railroads serving Portland: The Southern Pacific, Northern Pacific, Union Pacific, Great Northern, Spokane, Portland & Seattle Railway, Northern Pacific Terminal Co., and Portland Traction Co. These rail men will be led by John H. Jones, manager of the Northern Pacific Terminal and president of the Portland Zoo Railway.

Assisting also will be members of the Construction and General Laborers' Union, Local 320, and the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way, AFL–CIO.

Approximately 3,000 crossties have been donated to the Portland Zoo Railway by the Templeton Lumber Co. of Portland, of which Herbert A. Templeton is the president and moving spirit. This was arranged by Bert Thomas, vice president of the Valsetz Lumber Co., a division of the Templeton lumber holdings. They will be loaded in freight cars and hauled without charge to Independence, Oreg. From that point the Portland Zoo Railway will bring them to Portland.

The Oregon Building Congress, a group of contractors, suppliers, labor leaders, architects, engineers, and others interested in the building industry have voted to join with the Portland Zoo Railway in designing and building a 250-foot trestle bridge over a scenic ravine north of the new bear grottoes. This bridge, supported by two large wood arches, will be 40 feet above a series of pools housing waterfowl. The bridge will provide a truly beautiful and spectacular feature of the Portland Zoo Railway route. Completion of the bridge, a part of the Washington Park line, is slated for August 1, 1959.

I have cited all these accomplishments and donations, Mr. President, because they demonstrate what can be attained at the local level by public-spirited people, whether they are in industry and management or in the ranks of trade unions and organized labor.

So that a record may be compiled of the unselfish and altruistic community interest in the Portland Zoo Railway, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the article published in Business Week of March 28, 1959, on this unique project and my own article published approximately 1 year earlier in the pages of Railway Progress on the same general subject.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Business Week, Mar. 28, 1959]

A RAILROAD SO POPULAR IT MUST EXPAND

From the Aberdeen & Rockfish to the Zug Island Road, it takes 14 columns of fine print to index all the transportation lines whose vital statistics appear in the fat monthly Official Guide of the Railways. Nowhere in the list, though, is the Portland Zoo Railway, despite the fact that in the Portland, Oreg., union station, its emblem enjoys equal prominence with those of the five major railroads serving the city.

The Zooline, a strikingly uncommon carrier that's an exception to almost every contemporary railroad rule, currently traverses half a mile of realistic 30-inch gage track in the new municipal zoo at Portland. More roadbed and rolling stock are soon to come.

OPPOSITES

It sounds slightly Lilliputian, yet in its own small way the Zooline represents an achievement to make the harried brass of the class I roads take note.

While most railroads are disconsolately dropping runs or ripping up track altogether, the Zooline is aggressively laying new iron and ordering new equipment, to add to a system that first went into operation only last June.

Against an earnings picture of the most unmitigated gloom on the grownup roads, the Zooline figured 1958 revenues at $9.70 a mile, though its accounting procedures might not pass muster with an ICC auditor.

While more and more of the rails advertise "freight service only," the Portland Zooline is designed exclusively for the delight of passengers.

PITCHING IN

The effort that went into creating Portland's Zoo Railway had all the community participation of an oldtime small town quilting bee, though Portland, at 404,000 population within the city limits alone, is far out of the quilting bee class. Businessmen donated cash and time, industrialists contributed facilities and manpower, and ordinary citizens even doubled as "gandy dancers" to pound spikes and set rails.

The same spirit is continuing as the line expands and as it ties in with next summer's celebration of the Oregon Centennial, the 100th anniversary of statehood.

HOW IT BEGAN

At the outset, the railroad was only an incidental feature of the plans for Portland's new zoo, for which the city's voters approved a $4 million bond issue in May 1954. The new zoo was to replace a cramped, moth-eaten layout, and mainly because the sponsoring Portland Zoological Society included one or two rail buffs, the budget included $25,000 for a recreational railroad.

From the beginning, perhaps the prime mover has been 53-year-old Edward M. Miller, assistant managing editor of the Oregonian, Portland daily, and a quietly ardent aficionado of the rails.

Miller's first step was to arrange a study of recreational railroads in operation all around the country—from Seattle to Spartanburg, S.C., Sunbury, Pa., and St. Louis. The findings: Most lines were both popular and profitable especially those elaborate enough to appeal to adults as well as children.

WIDENING PLANS

This report contributed to the decision that a $25,000 toy train such as usually featured in zoos just wouldn't do for Portland. Anyway, Miller and cronies felt a bigger layout would be more suitable for the hilly, fir-studded terrain on which the zoo was to be built.

About this time, Miller cautioned the zoo architects that eventually they would be designing the zoo to fit the railroad, rather than vice versa. "They laughed when we first warned them about that," recalls Miller, "but they soon stopped."

BABY AEROTRAIN

After a design competition among Portland architects and engineering firms, rail planners selected a proposal from Northwest Marine Iron Works, a maker of sawmill and heavy machinery and heavy marine engines. Northwest Marine's staff included a mechanical engineer, John Flaschner, with experience in rail equipment manufacturing in his native Hungary. Flaschner worked up drawings for train roughly half the size of an ordinary passenger train, to run on 30-in.-gage track (standard gage: 56½ in.).

The diesel locomotive was a scaled-down version of General Motors' experimental Aerotrain, and it was to trail four passenger cars topped with clear plastic for unobstructed views. Inside, there would be room for 99 adults or 132 children.

To go along with the train, the zoo architects shuffled bear pits and monkey houses to provide room ultimately for 6,460 feet of right-of-way through the grounds, with tunnels, trestles, stations, a shop, and sidings. All told, train and track, the system would cost $280,000.

HELP WANTED

Northwest Marine agreed to build the train at cost, and a Portland fabricator, Hirschberger Sheet Metal Co., went to work making the locomotive and car bodies.

It was an ambitious program, considering that originally only $25,000 had been allocated for the Zooline. But Miller and Stewart H. Holbrook, Portland author, already had a plan. Forming the Portland Zoo Railway Co., they invited brass of regional railroads to lunch and made their pitch. "Railroads are becoming more and more a legend in the popular mind, less and less a living reality," said Miller. "Why not help us build in Portland a recreational railroad for children which they will never forget?"

Railroad executives are traditionally conservative, but the Portland group was moved by Miller's plea. To work with the Zooline, they tapped Jack H. Jones, manager of Northern Pacific Terminal Co., jointly owned by Northern Pacific, Southern Pacific, and Union Pacific, which runs Portland's passenger station and surrounding yards.

MAN OF ACTION

Jones took over as president of the Zoo Railway. At the time, there was doubt whether the initial stretch of track—half a mile with loops at each end, to make a one-half ride—could be finished in time for the proposed opening in June 1958.

The Terminal Co. shops turned out two 30-inch-gage cars for a work train. Miller and Jones found a 30-inch-gage diesel logging engine rusting in the yard of Portland Machinery Co. With a new cab and a coat of red paint, the diesel became "Casey Pioneer" and started hauling the work train.

Then Jones organized "Gandy Dancer Day," with hundreds of Portlanders volunteering to help lay track. The pace still wasn't fast enough; so crews of real-life gandy dancers quietly appeared.

Jones also recruited other railroad brass to the Zooline. Frank Landsburg, an ICC inspector, became safety director—and, thanks to his official Government inspection, brought a big reduction in liability insurance rates. Other volunteer executives flocked to the Zooline from the Southern Pacific, Union Pacific, Northern Pacific, Great Northern, and Spokane, Portland & Seattle.

MORE TRACK

No sooner was the Zooliner first in operation than attention turned to an extension through virgin timber along steep slopes, with spectacular views, to the city's Washington Park, which adjoins the new zoo tract. There wasn't any money to pay for it, but the Southern Pacific donated 40 engineering man-days to map a route. Then the Spokane, Portland & Seattle provided a detailed engineering study worth $5,000. James Yost, Inc., general contractors, volunteered to do the work for just the cost of labor.

To begin meeting Yost's weekly payroll, the Zooline started issuing stock—at $1 a share, offering as dividend two free rides when the extension was complete. Bartenders in all of Portland's taverns wore engineer's caps and peddled the stock to patrons; schoolchildren canvassed neighborhoods.

FREE BALLAST

The Cinder Hill Co., of Prineville, Oreg., gave 2,500 yards of ballast, which the railroads hauled to Portland free in cars loaded by Prineville and neighboring Redmond children. In return, every youngster in grade schools of the two cities got a free share of Zooline stock.

With all this help the Zooline finished the right-of-way and laid almost 3,700 feet of track on the extension before winter rains halted work.

CENTENNIAL TRAIN

The next scheme was a train for the 100-day Oregon Centennial next summer. At the celebration it would bring revenue to the Zooline; later, the rolling stock could be used on the Washington Park route.

For this train, George Burton, a service-repair supervisor in a Portland radio, TV, and music store and a leader of rail-fan groups, is building a replica of a classic old steam locomotive from authentic drawings. Fellow rail buffs are helping in the labor, and all of Portland's foundries are contributing parts. Five cars similar to those on the first Zooliner are under construction at Northwest Marine Iron Works and Hirschberger.

To cope with an expected flood of passengers, the Zooline plans to put still another train on its home track by summer—this one built around the Casey Pioneer work locomotive. Hirschberger is doing the job for $6,000—"cash when he catches us," says Miller.

BONANZA

Miller is still sketchy about where all the money will come from, but he exudes confidence nonetheless—as well he might, from the results of the original Zooliner's first 80 days of operation last summer.

The figures are such as few professional railroaders ever see: in 80 days 107,000 paying passengers and a net profit of $5.61 per mile on revenues of $21,339. Even though this doesn't take into account capital costs, depreciation, or all the free services, it still gives the Zooline every reason to believe its passenger business is here to stay.

PORTLAND BUILDS A RAILROAD

(By RICHARD L. NEUBERGER)

In his recent autobiography, Bernard M. Baruch, adviser to Presidents, has told how the sight of expresses and fast freights highballing through his native Camden, S.C., invariably instilled in him a youthful desire to be the owner of the Southern Railway.

My own boyhood ambitions followed a more modest scale. Watching Union Pacific, Southern Pacific, and Great Northern Mallets coping with our rugged Oregon mountain grades, I decided that sometime I might qualify to be a brakeman, conductor, or even an engineer.

These yearnings, alas, always remained unrequited. For one reason or another, I never became a railroader. Now, however, there is to be some belated measure of compensation. At the ripe old age of 44, I have been invited to serve on the board of directors of a railroad. Even though it is of only 30-inch gage, the blare of air horns trills in my ears and the smell of diesel fumes twitches my nostrils. Despite the railroad's projected total length of a mere 2½ miles, I already feel the earth quavering to the rumble of its locomotives. Perhaps the personal satisfaction is so great because this railroad will carry the most precious cargo of all—children.

My home city of Portland, Oreg., where I was born and raised, is undertaking to build and operate the most elaborate and picturesque home-sized railroad yet planned anywhere in the United States. It will be part of a brand-new zoo in the city's fir-mantled hills, so our system is officially known as the Portland Zoo Railway Co.

No railroad, large or small, was ever more of a community project. Leading citizens are raising funds for its completion. Railroad management and labor in the Portland area are contributing both work and materials, as well as general operating wisdom and know-how. Manufacturing firms are producing the motive power and rolling stock at cost. This spontaneous voluntary effort has been necessary because Portland, a city of 400,000 residents, is constructing a zoo rail route far more elaborate than that ever attempted by metropolitan centers with 10 or 12 times Portland's population.

To begin with, the 30-inch gage is no toy. Railway Progress has reported that jungle products of India and Ceylon are hauled on some 2,000 miles of actual operating railroads of this slender width. Furthermore, the 2½ miles of Portland Zoo trackage, while no threat to the Pennsylvania or Santa Fe in length, will actually outdistance the only other two major recreational systems in the country which might be considered its rivals—Disneyland, near Los Angeles, and the Detroit Zoo railroad.

The first stage of the Portland Zoo Railway is now nearing completion. This is 1¼ miles of track looping around the new zoo, plus a sweep to be added through primitive forests of conifer trees and up the ramparts of a wooded canyon. As income is collected at the ticket office, another 1¼ miles will be thrust into the most densely timbered solitudes which stockade the city limits of any community in the United States.

The train penetrating these scenic surroundings will be of substantial proportions. The locomotive, patterned generally after General Motors' Aerotrain, will haul three streamlined coaches and a club car in which soft drinks and ice cream can be served. Each car will have a capacity of 24 adults or 32 children. Length of the entire train will be 112 feet, 9 inches. The 24-foot locomotive will weigh 12,000 pounds and develop 140 horsepower. It will be held by a governor to a maximum speed of 15 miles an hour, because some of the track will go over high viaducts or along the sides of steep ravines. Dead-man controls will bring the train to an automatic stop in the event of sudden emergencies.

Perhaps because children all over the State of Oregon are thrilled with the prospective completion of their railroad, high-priced talent has been put at the disposal of the Portland Zoo Railway Co. on either a volunteer or at-cost basis.

Certain unusual aspects of this extraordinary little railroad have required that the train be built locally. Portland's damp climate, refreshed with rainstorms from the Aleutians, called for cars with glass roofs of the vista-dome variety rather than the open-type coaches in vogue at California's sunny amusement parks. The spectacular but hazardous right-of-way dictated a gage wide enough to eliminate dangerous spills. Interviews with small fry ruled out locomotives which looked like steamers. "We want diesel streamliners," said they and it was evident from their tones that anything less would have an adverse influence upon patronage.

So the zoo train is being constructed in Portland, according to these and other special stipulations. An iron works and a sheet-metal company are combining to handle the job on a nonprofit basis. Cost to the zoo fund will be approximately $60,000. If the train were manufactured by Northwest Marine Iron Works and Hirschberger Sheet Metal along conventional fiscal lines, the expenditure would amount to at least $100,000. Locomotive and cars have been designed by a rail enthusiast named John Flaschner, who fled to America from the tyrants and barbarians invading his native Hungary. In Budapest he had worked as an engineer for a firm building trains for the export market. Rolling stock which took shape on Flaschner's drafting board is still in service on South American and African railroad lines.

With such men as Flaschner placing their talents at the disposal of the little zoo railroad, help began to come from other sources. L. R. Smith, Portland superintendent of the Southern Pacific's extensive operations in Oregon, put one of his regular survey crews to work locating the right of way for the extension through the stately forests surrounding the zoo. This spared the fund of the children's railroad at least $1,500. A manufacturing firm in distant Los Angeles agreed to fabricate the switch frogs for the entire system without any payment at all, which represented a saving of $1,000. Bricklayers from the building trades unions put trowel and mortar to thousands of bricks at the zoo while foregoing their wages, and much of the building material was presented as a gift by local suppliers.

Two men have been principally responsible for organizing this kind of participation. One is J. H. (Jack) Jones, manager of the Northern Pacific Terminal Co., who serves as president of the Zoo Railway. The other is Edward M. Miller, assistant managing editor of the Portland Oregonian, the newspaper which recently won a Pulitzer prize for exposing alleged criminal elements in certain labor unions. Miller, one of the mayor's civic appointees to the Portland Zoo Commission, is a zealous railfan who would rather travel by train than via Cinderella's coach-and-four. Before the first bulldozer ever had cleared ground for a bear pit or tiger grotto, he decided that the majestic terrain was ideal for America's finest recreation railway. To make this possible in spite of the limited population and financial resources of the community, Miller had to enlist an immense quantity of volunteer skills and equipment.

The newspaper executive rallied to his cause Jack Jones and other local railroaders by stressing one theme consistently. "Look," Miller would tell them, "fewer people every year have direct contact with railroads, as travel by airplane and private automobile increases. This means railroads are becoming more and more of a legend in the popular mind, less and less a living reality. Yet trains have great dramatic impact on people. Why not help us build in Portland a recreational railroad for children which they will never forget? It not only will have a profound effect in our own State of Oregon, which is an important source of raw materials to be hauled eastward, but its fame will radiate throughout the land. And the children thus thrilled and entertained will some day be the shippers of this country's freight. * * *"

"I decided Ed Miller was about 200 percent right," said Jack Jones, "and that's why I agreed to become president of the Zoo Railway. I also decided that, if I were the head of a big system myself, I would endow children's lines in zoos and parks all over the United States, with the colors and emblems of my own particular system very much in evidence. What better way to make an impression on the next generation of Americans?"

As head of the Northern Pacific Terminal Co., Jones would have to feature a chameleon's multiple colors to please all his bosses. The system, which operates 100 miles of track in or near Portland's Union Station, is owned jointly by the Union Pacific, Southern Pacific, and Northern Pacific Railroads. When the Portland Zoo picked up $4,000 at the Oregon State Fair in Salem with an exhibition, Jones provided one of his railroad-section gang crews to erect and dismantle the zoo's tents. He also persuaded the Spokane, Portland & Seattle Railway to haul to the fair the first car fabricated for the zoo train.

Another railroad celebrity whom Ed Miller has recruited for the forested zoo system is Stewart H. Holbrook, the noted Oregon author who specializes in books about Americans and American folklore. One of his most heralded volumes, "The Story of American Railroads," has been a persistent seller ever since it was first published in 1946. Holbrook, who will be chairman of the board of the railroad, contemplates an imposing list of officials, ranging from general superintendent to chief of redcaps. These will stem predominantly from the ranks of railway management and labor in Oregon.

Although all of these individuals long ago grew to manhood, they are deriving great nostalgia at present from seeking a name for the zoo train and an official medallion for the zoo railroad. Designer Flaschner favors Bluebird for the domeliner which will swoop through the fir glades. The first medallion featured a jolly elephant in an engineer's visored cap. This drew some frowns from the Democrats on the board of directors, so a frolicking Bengal tiger was substituted instead. "Anyway," rationalized one of the Democrats defensively, "tigers are cousins of cougars, which are indigenous to Oregon, while elephants don't have a solitary kin among the wildlife of our State."

On June 1, 1958, the most lovingly-created zoo train ever to operate in America will make the inaugural pilgrimage over a recreational route without scenic counterpart anywhere in our Nation. Youthful passengers in the club car of the Bluebird will order their first root beers and Eskimo pies. Some lucky youngster will ride the fireman's strategic seat—at an extra cost of $1 from dad's wallet. Small young faces will dot the glass-enclosed vistadomes as the hillsides and evergreens fleet past.

But the real fun will be enjoyed by all of us adults who watch proudly from the station platform.

Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Death of George Frederick Handel

OF
HON. EDWARD P. BOLAND
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 15, 1959

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, German contribution to modern civilization has been great, and innumerable Germans have added immensely to what is commonly called Western civilization. Germans have been particularly outstanding in the sciences, but no less distinguished have they been in the arts, especially in music. And Handel is one of the giants in the world of music.

George Frederick Handel, who died exactly 200 years ago at the ripe age of 74, was the son of a barber-surgeon in Halle, Lower Saxony, who by his unusual talents and through ceaseless industry gained immortal renown as a composer. At the age of 20 he produced his first opera, "Almira," one of a series of great operas culminating in the "Messiah" and "Israel in Egypt" which together have long placed him among the foremost of great composers of his time. Even today he is considered one of the greatest composers of all time.

The celebration of the 200th anniversary of Handel's death evokes many memories, and recalls historic events in German history, but we can hardly forget the importance of current international events connected with Germany. Indeed, the Berlin situation, the even larger issue of German unification, and the matter of strengthening the Western democracies in their fight against Soviet totalitarianism, are issues that the West cannot hope to solve without the wholehearted cooperation of the German people. On this 200th anniversary of Handel's death let us preserve the freedom of West Berlin in a manner demonstrated by President Truman in 1948–49, let us work for a united, free, and democratic Germany, and let us work for closer cooperation among all freedom-loving peoples of Western democracies.

Steps Toward World Order

OF
HON. JOHN A. CARROLL OF COLORADO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 15, 1959

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address on the subject "Steps Toward World Order," delivered by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] before the University of Virginia Law School, at Charlottesville, Va., on March 12, 1959.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STEPS TOWARD WORLD ORDER

(Speech by Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY before the University of Virginia Law School, Charlottesville, Va., March 12, 1959)

In these dark times when crisis is piled upon crisis, it is easy to lose heart, to give up hope. The Berlin crisis is bristling with complex and knotty problems. It is perhaps the most serious situation we have faced since V–J Day. The Formosan crisis has quieted down, but has not disappeared. And there is always a crisis of one kind or another in the turbulent Middle East.

With every crisis there are dangers and risks. But there are also opportunities and responsibilities. I have not lost hope for a more enduring peace, and I believe the American people have not lost hope. We must keep hope alive. Genuine hope. Not hope based upon wishful thinking, but tempered with a realistic understanding of the world we live in.

A few months ago I was in Moscow and Berlin. It was an unforgettable experience. I have a firsthand knowledge of some of the vexing problems we face. But I have not surrendered the gift of hope which gives men the courage to press on, the vision to see beyond the encircling gloom a better world.

Genuine hope does not permit us to escape the present into some utopian future of our dreams. Genuine hope helps us to come to grips with the present in the name of the future and out of respect for the values of the past. Evil triumphs when good men fail to act.

Tonight I want to talk about some steps we can take toward greater peace and order in the world. I say steps, plural, not one giant step. This may disappoint some of you, but I am convinced that new institutions and laws are not achieved in one giant step. Great preparation and even suffering precedes the birth of new forms, new ways of doing things. History teaches not to expect drastic changes overnight.

The pace of history does not discourage me. If the goal is clear and if we take genuine steps in the right direction, I am confident that our efforts will be rewarded.

The many-faceted challenge of communism today demands bold action to meet the economic, political, and military threat of the Soviet Union and Red China. Only bold steps will be equal to the challenge of the "revolution of rising expectations" in Asia and Africa. Timidity is the counsel of despair.

THE HUNDRED YEARS OF PEACE: 1815–1914

Before I suggest some specific steps toward greater world order, I would like to say a word about a remarkable period of modern history, a period which may hold some lessons for us today. I refer to the century spanned by the end of the War of 1812 to the outbreak of World War I, which some historians have referred to as "the hundred years of peace." More accurately, it was a century when there were no general wars and a considerable degree of world order prevailed. The balance of power among the European states made a measure of stability possible. No single European power could aspire to world domination. Great Britain, with its firm control of the seas, acted as a check on the ambitions of any of the European landpowers.

England was neither strong enough, nor did she aspire to dominate the European continent. She acted as a balance wheel. Through this delicate balance stability was maintained for an entire century.

On the economic side, this century of peace was a great period of industrial development in many parts of the world. International trade was stimulated by the acceptance of the gold standard. And the London capital market provided the funds through which large portions of the world, including these United States, were developed.

The principles of Anglo-Saxon law and political institutions, based upon the concept of public responsibility, spread to the far corners of the earth. Everywhere people were beginning to learn, at least theoretically, the meaning of the democratic principle of government by the consent of the governed.

During this remarkable century wars were limited both geographically and in their political objectives. In this country we had a tragic Civil War. But there was no general war. And no tyrant rose to conquer the world or even any large portion of it.

World War I shattered the hundred years of peace and economic development, and destroyed the fragile and elementary forms of world order created in the 19th century. This order was never really reestablished in the long weekend between Versailles and Pearl Harbor.

What can we learn from this century of peace? Is it too different from our present century to teach us anything? Our times are different, in some ways vastly different. Yet, I believe there are three very important things we can learn from the 100 years of peace:

1. Power must be exercised with responsibility.
2. Peace is possible.
3. Peace must be planned.

First, power must be exercised with responsibility. The key to the 100 years of stability was the responsible exercise of British power. Britain held the balance in Europe and through her navy throughout the world. She carried her power with restraint and with a sense of moral responsibility. She did not seek to enslave or to make the world over in her image. I am not suggesting that her Britannic Majesty was a paragon of virtue, but I am suggesting that Great Britain exercised her decisive power with wisdom and restraint.

The mantle of world leadership which Britain wore in the 19th century has in this century fallen upon our shoulders. The key to peace and order in our century, insofar as we have control over the situation, is the wise and responsible exercise of U.S. power. I am not suggesting for a moment a new imperialism, and American century, but rather a recognition that we should have a sense of responsibility commensurate with our wealth and power. This responsibility, in our interdependent world, must be widely shared, through instruments such as the United Nations, NATO, and other multilateral arrangements in the political, economic, and military spheres.

The destiny of Western civilization and the peace of the world may well depend upon Americas' ability to use her wealth and power not only to defend herself, but to create a world of greater peace and justice for all men.

Second, we must believe that peace is possible. If we believe that peace is not possible, we would be among the most miserable of men. Although we are today challenged by a powerful, committed, and relentless foe and the specter of nuclear destruction hangs menacingly over our heads, I still believe we can avoid war and that peace is possible. I have worked and I will continue to work on this belief.

Third, peace must be planned, worked for, sacrificed for. Peace is not an accident, a gift from the gods or a happenstance. Peace is a difficult goal, an elusive goal. Peace must be waged. We must work for peace even as we keep up our defensive shield. Waging peace is no substitute for an adequate defense posture. Nor is an adequate defense posture a substitute for waging peace. The world of 1959 does not confer upon us the luxury of choosing between waging peace and maintaining our defensive strength. We must do both, and we must do each task with as much imagination, creativity and wisdom as we can muster.

THREE STEPS WE CAN TAKE NOW

There is no magic key—no easy way—to world order, no master plan that will assure us of peace in our time. Perhaps I should amend this statement by saying there is no master plan which lies within the realm of the politically possible. Bismarck once said that "politics is the art of the possible." He was right, although there is room for disagreement on what is in fact possible. You will recall that in one of the Federalist Papers, the writer (I believe it was Madison) said that if all men were angels, then we would not need the checks and balances which the Founding Fathers regarded as essential to sound government. But since men are men and not angels, said Madison, we need the checks and balances which prevent one interest or one branch of government from taking over.

Given a world of imperfect men and nations, I maintain there is no master plan that will end conflicts of interest and erase all hostility. Nevertheless, there are steps, important steps we can take which will move us along on the path to a more secure and peaceful world. These steps will help to accomplish in this century the stability and order which was achieved in the 19th century.

Some of the greatest opportunities lie in the economic realm, especially in the areas of international trade and economic development. We need present-day counterparts to the gold standard which facilitated trade and the London capital market which provided development funds in many areas throughout the world. The International Monetary Fund and GATT (the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs) are in a real sense the counterpart to the gold standard. The International Bank for Reconstruction (World Bank), the point 4 program, the Columbo plan, and other similar instruments are the counterpart to the London capital market.

In the military sphere NATO and other free world alliances are the counterpart to the balance achieved by British naval power.

I merely mention the economic and military aspects in passing.

I thought I would like to confine my remarks to the political sphere. In the political sphere we can take three positive steps:

1. Work for effective arms control with inspection.
2. Strengthen the United Nations and world law.
3. Make fuller use of the World Court.

1. Work for effective arms control with inspection: Peace and a more stable world order can scarcely be attained if nations are constantly developing postures of hostility toward each other. Demands by one great power that another great power surrender some valuable position, loud and repeated threats of annihilation if demands are not met, all backed up by a feverish race to concoct new weapons and amass them in ever growing stockpiles—these developments do not create an atmosphere conducive to a more just and peaceful international order.

This is why steps toward disarmament now are so important to mankind's hopes for peace. We must act, even if only a small step is possible. The failure to act is to act negatively.

For years the United States and its allies planned and worked for disarmament with grandiose plans which covered the whole range of military defense and that envisaged comprehensive machinery of administration and control. We learned gradually the futility of this approach. We lowered our sights to more realistic goals, and we have now arrived at a point where we are seeking to conclude a first-stage or a partial disarmament agreement. Complete disarmament all at one stroke need not and cannot be obtained. What we should have, and must have, is a limited agreement, that will help deflect the world from its present hazardous course. Once course has been changed, there will be ample time and opportunity to pursue the larger goals toward which we aspire.

The conclusion of an agreement to suspend nuclear weapons tests with inspection, or to install an inspection system to prevent surprise attack in some region of the world would be a small, first-step agreement of great value for initiating a new trend in world affairs. Either one of these agreements would slow down or perhaps even halt the forward momentum of the arms race. Once the fever of competition has been lowered, sanity and reason can then operate more freely in our quest for peace with justice.

Within the past year progress has been made toward conclusion of a first-stage agreement. Negotiations for a ban on nuclear weapons tests have advanced to an extent scarcely hoped for this time a year ago.

Last summer the Soviet Union suddenly accepted our Government's invitation to hold a technical conference on devising methods of inspection in order to guarantee fulfillment of any international agreement for suspending nuclear weapons tests. This conference of scientific experts from the Communist bloc and the prinicipal Western Powers was convened at Geneva. By the end of last August it issued conclusions concurred in by both sides. This was an unprecedented step in the history of postwar disarmament negotiations. For the first time Soviet and Western representatives had seen eye to eye, and had agreed on the technicial details of an international arms control and inspection system.

It is necessary to recognize what these Geneva conclusions were and were not. They were not in themselves an agreement to suspend nuclear weapons tests. They were, however, an aid, a spur, and a necessary basis for any such future agreement.

Last spring immediately after concluding a very intensive series of nuclear tests, which shot a large barrage of radioactive debris into the atmosphere encircling the globe, the U.S.S.R. announced to the world that she was unilaterally suspending nuclear weapons tests. She further announced that she would continue such a suspension provided the United States and Great Britain, the other two nuclear powers, would do the same. This was a clever maneuver, but it was not clever enough.

The primary aim of this unilateral and conditional suspension was to impress world opinion. To a degree it succeeded. But the more perceptive people around the world knew that the Soviet plan would have resulted in a suspension of tests without effective inspection. Such a suspension would have been worse than no suspension at all, because there would have been no guarantee that one side was not cheating. Under such conditions, fear, suspicion, and tension would have increased and not abated.

The United States wisely pressed ahead with its endeavor to obtain an internationally agreed termination of testing, backed up and safeguarded by an effective inspection system.

Immediately after the close of the Geneva conference of experts, the United States invited the Soviet Union to a political conference. The purpose of the second conference was to work out a test ban which would utilize the technical and scientific foundation reached at Geneva. The United States said she would suspend her tests for 1 year provided the Soviet Union would do the same. This would allow time for the political conference to hammer out an agreement.

The conclusions of the Geneva conference of experts confined themselves strictly to scientific matters of a politically nonsensitive nature. They indicated the number of inspection stations and the kinds of inspection instruments and procedures that should be adopted for an effective control system, but they did not go into such controversial matters as to where the inspection stations should be located, who should man them, or what powers the control administration should exercise. These were questions to be thrashed out at the political conference.

The Geneva political conference on suspending nuclear weapons tests has now been at work for about 4 months. When Mr. George Kennan testified before the Senate Subcommittee on Disarmament early this month, he stressed that one of the main obstacles in the way of an arms understanding with the U.S.S.R. is its philosophy and tradition of secrecy. This has been one of the main stumbling blocks on the road to any reliable arms control agreement in the postwar period, and it is one of the main obstacles to success in the current Geneva negotiations.

To be reliable, arms control inspection must be genuinely international. National self-inspection is not genuine inspection, and self-inspection is essentially what the Soviet Union has been insisting upon at Geneva. Control stations under the Geneva experts plan would be located in each participating country to check on its activities. But the Soviet has been saying, "These control stations must be manned by nationals of the country wherein they are located." Communist Russians would be checking up on Communist Russians, according to this plan, and it is not difficult to see that Americans will not stake their security, or survival, on such paper promises.

The United States and Britain, in contrast, have taken the position that stations should be manned by outside nationalities, so that the resulting surveillance is truly international, mutual and reciprocal. These opposing views on inspection are responsible for the deadlock at the present moment. This is a point on which the Soviet Union must make a substantial concession if there is to be an effective and dependable inspection network.

Another crucial point of issue in the negotiations is the amount of authority that should be vested in the countries administering the control commission. The Soviet Union insists that there should be unanimity among the major powers on the control authority to make major decisions. In other words, the Soviet negotiators want a veto over the control authority. The American and British position, however, is that at least certain important decisions on the functioning of the control mechanism should not be subject to a one-nation veto, but should be reached by a majority vote.

If, for example, the inspection stations recorded an event that might be an underground nuclear test it would be necessary to send inspectors immediately to the location to investigate. "On the spot" inspection of this type is very vital to the effective functioning of the entire control system, otherwise the purpose of inspection could be frustrated and a violator of the agreement might readily escape the consequences of his violation.

The United States says, "This kind of decision cannot be blocked by a veto." The Soviet Union says, "This kind of decision must be subject to a veto, or it is a violation of sovereign rights."

Soviet intransigence is again responsible for the deadlock on this point. Unless the Moscow government modifies this position, it will be impossible to have an effective and dependable inspection system.

The issue of international inspection in the Geneva disarmament negotiations highlights one of the most significant potential contributions of disarmament to the cause of peace and harmony in the world today. If I had to single out any one factor as the main barrier to peace in the world today, I would point my finger at the Iron Curtain, or in other words the barrier of secrecy and isolation which the Soviet Union has erected between its own people and the outside world.

International inspection for suspension of nuclear weapons tests would pierce this barrier in an unprecedented way. The political effect of getting an international authority into the silent and secret land of the Soviets would be inestimable.

I am dedicated to national security. I believe our defenses should be strong in order to back up our international negotiations and commitments. We arm to parley, we develop strength in order to negotiate as well as to deter attack, limited or general.

We must arm and at the same time strive to turn back the tide of fear that is engendered by the mounting arms race. We must make a start somewhere in tearing down the veils of secrecy that breed mistrust and suspicion between the Communist and free worlds. An agreement to end nuclear weapons tests, backed up by an effectively functioning inspection system within the participating nations, would be a significant step in the direction of world peace and order.

2. Strengthen the United Nations. The United Nations is a continuing conference of over 80 sovereign states. It is a limited instrument. But it is a valuable instrument. The United Nations can be used, abused, or ignored by its member states, and it would not be difficult to cite examples of these three attitudes toward it.

I believe the U.N. can be strengthened through a fuller use of its peacemaking and peacekeeping facilities. The member states can make a contribution to greater world order by participating in the long-range economic and humanitarian activities of the U.N. which help to weave the fabric of peace and understanding. I refer to the Children's Fund, the World Health Organization, UNESCO, the U.N. technical assistance program, FAO, and other essentially nonpolitical activities carried on under the aegis of the world organization.

I favor the fullest possible cooperation of our Government with other nations in the great problem of assisting economically the less developed areas of the world.

In the peacekeeping or political sphere, I believe the present U.N. is capable of serving the cause of peace when the nations really want to use it. But there is no way we can force the nations to utilize the U.N. Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt once said: "The United Nations is not a cure-all. It is only capable of effective action when its members have a will to make it work."

In spite of the Soviet bloc's frequent use of the veto in the Security Council and other obstructive tactics, the U.N. has a solid record of achievement even in the political sphere. Through the U.N., aggression was thrown back in Korea. Through the U.N., Soviet troops were forced to withdraw from Iran. Through the U.N., fighting was stopped in Greece, Indonesia, and the Middle East.

This suggests one possible immediate area where we can strengthen the United Nations. I refer to the U.N. emergency police force now deployed in the Gaza Strip between the United Arab Republic and Israel. This force has limited functions and no one pretends it is powerful enough to hold back a full-scale attack by either side. But it is a beginning, perhaps a symbol of a greater international force which one day may be used to bring stability in trouble areas.

It is difficult to foresee the time when a U.N. force could deal with a situation such as the present Berlin crisis in which the two superpowers are so deeply involved. This could not take place short of a radical change in the nation-state system in which states would have already surrendered their military establishments, the ultimate symbol of their sovereignty.

But, even if a U.N. police force is not capable of dealing with the major security problems in the world today, it is quite possible that a mobile force dispatched to minor trouble spots would be capable of putting out "brush fires" before they blazed into a global conflagration. This would be eminently worth the relatively small investment.

I believe we should also explore the possibility of creating international rules and machinery for the regulation of outer space. In this area the U.N. can also make a contribution.

I have no illusions. I know the U.N. can work effectively on any major security question such as arms control, or regulating outer space only when the Soviet Union is willing to go along with the majority position. And we have no means of forcing the Communist bloc to give in to the majority. But we can try, and in trying we can lay bare the intention of any nation which obstructs the plans of those nations which are genuinely working for greater order and peace. Even if the U.N. serves primarily as a mirror of our divided world, it is performing a valuable function. For without a clear picture of the world situation, we cannot act with political insight or moral wisdom.

3. We should make full use of the International Court of Justice.

One of the most disappointing aspects of the work of the United Nations has been the International Court of Justice. This Court, established as a forum whereby international disputes would be resolved by law, has had all too little opportunity to fulfill this function. In the 13 years since it was established, the International Court of Justice has in fact decided only 10 cases. I repeat, 10 cases in 13 years.

By any standard, this is somewhat less than an impressive record of accomplishment. Here is a court made up of 15 judges who are each paid $20,000 a year, and yet it has decided less than one case a year.

To me this is indeed tragic. For in this day and age the rule of law in international affairs should be looked upon as one of the main ways of peacefully settling disputes between nations.

The sorry record of the Court is due in large measure to the U.S. refusal to give it full backing and support. The damage was done, I regret to say, by the U.S. Senate when in 1946 it added to the so-called Morse resolution, Senate Resolution 196, which declared our acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice, six words "as determined by the United States."

In 1945, the United Nations Charter was approved. Chapter XIV of the charter provided for establishment of the International Court of Justice to replace the Permanent Court of International Justice. Under article 93 all members of the United Nations are ipso facto parties to the statute of the International Court of Justice. However, no member nation is bound by compulsory jurisdiction of the Court without a specific declaration accepting such jurisdiction.

Less than half of the 81 member nations of the United Nations have by declaration accepted compulsory jurisdiction of the Court in specified areas of international law stated in the statute of the Court. It is of interest to note that none of the Communist nations in the United Nations—including the Soviet Union—have accepted compulsory jurisdiction of the Court.

Senate Resolution 196, which gave the consent of the Senate to the United States accepting compulsory jurisdiction of the Court, was introduced by the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], in November of 1945; it was cosponsored by 14 other Senators from both parties.

Hearings were held on Senate Resolution 196 in July of 1946 by a subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee. Not a single witness appeared before the subcommittee to oppose the resolution. Moreover, not a single letter or telegram was received in opposition to the resolution.

Against a backdrop of overwhelming public support, the subcommittee decided to report the resolution favorably to the full Foreign Relations Committee with only one minor amendment. On July 24, 1946, by a unanimous vote, the committee reported the resolution to the Senate for favorable action in exactly the form recommended by the subcommittee.

The resolution was considered by the Senate on August 1 and 2; it was approved August 2 by a vote of 62 to 2 and the Senate adjourned sine die some 2 hours later. During consideration of the resolution three amendments were adopted.

The most controversial amendment, offered by Senator Connally, added to paragraph (b) the words "as determined by the United States" to the language of the resolution which excluded from cases on which compulsory jurisdiction would be accepted "matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States." This amendment was adopted by a vote of 51 to 12.

Many observers at the time felt that this amendment, by reserving to the United States the right to decide whether or not a matter is essentially domestic, rather than having the Court make such determination, demonstrated a lack of confidence on our part in the competence and integrity of the new Court.

Mr. Dean Acheson, who was then Under Secretary of State, in testifying on this resolution expressed the argument against any such reserve clause as follows:

"The rule of law becomes effective to the extent that states agree to submit themselves to the decision of the Court in all cases involving questions of law. It cannot become effective if States may reserve this decision to themselves, regardless of the degree of good faith by which they govern their actions."

The effect of such reserve clauses has been to seriously limit the role of the International Court of Justice in settling international disputes. As I have stated, the Court has decided only 10 cases in 13 years.

I hasten to add that this sorry record is not due to any fault of the Court itself. The 15 judges are competent and qualified men. The Court is ready and willing to aid in the settlement of international disputes. The reason for the ineffectiveness of the Court lies principally in the various reservation clauses contained in the declarations of nations which have accepted the jurisdiction of the Court.

The United States, and in particular the U.S. Senate, cannot escape responsibility for the Court's ineffectiveness.

The distinguished lawyer, Charles S. Rhyne, past president of the American Bar Association, and presently chairman of the Committee on World Peace Through Law of the American Bar Association, in an address delivered only this past Tuesday, March 10, assessed the blame quite candidly when he said:

"I am therefore firmly convinced that one of the major causes for the empty courtroom of the United Nations Court is the Connally reservation which was created by the U.S. Senate, is maintained by the U.S. Senate, and can be removed by the U.S. Senate. * * * Every report I have seen by the many experts who have studied this situation agrees that the Connally reservation has emasculated the usefulness of the Court and rendered it impotent as an instrument for world peace. The cancerous effect of the Senate's action has spread as other nations have copied it; it has an ever-widening scope. The tremendous responsibility of the U.S. Senate for continuing through this reservation to stifle use of the United Nations Court is a most serious one when one considers the value of and need for any mechanism which can aid in preventing war under present world circumstances. The Connally reservation is unsound in principle and effect and should be eliminated."

This is a strong statement indeed. A statment of a highly respected and learned lawyer—a man not given to making reckless or rash statements. Mr. Rhyne is a sound and realistic student of international affairs, and his views cannot be casually dismissed. Mr. Rhyne's forceful address indicates a realization of the peril we face in view of the lethal weapons of mass destruction, and the absolute necessity, in the name of self-preservation, that we bolster the available means of settling disputes by law rather than force.

I believe that the time is long overdue for the Senate to remove this reserve clause in the Morse resolution. It is my intention to offer in the near future a resolution to amend the Morse resolution by deleting from paragraph (b) the words "as determined by the United States."

In the absence of action by the Senate, I fear that the International Court of Justice will remain an ineffective instrument of world peace without authority to dispose of disputes between nations by way of peaceful judicial determination.

It is time that we in the U.S. Senate acted to remove the shackles which restrict the United Nations Court. I hope most earnestly that prompt consideration will be given to the resolution I intend to offer.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, I return to where I started. I said we must have hope, hope in certain specific small steps we can take in the direction of greater world order. I believe peace is possible, and I believe we must work for it in the small and undramatic ways—through painstaking arms control negotiations, in the day-by-day business of the United Nations, in all those daily acts of fidelity which help create a fabric of peace, justice, and understanding.

Improving State Welfare Programs

OF
HON. AIME J. FORAND
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 15, 1959

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, although great improvement has been made in the welfare programs in this country during the past quarter century, experience has shown that much more needs to be done, especially in the State programs.

I am today introducing a bill providing for such improvements.

This bill, H.R. 6422, is designed to alleviate the plight of those many families throughout the country who find themselves in need as a result of unemployment and other factors beyond their control and for whom no provision is now made under Federal law. This bill, which would authorize the Federal Government to assist the States in meeting the full range of needs now confronting their public welfare agencies, is similar to bills I have introduced in previous Congresses, but is given a new urgency by the persistence of unemployment currently affecting some 5 million American workers and their families.

This bill, entitled the "Public Welfare Act," incorporates the recommendations of leading national welfare organizations representing both public and voluntary agencies. Taken together with the bill, H.R. 4700, previously introduced by me to extend health benefits to beneficiaries of the old-age, survivors, and disability insurance program and the bill establishing minimum benefit standards in the unemployment insurance program which I am likewise supporting, this bill rounds out the program of immediate improvements in our total social security program urgently necessary to meet the most pressing needs today confronting large segments of our population. As such, the basic provisions in the bill have the support of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations; the American Public Welfare Association; the National Association of Social Workers, and other groups representing those affected by our social security measures.

We are rightfully proud of the steady growth in coverage and benefits under the social insurance aspects of the social security program and the extent to which this has reduced dependence on public assistance among the able-bodied aged, surviving widows, and the older disabled group. Last year improvements were also made in the financing of public assistance and in the child welfare program. But pride in progress cannot be allowed to blind us to the areas of insecurity and hardship that still remain. Extensive and persistent unemployment over the past year has served to remind us of the vulnerability of our working people to the hazards of the modern economy. We must move toward a national policy which, first, reduces the chances of any individual or family in the United States becoming needy but, second, provides its own built-in assurance that if this contingency befalls, provision will be made to meet those needs. This is the purpose of my bill.

Public welfare provides the ultimate protection to individuals under our total system of social security. When all other resources fail, it is to the State and local public welfare agencies that an individual must turn for help. If a worker cannot find a job, when his unemployment insurance rights and savings are exhausted he becomes dependent upon public assistance. If a worker or farmer or small businessman becomes ill, he may find his savings quickly exhausted in heavy medical and living expenses. Then he has no choice but to turn to his State or local public welfare office. But under the present assistance provisions of the Social Security Act the Federal Government takes no responsibility for assisting the public welfare agencies in meeting the needs of people who do not qualify under the four existing categorical programs of old-age assistance, aid to dependent children, aid to the blind, and aid to the permanently and totally disabled. As a result, in most States provision for the needy unemployed is miserably inadequate and even, in some localities, virtually nonexistent. In other States with a heavy incidence of unemployment, funds for the purpose have been repeatedly exhausted despite every effort to make adequate provision. It is self-evident that the States with heavy and persistent unemployment not only have a disproportionate need but are in the worst fiscal position to meet that need from State and local resources.

Unemployment is an attribute of the national economy, and the development of policies to assure individual security is a national responsibility. The Federal Government should not only take steps to prevent unemployment and to assist depressed areas in making needed economic readjustments, but it should also assume its fair share of responsibility in protecting all its people, wherever they may live, against its hazards. The first line of defense is through a strengthened unemployment insurance program; the second is through a strengthened program of public welfare which is the purpose of this bill.

Public welfare, under our Federal system of government, is the primary responsibility of the States and their political subdivision. The grant-in-aid system, which has developed extensively as an instrument of public policy since 1933, is designed to combine the advantages of decentralized administration with the broader financial base of the Federal Government and the need for basic national programs in areas of national concern. My bill, following this extremely successful principle, is designed to give the States the maximum latitude in adapting their own public welfare programs to changing needs. It does not affect the existing provisions of titles I, IV, V, and XIV of the Social Security Act but rather offers the States the option of combining all or part of these specialized public welfare programs for particular groups into a comprehensive program of aid for all needy persons and of needed social services. The administrative and policy advantages of such a simplified plan are obvious, especially to the individual in need of public welfare aid, who today often finds himself bewildered by a variety of agencies, eligibility standards, and requirements. Many State welfare policymakers and administrators would welcome the opportunity to move in this direction but are today prevented by the limitations of Federal law. On the other hand, there is no compulsion upon the States under my proposal to abandon any specialized welfare program which is felt to be serving the best interests of a particular group.

The rapid growth in our social insurance programs has created a substantial change in the character of the public welfare function which has not yet been reflected in changes in Federal and State law. Increasingly, public welfare is being called upon to meet the unusual or unpredictable situation or to provide for needs which have not yet been provided for through social insurance or other preventive measures. Thus, the nature of the public welfare task tends to change in emphasis. Today, for example, many retired OASDI beneficiaries are obliged to turn to public welfare for help when they become ill. But soon it is hoped we can provide hospital and related benefits for these people as a part of the insurance program. No one wants a large public welfare program, but we do want one which is sufficiently flexible and comprehensive to meet actual need as it occurs. The only way to do this is through legislation which provides the machinery, the policies, and the built-in financing provisions to meet such needs whenever they arise. We do not want to be confronted again with the need for emergency legislation as we were in 1933—or even last year, or again this year, with our unemployment insurance program. We want a strong institutional structure that can be quickly adapted to actual needs whether they arise from economic factors, social change, or disaster situations.

The State public welfare agencies have been handicapped in adapting their own programs and in making the best use of their own resources and personnel by the rigid compartmentalization and restrictive scope of Federal aid. This bill proposes to remedy this situation by providing the optional alternative of a single public welfare plan with more adaptable provisions relating to eligibility, financing, and scope of service. In return for this greater flexibility, States are required to provide assistance for all persons who qualify within their own standards of need without arbitrary exclusions such as those based on residence. The bill also recognizes the importance of individual determinations and service as an intrinsic element in all public welfare functions thus making it possible to bring about a closer coordination of all welfare programs in a single public welfare agency. The advantage of such a simplified approach to the person who needs help, to the administrator, and to the public constitutes a major argument for giving early consideration to this proposal.

In the statement which follows a more detailed explanation of the provisions of this bill is given.

First. General: The bill provides a new title XVI for the Social Security Act under which a State could submit a comprehensive public welfare plan for assistance to needy persons and welfare services as defined in the bill. States that wish to do so could continue to operate programs of assistance under the existing provisions to titles I, IV, X, and XIV but the new matching provisions described below are applicable only to title XVI and the usual provision is made to preclude assistance payments to any individual under more than one title of the act. For most States the scope, flexibility, and financial provisions of title XVI would probably prove an inducement to change, but the optional feature would ease the transitional process and make it possible for a State, which wished to retain certain programs—as, for example, aid to the blind—on the present basis, to do so.

Second. Coverage for assistance: This bill makes it possible for a State to receive Federal aid for assistance to any needy person, including those who are in need because of unemployment, and not exclusively for those over 65, blind, permanently, and totally disabled, or those meeting the restrictive definition for aid to dependent children—as at present. Administration by categorical groups would, however, be optional with the States, provided the basis for establishing the categories was reasonable. Assistance could not, however, be paid to persons residing in public institutions other than medical institutions nor to patients in an institution for tuberculosis or mental disease.

Third. Financial ceilings or the maximum average payments subject to Federal aid would be increased to $75 a month for all adults and $50 for all children. Present maxima in old age assistance, aid to the blind, and aid to the permanently and totally disabled are based on an average of $65 a month; in aid to dependent children the present ceiling is an average of $30 for each individual.

Fourth. A new and simplified system of matching would replace the present formulas. Under the proposed formula the total of all assistance payments—within the average ceilings as shown in 3 above—would receive a 62 percent Federal reimbursement in any State whose average per capita income was the same as that of the United States as a whole. For States above this average the percentage of Federal reimbursement would be proportionately decreased but would in no case fall below 50 percent. For States with a lower than average per capita income the percentage of Federal reimbursement would be proportionately increased but the maximum level of reimbursement would be 80 percent. Under this formula the needy in both the high and low income States would benefit: The former by the higher reimbursable ceilings and the latter by the higher rate of reimbursement.

Fifth. Welfare services provided by the public welfare agency would be subject to the same rate of reimbursement as assistance payments. Increasingly those persons turning to public welfare agencies for aid are those with special needs requiring knowledgeable service for their solution. Such service can often help speed the return of the individual to self-support, secure for him the care he needs from other sources, prevent serious or long-term future difficulties, and reduce the cost to the public of extended dependency. For example: Many people needing medical care or rehabilitative service do not know what provisions are available or how to go about applying for them: Many people are lingering in general or mental hospitals simply because they have no other place to go—and no one to help them find such a place; many people living in areas where their former source of livelihood has ceased to exist need help in moving to areas of new opportunity; many children might be saved from juvenile delinquency or other forms of costly social maladjustment if their parents received helpful guidance at the crucial time or—in cases where substitute family care was necessary—the child welfare services of the public welfare agency could make prompt and adequate provision for their adoptive or foster-care placement. An advantage of this bill to the child welfare program is the fact that it permits child welfare workers to apply assistance funds to the placement of needy children requiring foster care. The grave injustice done to this neediest group of children under the present act, which denies assistance to children not living with a close relative, was pointed out by the welfare report of the Commission on Inter-Governmental Relations.

Sixth. Simplified administration, with consequent benefits to those requiring public welfare aid as well as to those who do its work and pay its cost, is provided in this bill in several ways. Matching on the average of all payments, the optional elimination of categorical administration, and the provision of the same reimbursement formula for all types of aid would permit reduction in paperwork with subsequent reduction in the cost of overhead administration. The bill also requires that the program be administered by a single agency at each level of government. From the point of view of the individual or family requiring help the advantage of a single agency is obvious.

Seventh. Availability of benefits: The bill makes it a condition of the broadened base of Federal financial assistance provided by this new title that its benefits should be available to all qualified persons without residence or citizenship requirements. No public welfare program can be considered to be fulfilling its function as the ultimate guarantee against individual need if it arbitrarily excludes needy persons solely because of their length of residence. The very factors that make it essential for the Federal Government to share the broad public welfare responsibilities of the States make it equally essential that such aid be available to all.

Eighth. The Virgin Islands and Puerto Rico: This bill rights a long-standing injustice toward our fellow American citizens in the Virgin Islands and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico by extending to these jurisdictions the same program provisions as apply in the States and Territories.

Ninth. Confidential assistance records: This bill restores to all persons receiving assistance under this title the protection formerly required by all titles that the facts concerning their receipt of assistance be treated as confidential information.

Tenth. Personnel training: The bill recognizes the serious shortages in qualified public welfare personnel by providing special financial aid on a continuing basis for training such personnel.

Foreign Languages and the National Interest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 15, 1959

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, this past week Representative JOHN BRADEMAS of Indiana delivered an address at Valparaiso University entitled "Foreign Languages and the National Interest." The theme of this fine talk was that the lack in our country of adequate foreign language training is hindering our attempts to strengthen the free world and combat the tyrannical aspirations of Soviet communism.

I wish to commend Representative JOHN BRADEMAS for calling attention to what he aptly describes as our language gap. I concur completely with him in advocating greater emphasis on language training. This is a subject in which I have been very much interested.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Reorganization and International Organizations of the Committee on Government Operations, I have had the opportunity to study foreign language training programs; in particular those conducted by our Federal Government. Only last week I submitted from the Committee on Government Operations a report, Senate Report No. 153, as prepared by my subcommittee, entitled "The Federal Government's Foreign Language Training Programs." In the foreword to this report I stated:

It is time we give full recognition to the indisputable fact that foreign language training is indispensable to our military effort, to our overseas economic programs, and, without question, the key to our ability to win friends throughout the world. It is high time that we do something about it.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the thoughtful address of Representative JOHN BRADEMAS, to which I have referred, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOREIGN LANGUAGES AND THE NATIONAL INTEREST

(Text of an address by Representative JOHN BRADEMAS, Third District, Indiana, at the annual spring meeting of the Indiana Foreign Language Teachers Association, Valparaiso University, Valparaiso, Ind., April 11, 1959)

Some years ago I spent several weeks in Mexico where for the first time I had the opportunity to try out my high school Spanish. At one stage of a conversation, I groped for a phrase to indicate that I was, for any one of a number of reasons, embarrassed. Not knowing the exact word, I reached for a cognate and confidently said to my Mexican friends, "Con toda franqueza, estoy embarazado." They shrieked with laughter and amazement.

For the non-Hispanists among you, "embarazado" in Spanish means "with child" and, I need hardly add, is an adjective confined to the feminine gender, i.e., "embarazada."

After an experience like that I require no persuasion of the importance of understanding foreign languages.

CITES INTEREST IN LANGUAGES

I am honored by the opportunity to speak today at the annual spring meeting of the Indiana Foreign Language Teachers Association. There are several reasons I feel at home with members of your organization. Because my father was born in Europe, early in life I became aware that there were languages other than English, although, to my later regret, I did not trouble to take advantage of the opportunity to learn his native tongue, Greek.

My own graduate studies in the modern political history of Spain could not have been completed had I not been able to use my knowledge of Spanish, somewhat improved from the visit to Mexico, to interview Spaniards who had themselves participated in the events I was seeking to analyze.

As your chairman has indicated, I have also been a college teacher and am therefore familiar with some of the problems you face.

It happens, moreover, that I serve on the General Education Subcommittee of the Education and Labor Committee in the House of Representatives and I am, therefore, directly concerned in my legislative duties with the field of education.

The vastly increased interest which Americans are now demonstrating in education at every level is, of course, a source of great encouragement to us all. It is with respect to one of the most significant areas in the field of education that I should like to speak today, the area of foreign languages.

The United States has in the postwar world assumed the awesome and troubling, but nonetheless indispensable, burden of leadership of the free world against the tyrannical aspirations of Soviet communism. We have undertaken programs of political, military, and economic cooperation with our friends and allies throughout the entire world. Yet we still pursue what I should describe as a semi-isolationist policy when it comes to learning the languages essential to communicating with our friends, understanding the uncommitted peoples of the world, and evaluating the challenges posed by our potential enemies.

THE LANGUAGE GAP

More than 3 million of our citizens are living and working abroad as members of the Armed Forces, the diplomatic corps, and various technical missions engaged in industry. Yet comparatively few of these Americans can speak any language but their own with fluency. It is a simple fact that we are woefully behind the times in learning foreign languages. And there can be little question that the interest of our country suffers, and suffers seriously, because of what, to paraphrase another more controversial aspect of our national security system, might be called our language gap.

U.S. DIPLOMATS LACK LANGUAGES

The problem of the language gap in America is particularly acute in the one spot where it should not be—our diplomatic corps. An Ambassador or consul in a foreign capital is perhaps an exception rather than the rule if he speaks the language of the country to which he is assigned. Gen. Alfred M. Gruenther declared a few weeks ago that, of the 8,000 men and women who recently passed the academic requirements for the Foreign Service Institute of the Department of State, only 300 had a language qualification beyond English. Our embassies and legations are forced to employ thousands of foreign nationals as translators and office staff largely because there are no Americans qualified for these jobs.

I am glad to say that, thanks in part to the criticisms of James Reston, the distinguished correspondent of the New York Times, the Foreign Service Institute has in the last couple of years intensified its efforts to train more of our Foreign Service officers in foreign languages. But there is a long way to go before the United States does an effective job, even for those who are the official representatives of our Government abroad, of bridging this language gap.

"THE UGLY AMERICAN"

In "The Ugly American," that disturbing and challenging novel about Americans stationed abroad, Eugene Burdick and William J. Lederer provide a parable which dramatizes the link between foreign languages and the national interest. In the mythical Asian country of Sarkhan, the Russian Ambassador promises the natives thousands and thousands of tons of rice to stem a local famine. The rice arrives but it is American rice, on each bag of which Sarkhanese Communists have stealthily stenciled in Sarkhanese for each citizen to see and read for himself: "This rice is a gift from Russia."

The Americans take pictures of the distribution of the rice and the smiling faces of the now happy people. There is no comment from any of the Americans present. None of them can read or understand Sarkhanese, and they do not know what is happening.

It would not be difficult to spend the rest of my time here today citing factual, not fictional, examples of how our incompetence in languages has damaged our relations with foreign countries and, by so doing, has worked against the vital interests of the United States. Members of the Indiana Foreign Language Teachers Association, however, do not need to be persuaded of the significant relationship between foreign languages and the national interest.

I do think it would be profitable for us to examine briefly our deficiencies and then ask ourselves what to do about them.

The language gap of which I speak is in large part of our own making. Beginning with World War I, foreign language instruction was systematically discouraged in our public schools, with 22 States passing laws forbidding the teaching of German and other foreign languages. Some shortsighted persons would likewise today impair our national security by insisting that we should not provide for the teaching of Russian in our public schools.

Although advances in aviation and communication in the period between World Wars I and II brought foreign lands closer and closer, Americans have held to the belief that the time spent studying languages could be more profitably employed in other academic endeavors. We are now tasting the fruits of this irresponsible attitude.

FEW U.S. HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS STUDY LANGUAGES

Today less than 15 percent of our total public high school students are studying a modern foreign language. Of these, only a handful are studying Russian, German, Portuguese, Italian or Chinese. None are learning such strategic world languages as Japanese, Arabic, Hindi, Malay, Bengali, or Ukrainian.

Even if we decided right now to expand substantially the language study opportunities for our young people, it would be impossible to find enough adequately trained teachers. Two years ago the supply of new high school language teachers was over 25 percent short of the demand, and I have no doubt that the current rise in interest in language education has made the shortage of competent teachers still more serious.

Today, partly because of the lack of qualified teachers, less than one half of our public schools are able to offer a course in any modern foreign language. A recent survey showed that only 24 percent of Indiana's schools offer instruction in a modern foreign language.

RUSSIANS EMPHASIZE LANGUAGE TRAINING

Our failings in this area are all the more tragic when they are compared with the achievements of our cold war adversary. On the primary and secondary school level, most Russian students begin language training in the fifth grade and continue language training for 6 years. Before completion of their high school studies they will have spent 660 hours learning another language.

Those Soviet students who go on to college are required to demonstrate foreign language competence in order to get into college and must take at least 2 years of languages while there. The Soviet Union has also developed extensive language training programs for diplomats and for technical people sent abroad with their foreign assistance programs.

U.S. Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas warned only last month of "the fierce competition from the Russians who have made language one of their great specialities."

"Telugu"—and I am quoting Justice Douglas—"is a language spoken by 33 million people in India. Yet we have not six people who can read a Telugu newspaper. When the Soviet delegate arrives, however, not only he but his staff are versed in Telugu. The Russian foreign language expert is not only the foreign service official but the Soviet technical expert as well. In medicine alone, Russia is turning out many more doctors than she can use at home. These doctors of hers are trained in Asian and African languages as well as in medicine. They are prepared to practice abroad and to spread the gospel of communism. What is true of the Russian doctor is also true of the Russian engineer, agricultural expert, and scientist."

LANGUAGE GAP COMMANDS CONCERN

That the language gap is beginning to command the concern of more and more persons in our country is evidenced by three random articles I have come upon in the last few days. The Laporte Herald-Argus, published just a few miles from where we now meet, said in an editorial last month that "the blithe insistence of Americans doing their stretches of time in distant lands on keeping aloof from the 'natives,' refusing to learn the language, appreciate the customs, or participate as citizens-for-a-time does us irreparable harm, and explains a good deal of the anti-American sentiment in many areas."

The current issue of Women's Day, a magazine sold in many supermarkets, contains a stimulating article entitled, "Why Can't Our Children Speak a Foreign Language?"

John R. Walsh, education writer for the Louisville Times, in a recent report, describes the sweeping plan of Catholic colleges, high schools, and elementary schools in the Louisville area to coordinate language teaching from top to bottom and to place strong emphasis on the elementary level.

PRAISES PROF. WILLIAM RILEY PARKER

I am sure then that there is growing recognition of the serious shortcoming of this country in the development of persons skilled in modern languages and of the fact that this weakness is prejudicial to the best interests of the United States. The next question is: What can we do about it?

The natural resource which can most quickly be utilized is the trained body of language teachers now engaged in teaching. Certainly no one would dispute the proposition that all teachers would benefit by an opportunity to increase their knowledge of the subjects they teach. In an excellent study for UNESCO, entitled "The National Interest and Foreign Languages," Prof. William Riley Parker of the University of Indiana, presently Chief of the Language Development Program in the U.S. Office of Education, cites the example of the language teacher who has only the minimum training required to teach languages and, as a result, has reached the limits of his knowledge after teaching a 2-year course. If we are to give our students competent and extensive training in languages, we must have teachers who know the languages as thoroughly as possible.

Let me pause to pay a word of tribute to Dr. Parker for the splendid work he is doing to remedy the lag in languages we are discussing. All of us in Indiana should be proud of his contributions, and I want to express the hope that all of you who have not already done so will read Dr. Parker's first-class analysis of foreign languages and the national interest.

HAILS NATIONAL DEFENSE EDUCATION ACT

I am very pleased to tell you of a significant effort now under way to attack the basic problem in language development in the United States: the shortage of good language teachers. The National Defense Education Act, passed by the 85th Congress, contains a number of provisions which are evidence of the awareness of Congress of our deplorable backwardness in this field. In fact, the only one of the 10 titles of the act which rode serenely through all the hearings and all the debates was the one dealing with languages.

The National Defense Education Act provides for the establishment of summer foreign language institutes where language teachers may take additional training in the languages they teach. Four institutes have already been set up for this summer at the Universities of Colorado, Maine, Michigan, and Louisiana State. Because we in Congress last month voted a supplemental appropriation of $75 million for the Defense Education Act, six more institutes will be established this summer. They will accommodate an additional 600 teachers. The institute program should, in its first year of operation, provide 8 weeks of training for 1,000 teachers.

The need for this kind of program and the enthusiastic response on the part of language teachers is demonstrated by the fact that the first institute established—at the University of Colorado—has received applications from every State in the Union at the rate, as of last month, of 100 per day.

For those of you interested in the foreign language institutes, and I hope that includes everyone here, I might say that the program provides a $75 weekly stipend for public school teachers, plus $15 a week for each dependent.

Parenthetically, let me mention a conversation I had in Washington a few days ago with Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, of Minnesota, and Eugene Burdick, both of whom told me of the tragic fact that the Army Language School at Monterey, Calif., a first-class center for the teaching of languages, is operating at less than half capacity.

URGES INCOME TAX DEDUCTION FOR LANGUAGE TEACHER TRAVEL

With the increasing emphasis on teaching students to speak, as well as to read and write foreign languages, I think it might be wise to encourage teachers to increase their knowledge of the spoken language. The best way to achieve this goal is to spend some time living in a foreign country.

I am sure that most of you would be happy indeed to travel abroad, but, as college teachers, you are inhibited by the lack of money. Because I am so deeply convinced of the value of such travel, I am considering the introduction of legislation to permit language teachers a partial income tax deduction for the expenses of trips designed to increase their knowledge of a foreign language.

CITES AREA CENTERS FOR RARE LANGUAGES

The summer institute program represents a very promising start in our efforts to provide this Nation with competent linguists, but it does little to increase the number of trained language teachers or to provide trained linguists, teachers, and teaching materials for the so-called exotic languages, those which are rarely taught in this country.

Our incompetence in the field of the exotic languages is demonstrated by a recent survey made by the American Council of Learned Societies which revealed that at least 50 languages—each of them spoken by more than 2 million people, 14 of them spoken by between 10 and 42 million—are not taught in any American college or university.

The National Defense Education Act does, however, provide a means for attacking our lack of proficiency in the exotic languages. The act provides for the establishment of language area centers for the development of facilities to teach these languages. Let me list the goals of the area center program:

(a) Intensive courses available frequently and at geographically distributed locations.

(b) The production of several complete sets of reliable and effective teaching materials.

(c) Adequate instruction in related area studies.

Some of these language area centers would use existing facilities at colleges and universities. Others would be developed from scratch. The centers would be financed through a system of matching grants. If we can put these centers into operation, we should be able to build up a pool of trained linguists who, in turn, would be available to train more students throughout the Nation. The development of suitable materials would provide insurance should we quickly need large numbers of trained personnel in any specific language.

You will be interested to know that the study conducted by the American Council of Learned Societies showed the languages most needed now by Americans are Arabic, Chinese, French, German, Hindustani, Italian, Japanese, Portuguese, Russian, and Spanish.

One or more area centers will be established for all of these languages except French, German, Italian, and Spanish, which are available at most colleges and universities.

NOTES STUDENT LOANS TO ENCOURAGE TEACHERS

The Defense Education Act also encourages the college student to consider a language-teaching career by providing writeoffs on student loans, granted under the act, to students who subsequently teach in the public schools. The student is allowed to write off 10 percent of his loan for each year that he teaches up to a maximum of 5 years.

The important place given to languages in the National Defense Education Act is, I believe, a symbol of the growing realization among the citizens of the United States of the contribution to our country of your profession. The Indiana Foreign Language Teachers Association is to be congratulated for following the recommendation of the Modern Language Association that each State establish a group to include all teachers of foreign languages in the State. State educational officials will look to organizations like yours for advice and help in putting the foreign-language provisions of the Defense Education Act into practice.

PROPOSES NATIONAL LANGUAGE FOUNDATION

Indeed, I would urge that your organization and others like it consider seriously an effort to create an agency similar to the National Science Foundation for the purpose of marshaling support for the study of foreign languages and cultures. Just as the National Science Foundation is a source of strength for scientific endeavor in our country, so, too, a National Language Foundation could serve as a coordinating agency and rallying point to intensify interest in language education.

It will be 2 or 3 years before we can see evidence of real progress from some of the programs I have discussed. Meanwhile, all across the Nation parents, teachers, and school boards are displaying an awakened interest in language education. Students, housewives, and factory workers are arising with the sun to take Russian on early morning television programs. PTA groups are asking schools to teach Russian or Japanese to their first graders.

This new interest is a splendid example of the capacity of the American people to respond to a challenge. There is, however, a danger that these crash programs will collapse because of an inadequate foundation and the lack of a continuing planned program.

CALLS FOR LANGUAGE TRAINING FROM PRIMARY TO COLLEGE LEVEL

A good deal is said about the advantages of teaching the fundamentals of a foreign language to young children who have the ability to assimilate such knowledge without pain or embarrassment. I believe that we should do all we can to encourage the teaching of languages to children at the primary level, provided that at the same time we prepare advanced training for these students at the secondary and college level.

These primary programs should be carefully planned so that we do not disappoint both the students and their parents by starting on an exciting venture, only to be stopped by the dead end of inadequate preparation.

SUGGESTS FOREIGN-BORN AMERICANS TEACH LANGUAGES

I shall dare to make another suggestion.

There have been many cities and towns ready and willing to begin language instruction in the primary grades, but which were unable to find qualified teachers. This, in many cases, is not because we lack a significant number of competent linguists in this country, but rather because too few of these linguists meet State and local teaching certification requirements.

The suggestion I shall make is not a criticism of our certification requirements, but is rather a commonsense approach to the basic problem: How can we enable more Americans to learn foreign languages in the immediate future?

I would suggest that we make use of the many educated immigrants and foreign nationals now living in the United States who have complete command of their native tongue, who have the intelligence and background to teach these languages, but who may lack the necessary college credits to qualify as teachers.

It would seem quite possible that evening or summer courses could adequately prepare these people to teach languages to primary students, especially since the language teacher could have the aid of the regular classroom teacher. Later these people could be replaced by regularly trained teachers, or, if they wished, could take the courses required by State laws to become fully qualified teachers.

In the meantime, they could be imparting their knowledge of the correct pronunciation, tone, and inflection of their native language to the receptive minds of young students. These students would then be able to take full advantage of advanced courses on the high-school and college level.

URGES IMMIGRANTS TO TEACH THEIR CHILDREN NATIVE TONGUE

Foreign-born Americans and foreign nationals living in our country are an invaluable resource whom we have too long neglected. In this connection, let me say that I believe it is a patriotic duty of American citizens of foreign birth to teach their children a second language. Immigrants should take pride in the fact that they can contribute in this significant way to the security and well-being of their adopted country.

PRAISES CULVER ACADEMY RUSSIAN PROGRAM

Let me take this opportunity to point out that here in Indiana there are many school systems which have already started to improve the teaching of foreign languages. Very near here, for example, the Culver Military Academy has only recently hired a highly qualified language scholar to teach Russian to its students.

Maj. Gen. Delmar T. Spivey, superintendent of the academy, told me that the course was instituted because, "aside from the questions related to communism, when a country is as large in land mass and as populous as Russia is, the impact of its culture on Western civilization will be so great that it is absolutely essential for our citizens to gain a better understanding of this culture."

General Spivey added that he had found it very difficult to find a person competent to teach the Russian courses. I might say that I am glad to see that Saint Mary's College, where I taught for a time, has just begun to offer courses in Russian.

SPEAKING IN STRANGE TONGUES

Russian is but one of the many languages in which this country is deficient. In a world that seems to change overnight—every night—those of us who believe deeply in democracy as the best political expression of the dignity of the individual must speak clearly to the peoples of the world, millions of whom are now for the first time moving to the stage of human history.

We must, if we are really to be understood by these peoples and to understand them, speak to them in their own language.

This is the fundamental reason we must bridge the language gap.

In the Acts of the Apostles we read of those who were speaking in strange tongues.

The future of free civilization will very largely depend on how well we in America can speak strange tongues and listen to them.

How well we speak and listen depends in turn on how well you, the members of the foreign language profession, teach our young people.

Yours is a high and noble calling and I am confident that you will respond with dedication to its challenges.

Extension of Medical Resources

OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 15, 1959

Mr. JAVITS. On April 5 the Honorable ERNEST GRUENING, U.S. Senator from Alaska, officiated at the dedication of a new library, auditorium, and lounge at the Albert Einstein College of Medicine of Yeshiva University in New York City.

The facilities dedicated were the D. Samuel Gottesman Library, the Mary and Karl Robbins Auditorium, and the Max L. and Sadie Friedman student-faculty lounge, constructed on the campus of the college of medicine. The units, embodying the most modern facilities for medical education, were a medical library with provisions for 200,000 volumes and periodicals; an auditorium seating 838, equipped for closed-circuit color television; and a student-faculty lounge, providing for informal get-togethers of students and faculty.

Speakers at the ceremony, in addition to Senator GRUENING, were Dr. Samuel Belkin, president of Yeshiva University, and former New York State Attorney General Nathaniel L. Goldstein, chairman of the board of overseers of the college of medicine.

Addressing the assemblage of leaders in industry, community affairs, and education, Dr. Belkin declared:

Let there be a friendly rivalry among scientists of different lands for new discoveries against cancer, heart disease, and other dread killers. Let the libraries of the great cities vie with one another on the size and quality of their book collections. Let the major universities of different nations compete in the scope and daring of their educational programs. Let nations be judged on the merits of their medical training and research rather than on the size of their warheads.

In a greater sense and larger measure, we are dedicating ourselves here to the spiritual and democratic concept of the infinite worth and sacredness of the human personality. Because human life is sacred, it is our moral duty to do everything in our power to preserve it.

General Goldstein, referring to the teamwork of scientists and businessmen who had helped create the college of medicine, said:

In the world competition for better health facilities, more educational opportunities, higher standards of scientific achievement, we need fear no nation in the world. A free-enterprise system that can give rise to institutions like the Albert Einstein College of Medicine is its own proof of essential soundness and creativity.

Medical advances in our golden age of science have paradoxically raised alarming new problems in health. With the increase in our population, particularly of the aged, health and disease problems have arisen which call for a far greater tempo in medical education and the numbers of medical researchers, teachers, and physicians.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the address by the Senator from Alaska be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR ERNEST GRUENING, OF ALASKA, AT THE DEDICATION OF THE D. SAMUEL GOTTESMAN LIBRARY, MARY AND KARL ROBBINS AUDITORIUM, MAX L. AND SADIE FRIEDMAN STUDENT FACULTY LOUNGE AT THE ALBERT EINSTEIN COLLEGE OF MEDICINE OF YESHIVA UNIVERSITY, APRIL 5, 1959

It is a privilege to participate in any ceremony which further commemorates the name of Albert Einstein, though it is beyond the power of the living to enhance by words the fame of that great man. No posthumous tributes can add one cubit to his stature. He belongs to the ages. In the roster of immortals who have signally advanced the frontiers of knowledge, and whose contributions were milestones in the progress of mankind, only a very few in all recorded history may be deemed comparable: Archimedes, Copernicus, Galileo, Newton, Pasteur, Darwin. But Einstein was not only a great scientist, he was also a great humanitarian—a philanthropist in the generic sense of that word, a lover of his fellow man. He deeply sensed the philosophic import of his cosmic discoveries in physical science. He was keenly aware of their epoch-making impact.

So it is doubly significant and twice just that the college of medicine of Yeshiva University was named after him. For a college of medicine combines, as no other institution could, pure science, of a character which directly benefits both the individual and society, and extension of those benefits with a total disregard of barriers of race, creed, or country. What institution could be nobler in purpose?

I am happy to be here with you at the dedication of three important additions to this already great and prospectively greater and enduring institution—the library, auditorium, and a student and faculty lounge. It is a welcome assignment to bring you the greetings of the 49th State, and as a Member of the U.S. Senate, where Alaska is represented for the first time. Alaska's elevation from territorialism and the recent admission of Hawaii, which followed more or less naturally after Alaska had, so to speak, broken the ice, are important steps forward in the application of that most basic of American principles, the principle of government by consent of the governed.

The Senate is deeply concerned with the problems which this ceremony today signalizes—health, medical education, and research to promote that health. A Senate resolution of the 85th Congress adopted as recently as last August authorizing a complete study of all matters pertaining to international health, research, rehabilitation, and assistance programs, was based on the declared assumption that "mankind's efforts for the conquest of disease have become a matter of ever higher priority in the judgment of the American people and the Congress."

The first of a series of these studies, under the auspices of the Senate Committee on Government Operations of which I am a member, is about to appear and I have been reading the galley proofs thereof. One of the encouraging facts cited in this report is that expenditures for national medical research have risen from $88 million a decade ago to $330 million last year and that the Federal Government's participation in the same period has risen from 32 percent of that total to 56 percent; an increase by Uncle Sam from $28 million a decade ago to $184 million. There is no better test of the Governments's interest in a project than its willingness to appropriate for such project. Here, as in other fields, actions speak louder than words. So the Federal Government's interest is tangible and demonstrable.

In addition, in this, the 86th Congress, another highly important joint resolution, known as the International Health and Medical Research Act of 1959 is slated, I hope, for early action. It is sponsored by Senator LISTER HILL, of Alabama, chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare—the committee whose jurisdiction includes both education and health.

Cosponsored by 58 Senators, of whom I am happy to be one, this measure is designed to establish the procedures which can mobilize the Nation's health resources so that our scientists can participate effectively in a cooperative effort with the scientists of other countries against the still unconquered diseases that afflict all mankind.

It is scarcely necessary to enumerate these diseases to this assemblage. In 1957 cancer killed one American every 2 minutes. If we project that figure into a rough approximation of its worldwide toll—although we do not have statistics available for the world population—we will discover approximately one cancer fatality every 10 seconds on this planet. Many of the fatalities occur in early adulthood. It is among the premature deaths, among the parents of the young, among the breadwinners, among those still in the prime of life, that are found the great personal tragedies.

Last year diseases of the heart and cardiovascular system accounted for approximately one-half of the total deaths from disease in the United States—some 800,000, and of these more than one-fifth had not reached the age of retirement.

Mental illness which now affects over 10 million Americans and appears to be on the increase, is a vast field only beginning to be explored.

Modern invention, the steadily accelerating tempo of contemporary life, ironically, bring new medical problems. Automobiles on the faster throughways increase the accident rate and require emergency antishock treatment and surgery which were not required in the horse and buggy age. Aviation medicine—to take care of the physiological concomitants of rarefied atmosphere, rapidly changing atmospheric pressures, and other implications of supersonic speeds into space—is upon us. This is a field closely linked with national security and the preservation of the freedom we enjoy.

Radiation from atomic fallout has brought new grave perils, new medical time-bombs, the full import and consequences of which we are not yet wholly aware, except that they present new challenges both to medicine and to statesmanship.

It is the objective of this legislation now before the Congress to sound a call for world cooperation in an organized onslaught against disease and ill health and the resolution has been given an appropriate short title, namely "Health for Peace Act." It asks for an appropriation of $50 million annually. Its passage by the Congress will serve notice to all peoples that the United States desires worldwide cooperation, not for war among nations, not for mutual destruction of our fellow human beings, but for an all-out war against the common enemy of man. Modern methods of communication and transportation render such cooperations more feasible. As the world has shrunk through the annihilation of distance and reduction of travel time, cooperative effort is not only facilitated but is rendered more obligatory through the rapid spread of infectious diseases which can span continents with a speed heretofore nonexistent.

It is an interesting fact that Senator LISTER HILL, who is responsible for so much good legislation dealing with health, such as the Hill-Burton Hospital Act, is the son of a noted American surgeon, Dr. Luther Hill, who was the first to perform a successful suture of the human heart. He had studied in London under the great Sir Joseph Lister, who introduced aseptic techniques into surgery, and had given his son the name of LISTER.

Likewise I want to bring you the greetings of Alaska, until a few days ago I could have said our youngest State, whose citizens will be keenly interested in this young medical school. At present only 118 physicians are licensed to practice in Alaska, an area one-fifth as large as the 48 States. Vast areas in that great domain lack adequate medical services. This unfortunate condition exists in all but 11 of our largest communities and in the immediate surroundings of certain hospitals established by the U.S. Public Health Service. These hospitals are designed to take care of our native population—"native" being an Alaskan word for people of aboriginal descent, that is, of Indian, Eskimo, or Aleut blood, but, by a curious reverse racial discrimination which we are trying to rectify, these agencies will not treat whites. Large Alaskan regions, the Yukon Basin, many areas both coastal and in the interior, are almost totally lacking in medical services, and many of their people live and die without benefit of therapy. Alaska's crucial needs are best illustrated by giving you these tragic facts:

We have in Alaska the highest recorded rate of eye, ear, nose, and throat infections and their complications, such as mastoiditis.

Although our incidence of tuberculosis has been greatly reduced in recent years from the shocking ratio of nine times what it was in the 48 States 10 years ago, it is still a great and smoldering danger.

Infant mortality is high in rural Alaska, mostly in children less than a year old, and this is largely due to nutritional and hygiene factors.

Dental disease in rural Alaska is extreme and exerts an inevitable adverse influence on general health. Some communities have never had dental care. Instead they have dental caries.

These conditions are the heritage of nearly a century of colonialism. We have liquidated that colonialism on paper, through statehood, but the economic and social consequences of those 92 years of neglect and discrimination remain to be disposed of. And here is a challenge for the forthcoming graduates of this and other medical schools, as well as for our State and Federal authorities.

I am not quite sure why I was so signally honored with the opportunity to dedicate these great new additions to the Einstein College of Medicine. Perhaps an explanation may be found in some personal references. Medicine has played an important part in my life. My father was a practicing physician in New York. He was an oculist and an aurist, probably the last man to practice both these specialties in Manhattan, where, prior to his death in 1914, these two important branches of medicine, as in other metropolitan areas, had come to be separately practiced. My father attained distinction in both, having been elected president of of two societies that, in his lifetime, dealt with each, the American Ophthalmological Society and the American Otological Society. Since his day otology has expanded its domain, laterally and vertically, has annexed the nose and throat, or perhaps better said, has formed a tripartite union with rhinology and laryngology. But in earlier days nose and throat were considered somewhat apart from eye and ear. Fortunately medical disciplines, unlike some labor unions, are not prone to jurisdictional disputes.

So I grew up in a medical atmosphere and, even as a boy, became familiar with the institutions that my father served: The New York Eye and Ear Infirmary, the Mount Sinai Hospital, and the German Hospital, later renamed the Lenox Hill Hospital, in which he successively passed through the various echelons and ultimately became the consulting surgeon in his specialities in these hospitals. While still in school, I watched him perform a mastoid operation at Mount Sinai and remove a cataract at Eye and Ear. My father was once asked what the definition of a consulting surgeon was. In a humorous vein he replied wryly that a consulting surgeon was one who was called in at the last minute to share the blame.

The assumption was inevitable that, as the only son in the family, I would follow in father's footsteps, and I did study medicine and obtained my M.D. at Harvard Medical School. However fascinating the pursuit of medicine, a number of factors led me to the belief that I would be happier in attempting to diagnose and treat the ills of the body politic rather than the ailments of the bodies corporal. So I decided to give up medicine and entered newspaper work, starting as a cub reporter. It was a serious blow to my father. But he became reconciled, after I had become an editorial writer and he found that a number of my editorials were being reprinted in the Journal of the American Medical Association and hailed by its editor as welcome examples of seldom encountered correct comment on medical matters in the daily press of the day.

So my medical education proved of great value in journalism, as it did likewise later in government. In fact, one of my collateral efforts, although I was on what was known as the editorial side of newspapers—as reporter, copy desk editor, rewrite man, editorial writer, city editor and managing editor—was to try to persuade the business office of the newspapers for which I worked to ban medical advertising.

In those days, the first and second decades of the century, advertising of quack doctors and of patent medicines that were guaranteed to cure cancer, tuberculosis, venereal disease, "female troubles" and every known ailment, was carried almost universally in the daily press. The lucrative patent medicine business was exposed by Samuel Hopkins Adams, a great journalist, who died only a few months ago at the age of 88, in a memorable series of articles in Collier's weekly, labeled "The Great American Fraud," subsequently published in book form. The unholy collusion between newspapers and this fraudulent medical advertising he subsequently unmasked in fiction form in a novel called "The Clarion," whose scene was laid in a New York up-State city where some widely publicized patent medicines were manufactured and indeed were one of that community's principal industries. "The Clarion," in the novel, was the name of a locally published daily trying to free itself from that industry's control.

Adam's crusading served to awaken the public conscience and to mobilize public sentiment by making clear that, through the publication of these fraudulent nostrums, newspaper publishers were accessories to the killing of innocent people. I found it helpful to get Samuel Hopkins Adams to come to Boston to address its chamber of commerce and to challenge these derelict publishers in their hometown. It was a bombshell, but it achieved the desired result.

But, before I turn from these personal recollections to the important and stimulating aspects of this occasion, I want to add that my medical education enabled me to help build and develop a school of tropical medicine in Puerto Rico, securing for it from the Federal Government substantial sums which I was dispensing as administrator of an agency known as the Puerto Rico Reconstruction Administration, and, later, to have the school of tropical medicine expanded into the School of Medicine of Puerto Rico.

While in Alaska, my medical education enabled me to work more effectively to create a full-time department of health and to make a start in combating tuberculosis and other endemic diseases there, after a virtually total neglect of public health by the Federal authorities whose responsibility this had been during the first three-quarters of a century of American rule in Alaska.

But, as I have pointed out, Alaska still lacks much that it needs in the way of medical care and health facilities. Within this month, one of my medical friends from Fairbanks was here in the East looking for practitioners for his clinic, and similar shortages exist elsewhere. We know that our medical schools are not graduating the number of physicians who are needed. I am confident that the Einstein College of Medicine will make a major contribution to alleviating that deficiency.

I will not burden you with statistics, but one that is striking is that the medical educational facilities in the United States with 80-odd medical schools have been insufficient to take care of half the applicants or anywhere near the need. The number of these applicants may be expected to increase and in relation to population growth and need the percentage of accepted students to diminish. Hence the great value and importance of the Einstein College of Medicine.

This college emphasizes as no other institution could the international character of science and particularly of medicine. Located in the most cosmopolitan metropolis on earth, with populations of ethnic groups often numerically greater than in the largest cities in the land of their origins, a magnet for the greatest talent, a receptiveness to that talent, regardless of race or creed, it furnishes, in this land of freedom, the ideal center of hospitality for the scientists of lands less free.

Such was Abraham Jacobi, who, imprisoned in Germany for participating in the revolution of 1848, escaped and here in New York established the first pediatric clinic in America. Such was Albert Einstein and countless other physicians and scientists driven from their homeland by the obscurantism and racism of Hitler. Here were welcomed the refugees from Mussolini's Italy, from Franco's Spain. Here are welcome and will be welcomed whatever freedom-loving men and women have defected or will defect from the tyranny of Communist imperialism, or of any other police state.

In this age which has witnessed such a resurgence of nationalism, has seen the erection of barriers to travel and intercourse which a generation ago we believed had been forever outgrown, it is more than ever important to insist upon the international character of the profession of healing. In no arena of human endeavor have the men and women of so many nations contributed as they have to the advancement of medical science.

Hippocrates the Greek, father of medicine; Galen the Roman; Avicenna the Persian were among the pioneers in what was then the art of healing. We need but name a few of the luminaries whose work advanced medicine into a science to make clear beyond preadventure the international character of medicine.

Vesalius and Leeuwenhoek, from the Netherlands; Arrhenius the Scandinavian; Harvey, Jenner, Bright, and Lister, Englishmen; Pasteur, the Curies, Binet, Charcot, from France; Casal, the Spaniard; Helmholtz, Virchow, Graefe, Roentgen, Koch, Ehrlich, Germans; Mendel and Freud, from Austria; Banting, from Canada; Metchnikoff and Pavlov, from Russia; Noguchi and Takamine, from Japan—these are only a few of a glorious list before we come to the great contributions of our fellow Americans with Jonas Salk and his antipolio vaccine as the latest bright star in the international galaxy. I hesitate to venture into an enumeration of the other stars in the American medical firmament. That would constitute a major address all by itself.

This vast medical center which has arisen from a wasteland in six miraculously short years, the buildings we are today dedicating, were born of a rare teamwork of businessmen and scientists, idealists all, yet practical men and women. These farsighted and public spirited citizens were fired with the vision of a Jewish-sponsored medical school—the first in our Nation's history. It would, they knew, continue the age-old contributions of the Jewish people to the health and welfare of mankind. They helped build this city of training, research, and healing that surrounds us here. They gave freely of their thought, their time, and their money to achieve that great objective.

They hoped, and their hope will be generously fulfilled, to emphasize by this creation that we are well into the golden era of medicine, the rapidity of whose advances must be consonant with the urgency of this age. They want to accelerate the great progress made in recent years—to spare the deaths and personal tragedies that came to many stricken by illnesses for which a few short years later a cure was found. They were aware that in the last 10 years, due largely to the discovery of sulfa drugs and antibiotics, the death rate has declined almost 12 percent. This means that 1,700,000 Americans are alive today who but for medical research would be in their graves.

They knew that surgical techniques had advanced so far that the touch-me-nots of yesteryear now hopefully invite the newer skills of surgeon and anesthetist, which save lives that but a few years ago would have been doomed.

They had seen the passing or great diminution of the infectious diseases that a generation ago swept communities with epidemic virulence. They have seen the incidence and fatality of diphtheria, typhoid fever, scarlet fever, tuberculosis, pneumonia, poliomyelitis, and much else, greatly diminished. They have seen life expectancy steadily increased. But they have also seen cancer and heart disease take their steady, perhaps increasing, toll. They have seen little headway made against crippling arthritis.

So they have deployed the laboratories, the classrooms, the operating rooms, the therapeutic apparatus, the most modern equipment in every sector, to wage a vigorous and unrelenting battle against sickness and premature death.

Adjacent are the thoroughly equipped facilities of the Abraham Jacobi and Nathan Van Etten Hospitals, and now the new D. Samuel Gottesman Library in which are housed some 200,000 volumes, in the expanding and multiplying subsciences together grouped under the all-inclusive title of medical books and publications—these recording the steady advance from conjecture and hypothesis to experiment, to trial and error, to proved experience, to near certainty—the cumulative experience of past and present, the prognosis for a still better future.

This great Mary and Karl Robbins Auditorium, visually linked to vital points in the medical center with its closed-circuit television, its modern equipment for auditory and visual communication, a center for the dissemination of information to medical and lay public alike on prevention and care of disease and on the maintenance of health.

This bright and cheerful lounge named for Max L. and Sadie Friedman, which will serve as a meeting ground for faculty and students and as a place for pleasurable relaxation and social contact.

I would like, in conclusion, if it were not deemed inappropriate, to paraphrase and adapt the immortal words of Abraham Lincoln:

We cannot dedicate these great gifts for the welfare of mankind. The Jewish people, in their unquenched idealism, in their age-long martyrdom, in their unremitting devotion to freedom, in their unceasing quest for the higher and better life, have dedicated these facilities far beyond our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what is said here. But uncounted tens of thousands through the years to come will never forget what will be done here.

Holmes, Sweet Holmes

OF
HON. KEN HECHLER OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 15, 1959

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, the following syndicated column by Holmes Alexander appeared in recent issues of the Parkersburg (W. Va.) News, Charleston (W. Va.) Daily Mail, and many newspapers through the country:

HECHLER PREACHES MUTINY ON THE BOUNTY BUT FINDS HE IS FLOGGING WRONG CULPRIT

(By Holmes Alexander)

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Congressman KEN HECHLER, who represents 10 West Virginia counties in the Ohio River Valley, was preaching mutiny on the bounty. He was telling the House Agriculture Committee that the free food for needy families in his district was not enough and not what the needy people were demanding.

Congressman HECHLER, born on Long Island and brought up in Missouri, is a strolling New Dealer who recently came to West Virginia and won this seat last year in the Democratic landslide. Now he was laying into the Republican Secretary of Agriculture with charges of ignorant indifference to human suffering ("Let 'em eat shrimp cocktails") and was tagging the Republican administration with spending billions for defense and peanuts for tribulation.

Representative HECHLER had it all going his way until some of the senior Democrats pointed out that he was flogging the wrong culprit. It turned out that the bottleneck was not at the Agriculture Department, but down at the West Virginia localities where the food hadn't been requested or hadn't been distributed for lack of funds, organization or manpower. This seems to be true in other States.

You can see what comes next. The Secretary of Agriculture has almost limitless emergency power to declare that a surplus exists in anything which Americans eat, chew, smoke or wear. He then can make this surplus product available to "needy" families. Secretary Benson has done this in record amounts of food and dollars to a record number of Americans who are responding in record volume of complaints about the quantity, quality, and variety.

Next? Well, the trend of legislation in the 86th Congress is to vest more and more authority in federalia. Specifically, it may not be long before the Agriculture Secretary not only assigns food to the needy, but fetches it to the door. And pretty soon, as Congress broadens the definition of "needy," we can expect to find huge areas in the United States where people will learn to sing for their supper while obliging bureaucracies serve it up.

If this seems alien to the American tradition, the reason may be that our legislators are turning to non-American models for social betterment. In a major speech in support of his own area redevelopment bill, which was recently passed by the Senate 49–46, Senator PAUL DOUGLAS told a Friday afternoon Senate audience (about six or eight Senators when I was there) that the nearly $400 million measure for rebuilding rural-urban slums "would not result in a radical new program which has never been tried." Was Mr. DOUGLAS saying that Federal factory-building was an old American usage? Oh, no. "The countries of Western Europe," he went on, "have had similar programs * * * the financing * * * made possible by U.S. foreign aid dollars."

Well, I thought I'd heard everything till now. The DOUGLAS line of reasoning is that the American communities are comparable to the foreign lands which were laid to waste by war and then threatened by Communist overthrow. Great Britain actually went to the halfway house of national socialism and Senator DOUGLAS cited, with seeming approval, the British Distribution of Industry Act, passed in 1945 and extended last year. Under this British law, any community having a high rate of unemployment which is likely to persist would get preferential treatment by the Government. This is legislation which flies in the face of Nature by promoting the preservation of unfit communities. The only foreseeable result would be to perpetuate the obsolete sites where industry and agriculture have failed, and to prevent the natural birth of new cities and farm communities where the future wealth must be created, if at all.

Thus Congressman HECHLER and Senator DOUGLAS are double-teaming, the former to pin down the population of our migratory race with drive-in restaurant service from the Federal granaries, the latter to invest in ghost towns and to make it the business of Congress to prevent (although it won't work) the founding of new Detroits and future Pittsburghs.

There is no denying that the industrial revolution has brought privation and hard luck to many Congressional Districts and States. But this is a modern problem, even futuristic. It won't be solved by imitating the Pharaohs and building pyramids with gang labor in the unproductive desert sands.

Mr. Speaker, I am tickled pink that Mr. Alexander has given me all this free publicity. You know, new Members of Congress sometimes have a hard time trying to convince the folks back home that they are really making a dent on the Washington scene. Statistically, any Member is less than two-tenths percent of the entire membership of Congress, but of course the influence of a freshman Member of the House of Representatives is even less.

When a freshman Member arrives in Washington glowing with the flush of victory, sometimes he feels pretty big. Then comes the big disillusionment when he is not even recognized by the hotel doorman.

Lucky indeed, then, is the Congressman who incurs the opposition of a columnist—sometimes spelled c-a-l-u-m-n-i-s-t. I am very proud of this column for a number of reasons. I am proud that Mr. Alexander called attention to my efforts to distribute some of our staggering food surpluses to our needy people here in America, for why should there be starvation in the face of bulging granaries? I am proud that Mr. Alexander calls me a "strolling New Dealer"—which is better than being a creeping reactionary. I am proud that he associated me with that noble warrior, Senator PAUL DOUGLAS, who has always been one of my idols in his battles for economic justice. I am proud, too, that all West Virginians will rise up and demonstrate that their land does not consist of the "desert sands," "ghost towns," and "unfit communities" which Mr. Alexander tries to label them.

Mr. Speaker, men in public life must have a good sense of humor. They must be able to laugh at themselves and enjoy it. If it were not for columnists like Holmes Alexander, I would recommend a program which would transport 20 public officials at a time out to be deposited in folding chairs on the rim of the Grand Canyon for 2-hour periods of silent contemplation every now and then. But fortunate we are that we have people like Mr. Alexander in the business.

Now, if someone would just introduce me to Mr. Westbrook Pegler.

New York Chamber of Commerce Week

OF
HON. FRANCIS E. DORN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 15, 1959

Mr. DORN of New York. Mr. Speaker Governor Rockefeller has proclaimed April 12–19 as Chamber of Commerce Week. Practically all chambers of commerce in the State will present programs designed to highlight the importance of the chamber in the community it serves.

The purpose of Chamber of Commerce Week is to: Create a greater public awareness and need for the chamber. Sometimes the chamber does its job so well that it is taken for granted by both the members and the public.

Give recognition to the chamber's staff and volunteer leaders for constructive participation in community affairs.

Give emphasis to the changing character of the work performed by chamber of commerce managers who are striving to achieve professional stature.

Improve and strengthen relations between the chamber and other organizations and agencies in the community.

Stimulate pride of membership among curent supporters and encourage others to participate in financing the chamber.

Give credit for past achievements and highlight current activities.

In the spirit dictated by the proclamation, I want to congratulate our own Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce for the splendid work they have done and are doing for the citizens and business people of Brooklyn.

Economy in Government

OF
HON. LEONARD G. WOLF
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 15, 1959

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, like many of my colleagues I have received scores of letters which say no more than the slogan "balance the budget" or "stop spending." A great historian of the 19th century, Jacob Burckhardt, once said that the 20th century would be the age of the simplifier and the slogan. His prediction has certainly come true. It is not only the totalitarians who have used the slogan and the simplification as a tool to deceive the people. It has also become an advertising and political tool to deceive the people in our society. This has certainly been the case in the present budget conflict.

Eminent economists have pointed out that the present inflation is not an ordinary one. It is not caused by excessive supply of money or greater demand for goods than we are capable of producing. This inflation is a much more subtle one. It is what Gardiner Means calls an administrative inflation. This kind of inflation involves a spiraling in prices in certain basic industries where oligopoly is king. The producers in these industries are noncompetitive. They are able to raise prices at will. They are able to raise prices even though the level of demand for their products has dropped.

In the competitive industries according to the price index from June 1958 through March 1959, there has been somewhat of a stabilization in price. Many economists feel that stability has been achieved because food prices have declined—a decline borne by the farmer in a falling share of the consumers' food dollar—while prices of transportation and medical care have increased.

On the other hand, over this same period of time, wholesale prices of very important groups of oligopoly oriented markets—where the market is controlled by a few great producers—iron and steel, nonferrous metals, hardware, agricultural machinery and equipment, construction and general purpose machinery and equipment, and motor vehicles, have continued to increase. These facts support one interpretation only: The possibilities of further price increase are to be found, if at all, only in the prices of manufactured products that are determined administratively and noncompetitively.

This inflation is the direct result of certain efforts on the part of economic royalists to increase profits to hitherto unbelievable heights, without lowering prices, expanding, or competing. The fact that the national budget is balanced for 1 year on the ledger books will in no way change the action of these men nor will the dollar be worth any more, nor will we have solved our present inflationary problems.

Another part of the Eisenhower economic program is the tight money policies of the Federal Reserve. Theoretically this policy is to discourage spending in the community in order to encourage competition among sellers and lower prices on goods. The results are exactly the opposite. We have had greater unemployment and more business failures than ever before. The reason why prices have climbed steadily is not hard to understand. A small businessman is destroyed by tight money policies. He is unable to compete because he cannot get credit or capital to either expand or stay in business. On the other hand, big business oligopolies are not sensitive to the policies of the Federal Reserve. Companies such as General Motors and Du Pont, have fantastic credit lines and fantastic reserves. Consequently, the upshot of this is that we depress competition and small business while strengthening monopoly and big business. The policies of this administration have made the American Government the prisoner of the big selfish economic interests in this country. Perpetuation of the present policies by the administration will do no more than strangle national growth and increase economic unemployment while raising prices.

Let the record show that I am for economy in Government. I believe that our entire defense budget should be examined. I believe that we are going to have some startling discoveries from the Hébert Subcommittee on Weapons Systems Contracts, and the Price Subcommittee on Manpower Utilization. I firmly believe that closer analysis of our defense budget will eliminate billions in waste.

I submit that we overhaul our farm program. I submit that the greatest spender of them all is Secretary Benson. He has spent over $30 billion of our money to prove a theory that was doomed from the start. Mr. Benson has spent more than the combined total spent by all of his predecessors since the beginning of that office in 1862.

When we talk about budget balancing, we should remember that President Truman balanced the budget 6 years out of his 7 years in office while paying $27 billion on the national debt. Furthermore, President Truman did this while saving Europe from famine and chaos through the Marshall plan, a so-called spending program.

And finally let me state that the House has a long record of showing more concern for a balanced budget than is shown by the President. We may take as examples the years 1954 to 1959, the terms of the 83d, 84th, and 85th Congresses. The reductions for 1954 and 1955 below the President's estimates of appropriations totaled $14.6 billion; for 1956 and 1957, the reductions totaled $2.3 billion; for 1958 and 1959 the reductions below the President's estimates totaled $5.7 billion. I am sure that the committees and the leadership of this Congress will continue throughout this session and the 1960 session to find more economic and effective ways of putting this Government's resources to use than the methods outlined in the President's budget.

The issues facing this Nation are much graver than this one—especially when we know that the kind of balancing the President calls for will work against the best interests of this Nation while strengthening the hand of the economic royalists.

Address by the Honorable Stuart Symington, U.S. Senator, at the Kansas Democratic Club in Topeka, Kans.

OF
HON. NEWELL A. GEORGE OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 15, 1959

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, a great address was delivered on the evening of April 11 by Hon. STUART SYMINGTON, U.S. Senator from Missouri, before a dinner meeting of the Kansas Democratic Club at the Municipal Auditorium in Topeka, Kans.

An overflow crowd of 600 heard Senator SYMINGTON and enthusiastically demonstrated their approval of his forceful speech. Seating arrangements were insufficient for nearly 300 who had purchased tickets and were compelled to dine in nearby hotels, most of whom returned and stood in the auditorium during the Senator's address.

Kansas democracy is extremely proud of our neighboring statesman from Missouri, and we hope he will return to the Sunflower State many times in the future and we are certain that he will contribute materially to the great Democratic victory that will be ours in 1960.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the address of Senator SYMINGTON be inserted in the RECORD and recommend that it be read by all Members of the House:

THE DEMOCRATIC PROGRAM: INVESTMENTS IN THE FUTURE OF AMERICA

It is a real privilege to be here at your annual banquet, and I am very grateful for the honor of being asked to come to Topeka.

This address tonight is not made easier by the distinction of the Democrats who have preceded me. The rollcall of former speakers at this banquet goes all the way back to that great popular leader of democracy, William Jennings Bryan.

It includes such distinguished Americans as Woodrow Wilson, Cordell Hull, and Jouett Shouse; and such good friends as Scott Lucas, Jim Farley, Tom Hennings, and Albert Gore.

In 1951, you were able to hear from that beloved gentleman whose loss we still feel deeply, Alben Barkley.

And in 1957, your speaker was the No. 1 Democrat—not only of my State, but also of the country—Harry S Truman.

Such distinguished predecessors make one humble; but it is comforting to remember you and I are neighbors.

Your State and mine have a common boundary, including a great river, and this boundary gives us common problems.

There was a time, shortly before, during and after the Civil War, when relations between Kansas and Missouri became a little strained. But that is all over now.

In fact, more and more Kansans and Missourians are seeing eye to eye on matters of politics.

The people of both our States have learned that the best way to obtain effective government for all the people is through the Democratic Party.

Look at the Democratic story right here in your great State.

Thirty years ago—even 20 years ago—if anyone had come to Topeka to talk to a Democratic meeting, he might well have talked to an almost empty hall. What a difference today. You have a Democratic Governor. You have three Democratic Congressmen, and last November you almost elected three more.

And let me make this prediction—in 1960 you'll elect not only three more Congressmen, but a United States Senator along with them.

Yes, my Democratic friends, the record shows that you are making Kansas a real two-party State. That is good for you, good for Kansas and good for America.

Much effort on the part of many people has gone into the building up of our party in Kansas.

And one feature stands out. That is the way your magnificent Governor, George Docking, has won the confidence of the citizens of Kansas.

He has placed your government on a basis of good business management, the kind of management so sadly lacking under the Republicans in Washington today.

Governor Docking has practiced sound economy without sacrificing State services. Through his open door policy toward visitors and the press, he has brought your government closer to the people than ever before.

Every Democrat in America is mighty proud of George Docking.

The Democratic Party has also been strengthened by the record of FLOYD BREEDING in Congress; and I am sure it will be strengthened even more by your new Congressmen, NEWELL GEORGE and DENVER HARGIS.

My friends, seven years ago a group of Republicans came here to Kansas to start a "Crusade."

Today the Republican Party in Washington has dropped all pretense of leading any "crusade."

The watchword on the Potomac now is "politics as usual."

Because time is running out on the Republican administration, capable men are becoming steadily harder to find.

Even when they are found, often they are passed over for important public office because they don't have the blessing of the Republican National Committee.

As their time runs out, we find public officials casting around for cushy corporation jobs in the industries they regulate. This practice does not aid their dedication to the public interest.

The result, if not at times chaos, is something pretty close to it.

In fiscal policy, the Republican theme for the next 2 years seems to be a take-off on the old western song: "There's a tax cut in the sky, by and by."

In defense policy, it is another song: "Praise the Lord, but spare the ammunition."

And this Republican administration is the only government in the history of the world which has undertaken to convince the people that they must reduce spending at home while increasing it abroad.

With such policies it is inevitable that the Republicans are approaching the brink of internal chaos among themselves.

Before last fall's elections, a prominent member of the administration wrote a book "A Republican Looks at His Party."

Now we understand he is writing a new one, "A Republican Looks for His Party."

The Republicans are now trying to pull themselves together for the next election—and so they have appointed a large committee whose sole job is to give their party a fresh new image in people's minds.

This phrase "public image" is a bit of Madison Avenue-ese that needs translation into plain English. It means not what you are, but what people think you are.

So the Republicans are trying to find out what will be the best thing for people to think they are. The answer to that is very simple—Democrats.

Any amusement over the plight of the Republican Party, however, should not distract us from where that party has now placed this country.

It takes little vision to realize that the challenge faced today is greater than any ever faced before by the United States.

The philosophy of State supremacy, as expressed in the Communist dictatorship, has declared economic, psychological, sociological, technological, political, and at times military war against us.

A mighty effort is being made to isolate us in a world where lethal weapons can go from continent to continent in less than 30 minutes. Yet our response to this challenge continues to be slow, grumbling, and inadequate.

The same is true here at home. We are not planning adequate education for our children, or proper conservation of our resources, or enough protection for those citizens who have made their contribution and have now reached the evening of their lives. The chief excuse the Republicans give for this drifting, both at home and abroad, is that if we try to do better we will spend ourselves into bankruptcy.

In 1889, for the first time in peacetime, the Congress appropriated a billion dollars. In those days the Speaker of the House was a Republican—Thomas Reed. And when people complained to him about his billion-dollar Congress, Tom Reed said: "Yes; but this is a billion-dollar country." I wish the Republicans today had some of Tom Reed's commonsense.

Measured by our national product, we now have a $450-billion country—the greatest, richest, most resourceful country in the world. We can afford whatever is necessary for the good of America.

We Democrats are labeled "reckless spenders," but this is just another charge not supported by the facts. Between 1947 and 1952 the Democratic administration showed a net surplus of $4 billion. Between the fiscal years of 1954 and 1959 the Republican administration operated at a net deficit of $20 billion. And last year this administration ran up the largest peacetime deficit in our history.

Now there is a significant difference between what the two parties want to spend for. We Democrats want to increase spending for assets—for schools and roads, hospitals and dams, and airports. Based on the record, Republicans have increased spending for interest. Since 1953 the annual interest on the national debt has increased by $1½ billion, and is now the second largest single item in the budget.

They want to save dollars. We do, too; but we also want to save farms and cities and useful lives.

They have adopted the philosophy that high permanent unemployment is now characteristic of capitalism. We want to give every American who wants to work a chance to work, in order to strengthen the country.

They believe in retrenchment to balance the budget. We believe the way to balance the budget is through the prosperity of full production.

The bills we Democrats are pushing in this Congress—bills for airports, schools, and housing—are not spending bills. They are investment bills—investments in a brighter future for America.

Some people say, "You're right; we do need these projects, but we can't afford them unless we either raise taxes or run a deficit." But if we had today a businesslike administration, we wouldn't have to raise taxes.

You all know my ideas of the billions which could be saved if we started operating our defenses on the basis of progress instead of continuing to let them drift on the basis of tradition.

Now let me give you another interesting case, released recently by the Internal Revenue Service. That Service audited some 36,000 returns of business and professional taxpayers. They found that, if the same kind of audit could be extended to 6,700,000 returns for the same year, the taxable income of these taxpayers would have been increased by 20 percent. And that would have yielded $2.7 billion in additional taxable income. In other words, if we had enforced efficiently the present tax laws, we could have obtained taxes on $2.7 billion more without changing the tax rates at all.

When it took office, this administration fired 3,000 people from the enforcement section of the Internal Revenue Department. What a false sense of economy. Even if the salaries of these 3,000 people averaged $10,000 a year—which they didn't—would the saving of that $30 million justify tax evaders dodging the payment of billions? So you see these poor managers have billions of dollars of additional taxable income available right under their noses if they would only put in good business practices to collect it.

As Americans, we want this tax money and all tax money to be spent for the best possible investments in prosperity and peace. As Kansans and Missourians, we know that one of the most solid of all investments lies in the control of water, primarily flood control.

We all remember the flood on the Kaw and the Missouri in 1951. It cost the Kansas City area alone $1 billion. The tax revenue lost to the Government as a result of that one flood was greater than the entire cost of the projects which could have prevented it.

Despite such occurrences, the present administration refuses to invest in water projects. Projects like those at Lawrence, Fort Scott, Melvern, and Hillsdale are being held up by the sharp budget ax of this Republican administration. The Republican policy toward water resource development seems to be: cut now, suffer later. Water projects are needed also for industrial development. New industries are springing up each day. Factories are looking for good places to locate. A new industry needs space and also needs a steady supply of adequate fresh water.

Kansas has acres of land ready for industrial development. If the abundant water resources you now have were properly utilized so they could go to work for industry, your future prosperity would be placed on a broader, firmer footing.

Now a word about our farm program. It is not necessary to tell a Kansas farmer that our present agriculture program is a mess. He knows it. In the past 6 years, the leaders in the Department of Agriculture have built a record which even they are now ashamed of. They have spent $30 billion of our money on a farm program that just doesn't work. Secretary Ezra Taft Benson has spent more money than all the 14 preceding Secretaries of Agriculture combined. And what has he produced? Low farm prices, high food prices, and a mountain of surplus foods.

Before coming into Government, I was a businessman for a good many years. If any businessman tried to run his plant or office the way the Department of Agriculture has been run for over 6 years, he would go broke. Back in 1952 and 1953, the Eisenhower-Benson crusade was going to get the Government out of farming. Well, let's look at the record. In January of 1953, the Commodity Credit Corporation owned $1 billion of farm commodities. In January of 1959—just 6 years later—that inventory was well over $5 billion. And according to the latest Department of Agriculture report, just released last week, the total investment in farm commodities—inventories and loans—is over $9 billion.

But this is not all, because in his last budget message to Congress, the President admitted that by June of 1960, the total investment would be $10 billion. Based on information presented to the Senate Agriculture Committee, and my own study of the situation, I believe the President much underestimated, and that by June 1960 Government investment in farm commodities will be close to $12 billion. How's that for getting the Government out of farming?

Mr. Benson goes around the country speaking in such great agricultural centers as various city chambers of commerce, complaining about the farm problem. But what plans has he made to solve that problem?

A few weeks ago, when Mr. Benson came before our committee to ask authority to spend more billions, we asked him questions any banker would ask a businessman who requested a loan. I asked him if he had any definite plans to move his gigantic inventory. He conferred with several of his 14 assistants who were back-stopping him at the hearing. Then said he had no definite plans.

I asked him how much inventory he thought he would move this year. He said he did not know.

I asked him how long it would take to move it. He said he didn't know that either.

Mr. Benson should know that his farm program is bankrupt primarily because it is based on the false theory that the way to lower farm production is to reduce farm prices. As millions of farmers and many of us in Congress have insisted for a number of years, this theory just does not work. And here is why. We all know there are fixed costs connected with farming—payments on notes and mortgages, installment payments on equipment, out-of-pocket costs for fertilizer, seed, fuel, and such. In recent years, these costs have been steadily going up. To meet these fixed and out of pocket expenses, and at the same time take care of family expenses, farmers must have a minimum income. That income, of course, is derived from price times volume minus costs.

If your price goes down at the same time your costs go up—and that has been the case in recent years—you have only two choices: increase your volume, or go broke.

In the past 6 years nearly 4 million farm people have been forced off our farms. But the rest of our farmers have taken the other course. They have taken advantage of every new technique of farming to vastly increase their production.

The story on wheat is a typical example. Since 1952, wheat price supports have dropped from $2.20 to $1.80. Has this brought about lower production or expanded consumption? Of course not.

While the price of wheat to farmers has dropped 18 percent since 1952, per capita consumption of wheat has decreased 11 percent. Last year wheat production set an all-time high—nearly 1.5 billion bushels—and this was with some 5 million acres in the soil bank.

In an effort to deal with the wheat situation, the Senate Agriculture Committee asked the Secretary to submit a new wheat bill. He offered two alternative suggestions. One of these was, in effect, no price-support program at all. Under this alternative, wheat price supports would be as low as 75 percent, not of parity, but of the average price during the last 3 years. It is a farce to call this a price support. A price 25 percent below what you have been getting isn't any support. At best, it is a floor with a hole in it.

The ultimate goal of the Eisenhower-Benson wheat plan is to lower prices until "price supports are adapted to feed use relationships." Those are Mr. Benson's own words.

Do you know what the price of wheat would be under such an arrangement?

My good friend, Senator MILT YOUNG, of North Dakota, and I asked the Agriculture Department about this. They finally admitted that, at present corn and feed grain prices, wheat price supports would be between $1.15 and $1.20 a bushel, in order to be at "feed use relationship." Long before the price got that low, thousands of wheat farmers would go broke, and Mr. Benson knows it.

The other alternative wheat plan suggested by the administration would lower prices; and, at the same time, sharply reduce wheat acreage. This is no wheat program. It is just a rehash of the same old Benson policy of economic attrition.

With the cooperation of the farmers of America, we in the Congress plan to write a new farm bill. This bill will include an effective wheat program based on sound economic principles, and on the belief that farm families deserve an opportunity to earn a return on their labor, investment and managerial ability comparable to that earned by other segments of the economy.

Last month we held comprehensive hearings on new wheat legislation; and heard representatives from many of the farm organizations, from the National Association of Wheat Growers, and from others interested in sound new wheat legislation.

There are certain basic requirements which must be included in any sound effective farm program. That program must give the farmer a fair price for his product. It must give farmers the tools whereby they can compete more favorably with the other closely organized segments of the economy. Any sound long-range farm program must be designed to bring farm production more nearly in line with realistic needs—at home and abroad.

It must face up to the gigantic inventory problem. The productive capacity of the American farmer is not an economic curse. It is, and it should be handled as, a blessing. With wise policies, we can use this capacity to further prosperity at home and peace and prosperity abroad.

Millions of our own people in the United States are undernourished. One hundred thousand children in one of our States have only one-third of the calories and proteins they need in their daily diet. Throughout the world, millions suffer from starvation, while the food that could nourish them, stored at a cost the President himself says amounts to a billion dollars a year, wastes away in our storage bins and warehouses.

The people of other nations are like our people. They want peace in the world. They want food and clothing for themselves and their children. If we can move our food inventories to people in need, we will be using our country's greatest blessing to accomplish our country's noblest purpose.

Twice in our history while under Democratic leadership, this Nation has been called upon to fight for freedom. Today, as Democrats, but primarily as Americans, we demand that our country be made strong enough to preserve our freedom. But this in no way impairs our dedication to peace. In fact, it would further that dedication.

The two greatest charters of peace in our history were drafted by Democrats, the 14 points of Woodrow Wilson and the 4 freedoms of Franklin Roosevelt. Today, we Democrats again advocate the path to peace through a universal disarmament agreement, negotiated from a position of strength.

With firm leadership, we can create an America greater than any we have ever known. With firm leadership we can create the kind of permanent peace our forefathers and our sons dreamed of and died for.

We should dedicate ourselves to creating the kind of permanent peace that would justify our going anywhere in the world and saying with even greater pride, "I am an American."

Inching Along Toward Peace

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 15, 1959

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on March 30, during the recent Easter recess, it was my privilege to address the Dade County Bar Association in Miami, Fla. I spoke on the subject of the Berlin crisis and set forth my ideas on the course of action we should follow in order to protect free West Berlin and maintain the peace.

I ask unanimous consent that my address, entitled "Inching Along Toward Peace," be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INCHING ALONG TOWARD PEACE

(Address by Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, Democrat, of Minnesota, before Dade County Bar Association, Miami, Fla., March 30, 1959)

We live in a time of continuous crisis. We have been numbed by screaming headlines about Suez, Germany, Baghdad, and Budapest. Now we are in the middle of the Berlin crisis. This is not just another international crisis. It is probably the most serious and fateful problem faced by the United States and the free world since the end of World War II.

We all know what is at stake in Berlin—the two things we value most—peace and freedom. A false move or a serious miscalculation could be the spark that would ignite a nuclear holocaust. If free West Berlin falls, it is not inconceivable that West Germany would eventually follow, and if West Germany falls, the nightmare of a new tyranny would sweep over all of Europe.

Berlin is the focal point in the mighty struggle between Communist tyranny and the free world. The situation is fraught with danger. But I believe that firmness, wisdom, and solidarity with our closest allies will give us the strength we need to meet the challenge posed by Mr. Khrushchev's thinly disguised ultimatum which falls due on May 27.

In my remarks about the seriousness of the Berlin crisis I would like to make a few general observations in the interests of understanding. I do not want to say or do anything that will make the job of the executive branch any more difficult than it now is. In fact, I seriously considered whether I should say anything at all in public on so delicate an issue. I hope my comments will help to clarify the situation in its deepest and broadest aspects.

A sound policy toward the Berlin crisis will require all the patience, understanding, and courage we can muster.

If the American people understand the depth of the crisis I believe they will be willing to pay the price to save West Berlin. We know that peace and freedom are indivisible and that both are at stake in Berlin. And if freedom is snuffed out in Berlin the cause of freedom and justice throughout the world will suffer.

The gravity of the Berlin crisis necessitates that we enter into face-to-face talks with Russian leaders.

In his address to the American people the President rightly insisted on both firmness and our willingness to negotiate—as many of us have been urging. I am gratified that he is now willing to go to the summit.

We must always be ready to undertake any honorable move that will further prospects of peace.

The test of our greatness and leadership is not to be found in the formalities of diplomacy, but, rather, in the sincerity of our purpose. With a large part of the world in the control of dictators, vital decisions will be made by heads of state. To suggest otherwise is to ignore the real facts of political life. Therefore, let us proceed to the summit conference fully prepared with purpose and program, and in unity with our allies. We must do our homework better than we have in the past, and know what we want and what we are going to propose.

The willingness to negotiate is only the beginning, not the end, of a responsible policy toward the German situation. Our major problem now is to develop a viable negotiating posture in concert with Britain, France, and West Germany. To enter into talks with the Russians, either at the foreign ministers' level or heads of state level, ill-prepared or disunited, is to invite humiliation and even disaster.

I want to emphasize to you today my belief that it would be excessively imprudent to hold the proposed summit conference without utilizing the unique facilities of the United Nations.

As we go into the coming summit conference, we need to invoke the moral authority of the purposes and principles embodied in the charter of the United Nations.

And, in my opinion, the best way to do it effectively is to hold the summit conference within the framework of the United Nations.

We can't be part-time members of the U.N. turning to it in desperation at the last moment only after we have bungled efforts to solve the world's problems alone. We can't take an off-again, on-again attitude toward the United Nations, if we want to help keep it an effective force for peace.

When we had a crisis in the Middle East and Russia proposed a summit conference, we insisted that any such conference be held through the United Nations.

Yet now, as we approach a summit conference which all agree is urgent, we seem to have regrettably turned our back on the U.N.—and our back upon our other allies we represent in the occupation of Berlin.

The presence of the Secretary-General at a summit conference would mean the symbolic representation of all the members of the United Nations who may object to four powers presuming to settle an issue which can mean peace or war for the entire world. Peace is the responsibility of all nations.

It is not only the conference itself which should be brought within the framework of the United Nations. There is also the brighter prospect through such a conference of bringing within the framework of the United Nations the administration of any eventual agreement of a safer regime for Berlin. Such a regime might well include a permanent U.N. presence for Berlin.

The United Nations Charter recognizes the role of normal diplomacy, and charges the nations to seek solutions to their problems in the first instance through peaceful means of their own choice.

Nevertheless, the presumption must be that in dealing with general problems which threaten international peace and security, international conferences should be conducted within the framework of the United Nations.

The United Nations offers many advantages for international conferences, whether involving few or many States.

One of the advantages of a conference within the framework of the U.N. is that such a conference has the moral backing of the charter, and would be directed toward objectives compatible with the purposes of the charter.

Our purpose, in any summit conference, would stand that test. It would be Soviet purposes that would become subjected to world scrutiny.

WHAT THE COMMUNISTS WANT

It seems to me that the Soviet Union wants three things in Europe and has created the Berlin crisis as a lever to gain them:

1. The Soviet Union wants the three Western Powers to get out of West Berlin. It ultimately wants the entire city to be under complete Communist control.

2. She wants to use the Berlin crisis to force the Western Powers to negotiate an all-German settlement favorable to the Soviet Union. She prefers a united Germany tied closely to the Communist bloc. She will settle immediately for two Germanies. In other words, the status quo with East Germany the Communist state under firm Soviet control and influence. The least acceptable alternative that the Soviet appears willing to consider is a neutralized and denuclearized Germany which she hopes eventually to swallow up, by one means or another.

3. The Soviet Union sees in the Berlin crisis an opportunity to split the Western alliance. We must never forget that the primary objective of Soviet policy in Europe is to weaken NATO and to divide the United States from her allies. We cannot permit any of these Soviet objectives to be fulfilled. It is inconceivable that we would retreat from West Berlin. To do so would be to forfeit world leadership and in fact to become a second-rate power. I am convinced that the Soviet Union prefers to gain its political objective in Europe without nuclear war, and I know that the United States and our allies want to avoid a nuclear Armageddon.

We should make every effort to avoid getting into a position where we would be required to use force first. I am sure our Government will do everything possible to avoid a provocative or hostile act. We should, however, make it crystal clear that we will not be forced out of Berlin, nor be denied access to or in any way accede to any effort to starve into submision the West Berlin population. It must be clearly understood by Moscow and East Germany that we are prepared to take any action necessary in support of these policies and commitments.

U.S. POLICY OF RESOLUTE FIRMNESS

Last November I stood in West Berin with its able and courageous mayor, Willy Brandt. I vowed then, and I vow today, to support a policy of firmness, to uphold the right of France, Britain, and the United States to maintain garrisons in West Berlin until a legitimate peace treaty is signed.

This is the position and policy of our Government. We can all be grateful that we do not stand alone. Britain, France, and the 12 other members of the NATO alliance stand with us. We will not surrender. We will not be pushed out.

What does standing firm mean? It does not mean holding fast inflexibility to old positions which have helped to produce the present unhappy stalemate. The real issue, said Walter Lippmann recently, is "whether to stand pat on positions that have become untentable or to move to new positions from which the Western allies can recover the political initiative." Standing firm means that we must match our firmness with imagination, courage, and a willingness to negotiate with the Soviet Union. It means firmness in our fundamental position and flexibility in our strategy and tactics. Standing firm and willingness to negotiate are not, as some people suggest, contradictory policies. They are two elements in any viable policy in the Berlin crisis. We must stand firm in order to negotiate effectively. And we must have solid bases for negotiation if we want to stand firm.

It is imperative that the best minds of our country—those persons qualified as experts on the problems of Central Europe and Germany as well as Soviet policies and tactics—be called upon at once for intensive consultation directed toward policy formulation.

In the weeks between now and May 27, we, in concert with our allies, must explore every possible honorable means that can ease this crisis and point in the direction of a just and equitable settlement.

It is not enough just to negotiate and talk. We must have clearly in mind the objectives we seek, and the means and ways of achieving those objectives without bargaining away the rights of others, or in any way weakening our own security.

I am gratified that our Government is at last taking anew the leadership in preparing for these important conferences.

Yet I would be less than candid if I did not warn the American not to expect quick and easy solutions out of the impending negotiations.

It must constantly be kept in mind that there are no short-time, short-run, immediate answers to these grave, perplexing, long-range problems. Negotiations will require persistent patience. They will require a willingness to endure almost unbelievable, tedious discussions of long duration.

But we must be perpared to negotiate and negotiate as long as there is the slightest prospect of relieving world tension and minimize the danger of war.

The hope of peace and understanding with the Soviet Union is not to be found in political deals.

We cannot leap over our problems and differences.

They must be slowly chipped away, through our contacts in the United Nations, our participations with the Soviet in the U.N. agencies, through our exchange programs, and what we hope will be gradual changes within the Soviet Union.

At best, we will inch along toward peace and understanding.

Let us hope and pray we have the emotional stability and maturity to persevere. And let us hope and pray that no attempts will be made to find quick solutions which will ultimately be regretted because of ill-considered actions or ill-advised consideration.

We know that our national security is not and should not be a partisan matter. But genuine bipartisanship in foreign policy does not mean that the loyal opposition silently acquiesces in all policies advanced by the administration.

The Berlin crisis is both a danger and an opportunity. It is a danger to world peace if we display signs of weakness, indecision, or appeasement. It is an opportunity if we recognize the sharpness of the crisis and proceed to explore every means of peaceful settlement, not only of the Berlin and German situation, but indeed the relationships between the United States, its allies, and the Soviet Union in all of Central Europe. Wise, prudent, and courageous statesmanship is needed now as never before. We must be prepared to follow the course that may be tedious, frustrating, and characterized by insults, threats, and abuses for months to come. The war of nerves has been intensified.

In this struggle, the victory will come to those who clearly understand the relationship between power and principle, maneuver, and objective. We cannot afford to be found wanting in any of these.

Make no mistake about it, a policy of firmness with negotiation is the only policy that will avoid surrender on the one side, and minimize the risks of war on the other.

COOPERATION WITH ALLIES AND RESTRAINT URGED

We must act in harmony with our allies, Britain, France, and West Germany. This means more than coordinating our pronouncements about standing firm. It means hammering out a unified policy and strategy to give us strength for bargaining, and to undergird our determination if negotiation should break down.

If we had worked a bit closer with our allies and had strengthened the consultative process within NATO during the past 5 years, perhaps we would be in a better position than we are today. But let bygones be bygones. If we ever needed the wisdom, strength, and counsel of trusted allies we need them now.

Yes, these are dangerous days and the situation is explosive. But these are also great and challenging days where spiritual and brain power may save us from the dangerous alternative of the use of firepower.

The alternative to war is peace, and it is in the pursuit of peace that we will find our greatness and fulfill our destiny.

Boland Pays Tribute to Secretary Dulles

OF

HON. EDWARD P. BOLAND

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 15, 1959

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am saddened to learn of the resignation of Secretary of State Dulles. I am sure that all of the peoples of the free world feel likewise. He had a profound knowledge of world affairs gleaned over a lifetime of study and experience.

In my judgment, he was a great Secretary of State who served in that post during one of the most difficult diplomatic periods in the history of our Nation.

DULLES' CONTRIBUTION TO MAINTENANCE OF WESTERN ALLIANCE

Despite great personal sacrifices, he made exhausting trips throughout the world and successfully matched wits with the Communists. His contribution was immeasurable in keeping the Western Alliance together under the most trying circumstances.

His role was compounded with difficulty because he could place little or no reliance on the words of his Soviet adversaries. Yet he had a sixth sense in anticipating Soviet weakness and he was a master at persuading Western statesmen to stand firm with him on vital issues. His adamant position forced the Soviet to retreat many times.

HE WAS ONE OF THE WORLD'S OUTSTANDING STATESMEN

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that when historians view his tenure in perspective, they will record that Secretary of State Dulles was one of the outstanding statesmen in the fight against the spread of communism.

SENATE

THURSDAY, APRIL 16, 1959

(Legislative day of Wednesday, April 15, 1959)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Thou who art from everlasting to everlasting, and who changeth not, abide with us, even as earth's joys grow dim and its glories pass away.

With tender solicitude, we lift up in our prayer this day a great servant of the State whose iron will, moral standards, and passion for the coronation of righteousness and decency in international affairs, across these critical years, have been a bulwark of our liberties and the voice of our America, as our free land has faced, and faces, ruthless foes bent on her destruction.

As with courage which shames our coward fears and a faith deep-rooted in a religion which is his very life, Thy servant—John Foster Dulles—stands in the valley of the shadow, while the Nation he serves with such devotion and the free world cemented in unity by his wisdom and inflexible exertions lift grateful petitions for the smitten warrior who is facing the unseen with a cheer. May he fear no evil, as Thy rod and Thy staff comfort and sustain him.

And, as with his faith, we face the crisis of the coming days—

God be in our head,
And in our understanding;
God be in our eyes,
And in our looking;
God be in our mouth,
And in our speaking;
God be in our heart,
And in our thinking;
God be at our end,
And at our departing.

In the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, April 15, 1959, was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 2228. An act to provide for the acquisition of additional land along the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway in exchange for certain dredging privileges, and for other purposes; and

H.J. Res. 254. Joint resolution to authorize participation by the United States in parliamentary conferences with Canada.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 144. An act to modify Reorganization Plan No. 11 of 1939 and Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953;

S. 1096. An act to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for salaries and expenses, research and development, construction and equipment, and for other purposes; and

H.J. Res. 336. Joint resolution making a supplemental appropriation for the Department of Labor for the fiscal year 1959, and for other purposes.

HOUSE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The following bill and joint resolution were each read twice by their titles and referred as indicated:

H.R. 2228. An act to provide for the acquisition of additional land along the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway in exchange for certain dredging privileges, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Works.

H.J. Res. 254. Joint resolution to authorize participation by the United States in parliamentary conferences with Canada; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. MANSFIELD, and by unanimous consent, the following subcommittees were authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today:

The Judiciary Subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia. The Constitutional Amendments Subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary. The Antitrust and Monopoly Legislation Subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary.

On request of Mr. GOLDWATER, and by unanimous consent, the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights of the Committee on the Judiciary was authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be the usual morning hour for the introduction of bills and the transaction of other routine business, and that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the PRESIDENT pro tempore:

A petition from the Magyar Publishing Co., of New York, N.Y., signed by Dr. Laszlo Ujlaky, president, Stephen Somody, editor, and Geza Korda, associate editor, relating to free elections for the people of Hungary, East Germany, and other slave states of the Soviet empire; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mrs. SMITH:

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Maine; to the Committee on Armed Services:

"JOINT RESOLUTION MEMORIALIZING CONGRESS TO EQUALIZE RETIREMENT BENEFITS FOR RETIRED MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES WHO RETIRED PRIOR TO JUNE 1, 1958

"We, your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of Maine in the 99th Legislative Session assembled, most respectfully present and petition your honorable body as follows:

" 'Whereas, there is now pending before the Congress of the United States legislation concerning the improvement of benefits for retired members of the United States Armed Forces who retired prior to June 1, 1958; and

" 'Whereas there appears to be no basis for the gross discrimination against retired personnel who retired before June 1, 1958, as they are, by reason of past meritorious services, equally entitled to the increased benefits granted personnel who retire, or have retired, after such date; and

" 'Whereas this false distinction violates the basic precepts of fair play and the circumstances of retirement should not penalize these honorable members of our society, who must meet the present ever-increasing cost of living the same as personnel that retired after June 1, 1958: Now, therefore, be it

" 'Resolved, That we, the memorialists, recommend to the Congress of the United States that legislation be enacted that will increase the retirement benefits of the retired personnel who retired prior to June 1, 1958, so that they will be treated equally with personnel who retire, or have retired, after such date; and be it further

" 'Resolved, That a copy of this memorial, duly authenticated by the secretary of state, be immediately transmitted by the secretary of state to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from Maine in the Congress of the United States.'

"CHESTER T. WINSLOW,
"Secretary, Senate.
"HARVEY R. PEASE,
"Clerk, House of Representatives."

RESOLUTION OF SENATE OF ILLINOIS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I present, for appropriate reference, a resolution adopted by the Senate of the 71st General Assembly of the State of Illinois, with regard to unemployment compensation, and the adequacy of the system which prevails in our own State.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE RESOLUTION 19

Resolved by the senate of the 71st general assembly,

Whereas there is legislation pending in the Congress of the United States, relating to unemployment compensation, which would compel the various States to drastically amend their unemployment compensation laws to conform with Federal standards; and

Whereas Illinois is firmly dedicated to the beliefs that the individual States are best qualified to determine the provisions of their unemployment compensation statutes based upon the economic conditions of the States and the needs of their citizens; and

Whereas the Illinois General Assembly, over the years, has made amendments to the Illinois Unemployment Compensation Act through mutual agreement of a tri-partite board which has provided for equitable treatment of employees and employers and the general assembly is now in session considering further improvements in its unemployment compensation program; and

Whereas the Illinois General Assembly recently enacted legislation to pay extended benefits independently of Federal action and without the use of Federal funds: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Illinois State Senate, That it opposes Federal legislation which would compel the various States to provide minimum unemployment compensation standards in conformity with Federal laws, thus depriving the Illinois General Assembly of its rightful authority and responsibility in such matters; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent by the secretary of state to the President of the United States; Secretary of Labor of the United States; Senate minority leader, EVERETT MCKINLEY DIRKSEN; Senator PAUL H. DOUGLAS, and all Members of the U.S. House of Representatives from Illinois.

Adopted by the senate, March 25, 1959.

JOHN WM. CHAPMAN,
President of the Senate.
EDWARD E. FERNANDES,
Secretary of the Senate.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION OF KANSAS LEGISLATURE

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, the Kansas Legislature, which has recently concluded its biennial session, adopted House Concurrent Resolution 31, memorializing the Congress and the President of the United States to safeguard and preserve established State and individual rights to the use of water within the separate States.

The control of water runoff within the State of Kansas is of great importance to the future growth and development of the State.

It is essential that we have an overall program dealing with this problem in cooperation with Federal agencies.

During the past few years, great progress has been made within my State, and I sincerely hope that no decision of the executive or the judicial branches of the Government will interfere with the continued mutual cooperation in a program which is so vital.

I ask unanimous consent that this resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the proper committee.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 31

Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress and the President of the United States to safeguard and preserve established State and individual rights to the use of water within the separate States

Whereas despite repeated congressional recognition in many statutes such as the Federal Power Act, and the Water Supply Act of 1958, that the States have and should have the primary interest, a series of judicial decisions in the last decade and a half has undermined the ability of the States to perform their appropriate tasks in this field and has suggested the possibility of unlimited Federal prerogatives concerning water which cast doubt on the basis of vested rights and weakens the ability of the States successfully to coordinate water use; and

Whereas recent opinions and assertions from the U.S. Department of Justice would deprive States and persons of rights which said States and persons previously enjoyed, to regulate and control the use of water in those respective States; and

Whereas said decisions of the Federal courts and opinions and assertions of the U.S. Department of Justice are further a part of a general pattern developing gradually into Federal supremacy and usurpation over water, which, if continued will destroy individual and States rights over water, and substitute in lieu thereof an all-powerful centralized Government control thereover; and

Whereas Kansas and the numerous Federal agencies do now and have always enjoyed a spirit of cooperation in the development of flood control and water resources programs and it is the wish of the people of Kansas that such interest and cooperation be preserved and continue in the future; and

Whereas factors involved in water use development are peculiarly dependent on local geography, climate, and economic needs and are consequently best handled within our Federal system by the State level of government; and

Whereas the traditional role of the States in the administration, conservation, and utilization of their water resources has led in the direction of optimum harmonious development of these water resources; and

Whereas Federal agencies which have complied with State water law in obedience to the expressed intent of Congress have not jeopardized any of the legitimate interests of the Federal Government; and

Whereas doubts raised by these judicial decisions and Department of Justice opinions as to the basis of vested water rights, present and future, and doubts as to the relationships between the Federal and State Governments will, without corrective congressional action, tend to delay much needed water development for an indefinite time and discourage the States in their efforts to make much needed improvements in their facilities for water resources planning and development: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas, the Senate concurring therein, That the Congress and President of the United States and the Representatives of Kansas in the Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby respectfully urged and requested to take all necessary action to (1) preserve the water rights of the individual and the States and to prevent Federal usurpation of those rights; (2) to see that legislation is initiated and supported to reestablish to the individuals and to the States, the rights taken from them by the Federal courts and the Justice Department; and (3) in every possible way reaffirm, renew, and defend the concepts that water rights are property rights and that these established rights to the use of water, by a State or an individual, should not be taken away without due process of law and adequate compensation. Be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to transmit enrolled copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress, to the chairman of the U.S. Senate and House Committees of Interior and Insular Affairs, to U.S. Senator ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL, to U.S. Senator FRANK CARLSON, and to U.S. Representatives WILLIAM AVERY, NEWELL GEORGE, DENVER HARGIS, ED REES, FLOYD BREEDING, and WINT SMITH.

I hereby certify that the above concurrent resolution originated in the house, and was adopted by that body March 13, 1959.

JOE TAYLOR,
Speaker of the House.
G. E. ANDERSEN,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Adopted by the senate March 21, 1959.

JOSEPH W. HINKLE, Sr.,
President of the Senate.
RALPH E. ZARKER,
Secretary of the Senate.

RESOLUTION OF IRRIGATION COMMITTEE OF MIDDLE RIO GRANDE PUEBLOS, N. MEX.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted December 19, 1958, by the Irrigation Committee of the Middle Rio Grande Pueblos in New Mexico.

The resolution compliments John Thompson, the project manager, Middle Rio Grande project, Albuquerque, N. Mex., an employee of the Bureau of Reclamation, for his outstanding work.

In this praise, I concur. The chairman of the committee, Diego Abeita, who transmitted the resolution, is an outstanding citizen of New Mexico. He is highly respected by both the Indians and non-Indians and is devoted to the improvement of irrigated farming on the Indian pueblos. He has contributed greatly to his people in the Isleta and other pueblos.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This resolution was adopted December 19, 1958, by the irrigation committee of the Middle Rio Grande Pueblos, consisting of eight pueblos—Cochiti, Santo Domingo, San Felipe, Santa Ana, Sandia Isleta, Jemez, and Zia—at a regularly called meeting of the committee attended by the governors and their staffs of all of said pueblos, and all of the members of the committee:

"Whereas for years we have watched the work of Mr. John C. Thompson, project manager of Middle Rio Grande project, in rehabilitating the work of the Middle Rio Grande Conservancy District and doing heroic work in salvaging water of the Rio Grande, the lifeline of our people; and

"Whereas in doing this work Mr. Thompson has always patiently listened to the needs and even the demands of our pueblos and, wherever possible, he has done his very best to meet our needs; and

"Whereas under our claim to water rights Mr. Thompson, under direction of the Secretary of the Interior, has stored water for our requirements in El Vado Reservoir and made the water available to us, whenever possible, at the time it was needed; and

"Whereas it has recently come to our attention that our friend, Congressman BEN F. JENSEN, after inspecting the work done by Mr. Thompson and his staff, observed, out of his wide knowledge of all the reclamation projects in the country, that the Middle Rio Grande project is being handled probably better than any other project in the country. Knowing Mr. Thompson and his staff, that is easy to believe; and

"Whereas so many hardworking, thoroughly able and faithful public servants of the United States hardly ever get complimented by those they serve until they drop dead, we feel we should tell Mr. Thompson how we feel: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we express our sincere appreciation and deep gratitude to Mr. Thompson for the outstanding work he is doing on the Middle Rio Grande project and for what he has done for us, even though he has not given us all we wanted. But even more, we want Mr. Thompson and his staff to know how thankful we are, and the Secretary of the Interior and the other superiors of the project people ought to be, for having such outstanding people do such excellent work; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to all interested parties including Mr. Thompson, the Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation, the Regional Director of the Bureau of Reclamation, our congressional delegation, the Secretary of the Interior and, so long as we mentioned him, to the Honorable BEN F. JENSEN."

DIEGO ABEITA,
Isleta Pueblo, Chairman, Irrigation Committee of the Middle Rio Grande Pueblos.

I hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true and correct copy of a resolution unanimously adopted by the irrigation committee of the Middle Rio Grande pueblos at the time and place shown.

Dated this 18th day of March 1959.

DOMINGO MONTOYA,
Acting Secretary, Irrigation Committee of the Middle Rio Grande Pueblos.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. HUMPHREY, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, without amendment:

S. 690. A bill to provide for the increased use of agricultural products for industrial purposes (Rept. No. 193); and

S. 753. A bill to authorize cooperative associations of milk producers to bargain with purchasers singly or in groups, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 192).

By Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, with an amendment:

S. 1289. A bill to increase and extend the special milk program for children (Rept. No. 194).

RELEASE OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED COPPER—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, on behalf of the chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], I report favorably, without amendment, the resolution (S. Res. 101) opposing the release at the present time of any part of any Government inventory of copper, and I submit a report (No. 191) thereon. The resolution was unanimously approved by the committee and deals with the release of Government-owned copper at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). The report will be received, and the resolution will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I wish to congratulate the Senator from Arizona for reporting the resolution, which, I understand, was reported unanimously by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. It is an indication of the fact that the committee most closely connected with mining in all its phases is aware of the difficulty which the possibility of the Government stockpile being released imposes upon the copper economy at this time.

I should like to ask the Senator a question. Is it the Senator's understanding that there are three Government stockpiles; that two of them are subject to the will of Congress, so to speak, and that the remaining one is outside that sphere and is subject only to the will of the Administrator of OCDM?

Mr. GOLDWATER. It is my understanding that the Senator is correct in that statement. What concerns us, of course, is the lack of control we have over the administered stockpile. I have been talking about this problem with the White House.

I am sorry I was not on the floor when the Senator made his remarks. At the time I was on the telephone talking with the White House on this problem. I have been informed that Dr. Hoegh released a statement yesterday which, I understand, the Senator from Montana has read into the RECORD. That statement is not conclusive enough to allay the fears of the world copper market. I have been informed by word of mouth that it is not the intention to release any of the copper at the present time. I have asked the White House if it would instruct Mr. Hoegh to make a more definite statement than he has made, so that the world copper markets might not be so frightened, and that thereby a stop be put to the decline in the world price of copper.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I should like to say that I wish the administration, through a spokesman of the OCDM would make a statement more in accord with what the Senator from Arizona said yesterday, namely, that "this copper should be removed to a jurisdiction which would prevent any possibility that it could be dumped on the markets."

The spokesman for the OCDM said yesterday: "We have made no decision to release or offer copper for sale on the open market at this time." It is a very indefinite statement and one which, if allowed to stand, can only bring about a further depreciation in the copper economy and a further depression in prices.

I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point an article published in the Daily Metal Reporter entitled "Oppose Release of Copper From Government Stocks," and an article published in the American Metal Market of April 16, 1959, entitled "Possible Copper Sale by Government Puts Market in Turmoil."

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Daily Metal Reporter, Apr. 16, 1959]

OPPOSE RELEASE OF COPPER FROM GOVERNMENT STOCKS—OCDM STUDIES QUESTION; STATE, INTERIOR DEPARTMENTS AND SENATORS HIT MOVE

WASHINGTON.—The State and Interior Departments are said to be up in arms as a result of the decision by the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization to look into the advisability of liquidating some 130,000 tons of nonstrategic copper that the Government acquired under its floor-price contracts with producers. The GSA lacked funds with which to buy this copper and put it into the stockpile, it is stated here, and hence this metal is available for sale without any authorization by Congress. The State and Interior Departments are said to be carrying the matter to the President who would be in a position to countermand any decisions that the OCDM may be contemplating.

The recommendation that the OCDM liquidate this nonstrategic copper is said to have been made by J. Roy Price, who retired from Union Carbide Co. some years ago where he was in charge of research in the company's plastic department. He was appointed Assistant Director for Resources and Production in the OCDM by President Eisenhower and is on full time with the agency, an official stated.

The OCDM was considering the disposal of the copper in small quantities so that it will not affect the market, a top official of the agency stated. He stressed the fact that no decision has been made as yet, but that the OCDM is reviewing the question because of market conditions. The official said that no decision is likely for a few days.

News of what the OCDM was contemplating touched off a storm of protest on the part of Senators and Congressmen from the mining States.

A group of western Senators called on the administration to deny reports that large stocks of copper will be sold from the Government stockpile.

Senator MANSFIELD, Democrat, of Montana, and seven other Senators introduced in the Senate a resolution declaring it to be the sense of the Senate that release of these stocks would do "incalculable danger to the national security and to the economic well-being of the Nation."

The Montanan, who is the Senate Democratic whip, also revealed that he and the other Senators Tuesday sent a letter to Defense Mobilizer Leo Hoegh protesting the reports.

The letter said the Senators were disturbed by the reports that the Government might sell up to 128,000 short tons from the copper stockpile, and urged Mr. Hoegh to announce immediately that there were no plans to release this tonnage.

Unless this is done, Senator MANSFIELD and his colleagues warned in their letter, a further drop in copper prices is inevitable.

Mr. MANSFIELD told the Senate that he had understood that the recommendation for the sale had been made by a "Mr. Price," who he described as a gentleman living on Long Island and visiting Washington once a week as a Defense Mobilization consultant.

STATE OF CONFUSION IN COPPER

The OCDM report from Washington threw the copper market into a state of confusion. This was especially the case with respect to the commodity exchange where prices at one time were down by as much as 160 points. At the close the prices were 85 to 102 points below Tuesday's close. The turnover was 1,180 lots (29,500 tons).

THE FAT'S IN THE FIRE

In copper circles the feeling prevailed that no matter what the OCDM decision is, the "fat's in the fire" in that it is now common knowledge that there are some 128,000 tons of Government-owned copper overhanging the market which may be released at any time. The immediate effects are likely to be psychological in nature. One will probably be a damper on speculative enthusiasm. Another is the calming if not the elemination of consumers' fears of a copper shortage.

The market already has felt the effects of the Washington report. There was the price slump on the commodity exchange. While custom smelters booked fair-sized orders early in the day at 32 cents a pound, consumers virtually withdrew from the market as buyers in the afternoon. Dealers were unable to interest buyers at 31½ cents a pound f.o.b. refinery.

The large primary producers maintained their price at 31½ cents a pound delivered.

The sales reported for Tuesday amounted to 5,064 tons of which 3,889 tons were for shipment this month, 850 tons for May, 275 tons for June, and 50 tons for September. That brought the sales for April shipment to 90,309 tons, for May to 25,948 tons and for June shipment to 17,616 tons.

SCRAP PRICE DOWN ONE-QUARTER CENT

For the greater part of the afternoon, the custom smelters withdrew from the market as buyers of scrap at any price. Late in the afternoon, two custom smelters reduced their buying price by one-quarter cent a pound to a basis of 25¾ cents for No. 2 heavy copper and wire. One factor continued to stay out of the market as a buyer.

TRADE'S GUESS—NO OCDM SALE

In copper circles the guess was that in view of the political storm that has been raised, the OCDM will probably decide not to liquidate the nonstrategic copper at the present time. There was plenty of criticism, however, not only over the timing of the OCDM contemplated action, but also over the fact that whenever the Government steps into business, it is likely to make a mess of things. The Government had acquired the copper through incentive contracts with high-cost producers whereby it guaranteed to take the metal off their hands at a predetermined floor price if they could not sell the metal in the open market. It was done to stimulate production at a time when the Government thought that the shortage would last for years. Now that the world's output is at a record high level, the Government is planning to sell the copper. In copper circles it was recalled that our Government is now planning to do what the British Ministry did with its stockpiled copper that it released not when there was a shortage but when there appeared to be an oversupply.

EFFECT ON LONDON AWAITED

There was considerable speculation as to what the reaction will be in London to the OCDM news. A further decline on the LME was anticipated.

London prices were down £2 a ton for the day. At the first session the bid for cash and for forward was £236 15s, down £1 15s from Tuesday's close. The sales were 1,700 tons.

At the second call £235 10s was bid for the two positions, a further drop of £1 5s. The sales were 1,000 tons.

POSSIBLE COPPER SALE BY GOVERNMENT PUTS MARKET IN TURMOIL—OCDM DENIES ANY DECISION TO SELL DPA METAL IN OPEN MARKET—NEW YORK FUTURES TUMBLE

NEW YORK, April 15.—The copper market was thrown into a turmoil this morning when Senator MIKE MANSFIELD, Democrat, of Montana, indicated that the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization intended to authorize the sale of Defense Production Act copper in the open market. The news brought an immediate break in the price-sensitive New York futures market. Quotations tumbled as much as 1.65 cents per pound at one point during the day. Trading volume set an alltime record high of 1,180 lots or 29,500 tons. The news arrived too late to affect values on the London Metal Exchange. But coming as it did on the heels of record-breaking world production figures and rising stocks reported on Tuesday by the Copper Institute, the Washington report changed the whole tenor, of what, until recently has been a shortage-scared domestic market.

OCDM SAYS NO DECISION TAKEN

Later in the day the strong protests of the Western mining Senators over the rumored sale of 128,000 or more tons of Government copper were tempered by an OCDM announcement. A spokesman for the agency in Washington told American Metal Market, "We have made no decision to release or offer copper for sale on the open market at this time.

"The total stockpiles are always being reviewed in respect to defense requirements. This is nothing new insofar as a review is concerned. There has been no determination to dispose of any copper in our Defense Production Act inventories," the spokesman said.

PRECEDENT SET

Government officials pointed to a precedent in the release of copper from DPA inventories which was established during the shortage which developed in 1956 as the result of an industrywide strike. Secretary of Labor Mitchell announced his opposition to the release of copper by the Government during the strike because it would weaken the bargaining position of the workers. Following the strike copper was released on two separate occasions from DPA inventories to meet consumption requirements while the shut down plants were getting back into production.

The copper in Defense Production inventories was acquired as the result of Korean war expansion contracts. It has been accumulating as producers take advantage of the provision in their contracts to "put" copper to the Government.

It was strongly indicated by other Government sources, however, that an action to release copper from DPA account had been under discussion. One official, conversant with these proposals, said that the militant opposition voiced by Senator MANSFIELD and other mining State Senators on Capitol Hill today had put the quietus on further discussion of the release of copper at this time.

PROTEST ON SENATE FLOOR

Nevertheless, the membership of the 86th Congress, under the lash of Senators and Congressmen from copper-producing States, was up in arms in Washington over the report that the Government was about to dispose of its holdings of copper purchased under Defense Product Act authority.

One reliable source on Capitol Hill said the DPA holdings of copper amounted to 128,000 tons, but Senator MIKE MANSFIELD, who took the floor of the Senate early at today's session, said he had been informed that the DPA holdings might amount to as much as 180,000 tons.

The Montana Senator introduced a resolution calling for the Senate to request that any disposition of DPA copper be halted immediately. In addition, his resolution requested that the DPA copper holdings be transferred at once to the national stockpile in order to remove it from any sudden disposition by the General Services Administration at the direction of the Office of Defense Mobilization.

ASKS REMOVAL OF DUMPING THREAT

Senator BARRY GOLDWATER called for nonpartisan support of the Senate on this resolution. He said the DPA copper holdings have been depressing the markets for several years.

"This copper," he said, "should be removed to a jurisdiction which would prevent any possibility that it could be dumped on the market."

The DPA copper holdings have been built up under the Defense Production Act since 1951, when the Congress authorized copper and other metal expansion programs, to meet war time needs. A few of these contracts are still in existence. The copper sold to the Government under these contracts is not made a part of the national stockpile, although some of it could be transferred to the national stockpile under emergency conditions.

TO BE CONSIDERED BY INTERIOR COMMITTEE

Senator MANSFIELD's resolution, which was endorsed by eight other Senators, was introduced with the provision that additional Senators would add their names as sponsors.

Later in the week this resolution will be considered by the Senate Interior Committee, headed by Senator JAMES E. MURRAY, Democratic of Montana, who also was one of the strong endorsers of this legislation.

In the House of Representatives, another bipartisan group of western Congressmen also joined forces today to urge the administration to announce publicly that it has no intention of selling DPA copper.

The western Congressmen and Senators both forwarded letters this morning to Leo A. Hoegh, Director of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization.

The consensus of congressional opinion widely expressed today was that, if a sale of surplus copper to industry is carried out, copper prices could well drop to the extreme lows that existed only a year ago.

KNOWN IN ADVANCE?

At that time, with the domestic price around 24 cents per pound, the Senate by a large majority passed legislation which would have authorized the Government to buy 150,000 tons of copper at 27.50 cents per pound as a floor price in support of copper, in order to stop the closing down of copper mines.

However, the Senate bill was defeated in the House. Since that time, the price of copper has risen to the thirties, at levels which made it profitable for the mines to continue operating. Within the last few days copper prices have started skidding, and stocks on hand are increasing. Many Members of Congress today attributed this lowering of prices to the possibility that the U.S. Government was planning to dispose of thousands of tons of copper on the markets.

Senator MANSFIELD and Senator MURRAY, using copies of today's American Metal Market, called attention to a page one story pointing out the break in the copper market.

The resolution introduced by Senator MANSFIELD was expected to bring forth some clarification from OCDM Director Hoegh late today.

PETITIONED BY FABRICATORS

While there was no actual inventory reading available on the amount of copper held under DPA contracts, the best estimate available seemed to be at least 128,000 tons were being held.

Although few believed that the Government planned to sell in the immediate future any copper, there seemed to be authentic reports that small amounts of copper were to be released in response to petitions from copper fabricators, who have protested that the price of copper had risen too high for their production revenues to come out even.

Senator MANSFIELD indicated to the American Metal Market that, as far as he could tell, the pressure brought to bear on the Government to sell some of its copper holdings had been instigated by the copper fabricators.

LONDON DECLINES ON STATISTICAL NEWS

The consternation which greeted the initial news from Washington today was symptomatic of the new uneasiness which has crept into the copper market recently. Foreign mines and refineries are turning out metal at a record rate and there is a feeling in the trade that London prices may decline further until foreign copper can be sold in the U.S. market competitively with the 31½ cents producer quotation, the 1.7 cents import tax notwithstanding. Any release of Government copper would further swell the world supply of red metal and weaken the industry's basic price. The market's psychology apparently has been transformed from fear of strike shortages to the prospect of an oversupply. But strikes remain the incalculable factor in the situation.

The London market reacted unfavorably to the Copper Institute statistics which showed a 17,000-ton increase in foreign stocks in March. Both the spot and three-month quotations declined £3 per ton to finish at £235 10s per ton. A total of 2,700 tons changed hands.

SCRAP CUT ONE-FOURTH CENT

The unfavorable Washington news brought a sell-off in the scrap market. At least one custom smelter was out of the market for part of the day owing to the somewhat confused situation. Later in the day all smelters joined in posting a one-fourth cent reduction in scrap buying prices. This put the published quotation for No. 2 copper scrap at 25¾ cents per pound.

Custom smelters maintained their electrolytic selling price at 32 cents per pound.

FUTURES SLUMP

Futures on the Commodity Exchange opened easier this morning on the statistical news. The Washington development brought a flood of sell orders, but price recovered later with the OCDM announcement.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arizona will yield further, I should like to say that in yesterday's statement, in submitting the resolution, I had the following to say:

It has been—

That is the copper area—

It has been the most blighted area in the field of unemployment, and the depressed condition has been quite evident until recently. Now we have this attempt by a Mr. Price, who I understand lives on Long Island and visits Washington once a week as a consultant to the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, headed by former Gov. Leo Hoegh, of Iowa, to dump Government-owned copper on the domestic market.

I did not wish to speak disparagingly of Mr. Price, but I had just heard his last name mentioned in connection with the rumored copper inventory disposal. I therefore ask unanimous consent, in fairness to Mr. Price, to have printed in the RECORD at this point a brief biograph of Mr. J. Roy Price, who joined the office of OCDM on December 2, 1958, and is Assistant Director in that organization, and, therefore, presumably, a full-time employee of the Government.

There being no objection, the biographical sketch was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

J. ROY PRICE BIOGRAPHY

J. Roy Price, of Manhasset, N.Y., has been Assistant Director of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization since September 2, 1958.

Prior to joining the agency, he was associated with Union Carbide Corp. where he has had a long career in the fields of research, development, production, sales, and merchandising.

He is one of the men who conducted the original research in this country on vinyl plastics and later helped organize the firm's plastic division, which later was merged with Bakelite Co., division of Union Carbide Corp.

He served for 2 years on his company's Industrial Fellowship at the Mellon Institute of Industrial Research, University of Pittsburgh.

During World War II, he served as his firm's liaison representative in Washington, D.C., working with the various defense agencies.

Mr. Price was born June 15, 1900, in Mt. Hope, W. Va. He received a Bachelor of Science degree in 1923 from West Virginia Wesleyan College. He later did graduate work at Marshall College and Columbia University. He holds honorary degrees from West Virginia Wesleyan College and Parsons College. After being a teacher of science and school superintendent, he joined Union Carbide Corp. some 30 years ago.

He served as president of the board of education of Manhasset Public Schools, is a member of the board of trustees of West Virginia Wesleyan College and a member of the advisory council of Grinnell College.

He is married and has two children. The family resides in Manhasset, N.Y.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I again thank the Senator from Arizona. I want him to know that I, too, have been in contact with the White House. I talked with Mr. Don Paarlberg today. I have not received any assurance from him that this Government copper inventory will be kept off the market. Therefore, this feeling of uncertainty will continue. Unless something is done soon, the price will be depressed still further.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The White House has been apprised of the situation. I feel certain that efforts are being made to bring about the issuance of a more satisfactory statement. I assure the Senator that I shall follow up my action in that direction.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MURRAY (by request):

S. 1699. A bill to consolidate, revise, and reenact the public land townsite laws; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. CARLSON:

S. 1700. A bill to permit income derived as an administrator or executor of an estate to be considered as self-employment income for the purpose of the insurance system established by title II of the Social Security Act; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. CLARK:

S. 1701. A bill for the relief of Hajime Asato; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey:

S. 1702. A bill for the relief of Franciszek Roszkowski;

S. 1703. A bill for the relief of Raul J. Hermitte and Ginette N. Hermitte;

S. 1704. A bill for the relief of Werner J. Fleischmann;

S. 1705. A bill for the relief of Ivan (John) Persic;

S. 1706. A bill for the relief of Zofia Wieszcek; and

S. 1707. A bill for the relief of Gomes Antonio de Phino; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MAGNUSON:

S. 1708. A bill to authorize the issuance to State defense forces of obsolete supplies and equipment of the Armed Forces, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. MAGNUSON (by request):

S. 1709. A bill to amend section 210a(a) and section 210a(b) of part II of the Interstate Commerce Act to deny the granting of temporary operating authority to render common or contract passenger service by motor vehicle if absence of service results from a strike; and

S. 1710. A bill to amend part II of the Interstate Commerce Act in order to provide employee protection in cases involving consolidations, mergers, and other similar situations of passenger motor carriers; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself, Mr. CARROLL, Mr. HART, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. MCGEE, Mr. MONRONEY, Mr. MORSE, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey):

S. 1711. A bill to promote the foreign policy of the United States and help to build essential world conditions of peace, by the more effective use of U.S. agricultural commodities for the relief of human hunger, and for promoting economic and social development in less developed countries; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(See the remarks of Mr. HUMPHREY when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. MAGNUSON (by request):

S. 1712. A bill to extend the application of the Motorboat Act of 1940 to certain possessions of the United States; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

(See the remarks of Mr. MAGNUSON when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. MAGNUSON (for himself and Mr. JACKSON):

S. 1713. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to modify the works of the Grand Coulee Dam, Columbia Basin project, Wash., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Works.

EXTENSION OF MOTORBOAT ACT OF 1940 TO CERTAIN U.S. POSSESSIONS

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, by request, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to extend the application of the Motorboat Act of 1940 to certain possessions of the United States. I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury requesting the proposed legislation be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1712) to extend the application of the Motorboat Act of 1940 to certain possessions of the United States, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON, by request, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The letter presented by Mr. MAGNUSON is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, April 7, 1959.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SIR: There is transmitted herewith a draft of a proposed bill "To extend the application of the Motorboat Act of 1940 to certain possessions of the United States."

The purpose of this proposal is to reinstate the applicability of the Motorboat Act of 1940 to certain possessions of the United States, viz, Guam, Virgin Islands, and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

The Motorboat Act of 1940, prior to its amendment by section 6 of the Federal Boating Act of 1958, Public Law 85–911, approved September 2, 1958, was applicable to the Virgin Islands, Guam, and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. It is considered essential in the promotion of boating safety in these areas that former conditions be restored.

Motorboats and small motor vessels operating in these areas must now comply with the navigation lights requirements of the International Rules of the Road rather than those prescribed in the Motorboat Act of 1940. This change is confusing and unwarranted. Motorboats operating in these areas need no longer carry a life preserver or other approved lifesaving device for each person on board. This is a regression in the progress made in promotion of safety on the waterways of these areas. It is considered of paramount importance that operators of motorboats carrying passengers for hire in these areas continue to be licensed by the Coast Guard. The carriage of fire prevention and fire extinguishing appliances on board motorboats in these areas should also be continued. The absence of safety legislation applicable to motorboats in these areas will be marked with tragedies unless remedial measures as proposed are quickly taken.

It would be appreciated if you would lay the proposed bill before the Senate. A similar proposed bill has been transmitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation to the Congress.

Very truly yours,

A. GILMORE FLUES,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN ALIENS—AMENDMENT

Mr. CHURCH submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (S. 1033) for the relief of certain aliens, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL TIME WITHIN WHICH CERTAIN STATE AGREEMENTS UNDER SECTION 218 OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT MAY BE MODIFIED—AMENDMENTS

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (H.R. 213) to provide additional time within which certain State agreements under section 218 of the Social Security Act may be modified to secure coverage for nonprofessional school district employees, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

NOMINATION OF MRS. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE TO BE UNITED STATES AMBASSADOR TO BRAZIL

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I believe that with propriety, under the rule, I dare allude to the following:

Yesterday there was a meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee, at which time the committee took testimony on the question of the confirmation of the nomination of Clare Boothe Luce to be our Ambassador to Brazil. There seems to have been a rather lively interchange between some of the members of the committee and the nominee. For instance, I notice from the newspapers that there was reference to a speech made by Mrs. Luce in 1952; and it is alleged that in that speech she said:

> For 20 years mortal enemies of our country have been thriving in the organism of the Democratic Party.

Mr. President, I do not believe that sort of thing has any bearing upon Mrs. Luce's competency to be our Ambassador. I do not believe it has any bearing upon her qualifications. There was no impeachment of her service as our Ambassador to Italy. Of course, the statement quoted in the newspapers was actually a political statement in a campaign year.

I would not care to be called to account for some of the things I have said in campaign years. [Laughter.] I recall that when the "Court-packing" bill was before the Senate, at which time I was a Member of the House of Representatives, of course I had no opportunity to vote on that bill; but what I may have said about the President of the United States at that time would go infinitely farther than the imaginative mind of Mrs. Luce could ever have conjured up.

I would not like to be called to account for some of the things I said as a minority Member for 14 years under Democratic administrations, when I assailed "spender-mania" and "squandermania," and when I assailed the New Deal in all its facets, including the reformation and relief and recovery programs.

I would not like to be called to account on a highly sensitive basis for what I had to say about the distinguished "President of Independence" at the time of the seizure of the steel industry. At that time I could scarcely find words in my limited lexicon to pour boiling oil upon him; and if the words I did use were read out of context, I am sure they would sound rather brutal.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to my distinguished friend.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am glad my distinguished colleage, the Senator from Illinois, is speaking on this matter, because I, myself, intend to make a few remarks on it; and at this time I am glad to add to what my colleague has said.

One of the Senators who engaged in the interrogation of Mrs. Luce on yesterday was the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE]; and if my memory serves me correctly—although it does not have to in this case, because I have before me his printed words, as they were published in the Des Moines Register on January 13, 1946—at one time he said:

> Liberalism is dead in the Democratic Party, and that party has reverted to its traditional role of placing political privilege and corrupt machine politics, a la the Missouri gang, above the general welfare of our people.

I have read the interrogations, as reported in the newspapers, and I do not believe that anything Mrs. Luce is reported to have said can compare in violence with the statement made by the senior Senator from Oregon which I have just quoted.

In fact, if I may refresh the Senator's memory the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] was quoted in the Denver Post of October 30, 1948, as having said:

> World peace is threatened today because two American Presidents—Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry Truman—circumvented the regular treaty process at Yalta and Potsdam.

I think that is a rather harsh indictment of the President of the United States. I do not think that is any less harsh than saying a President "lied us into war."

I merely wanted to refresh the Senator's memory as to the inconsistency of some of the interrogators, based on the instances I have cited.

Mr. DIRKSEN. As I think of some of the campaign statements I have made—and I think I stand by every one of them, Mr. President—in those days, when in a campaign, we rang all the alliterative changes on "communism and corruption," our statements were pretty tart and pretty testy.

I would say to my distinguished and beloved friend whose desk is across the aisle from mine, and who has a great capacity for bold phrases and a great command of etymology, that he uses phrases which, I should say, develop a million pounds of clout—or, in the jet age, I believe the word "thrust" is used—as, for instance, in the speech he made in Phoenix. That led me to make some remarks on the question of vetoes on the floor. But I know that represented a deep conviction on his part.

I think of some of the statements made about the capacity of our beloved President in the economic and monetary field, such as observations made by our delightful colleague, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR]; and I think about the interchanges we have here on budget matters.

I think about all the very sharp and testy observations made by the very distinguished—and, if I did not love him so much, I would say unregenerate—Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON], who constantly takes us to task on the question of preparedness, missiles, and all that sort of thing.

So the questioning in the committee to which I have just referred amounts merely to raising a political question which does not go at all to competency or to qualifications. Therefore, I felt the necessity of remarking on that fact, because these matters appear on the front pages of newspapers in other countries besides our own. They could very easily be misinterpreted in Brazil.

Therefore I wished to add my word or two here, in order to make sure, if that can be done, that no misimpressions are carried abroad as a result of the questions which were raised in the committee by the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], which were entirely, it seems, in a political vein. I am sorry he is not here, because he has always done me the honor of telling me if he is going to use my name, slightly and affectionately, in vain on the Senate floor.

I am glad that there is only a very, very modest minority that quite follows the judgment of the distinguished Senator from Oregon.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, yesterday one of America's most distinguished ladies, Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce, appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate to be examined as to her qualifications to be Ambassador to Brazil. The questioning as reported in the Washington Post was, to me, more in the nature of a political field day than it was in the nature of determining this lady's qualifications. I am surprised that people in politics would refer to political speeches of yesterday, or long ago, in an effort to determine a person's ability. For instance, the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] was reported as being critical of a remark Mrs. Luce made to the effect that, "President Roosevelt was the only President that lied us into war." I can remember in the campaign of 1940 that there were references by the candidate, Franklin D. Roosevelt, that American boys would never be sent overseas; and yet, within a few months after the election, American boys were being sent overseas and we were at war. I have heard many politicians and many private citizens accuse President Roosevelt of not having been truthful to the American people in this instance; but for the life of me, I cannot see where this has any bearing on the ability of Mrs. Luce.

If I recall correctly, the senior Senator from Oregon has made many references to the President of the United States, Dwight Eisenhower, that could not be termed complimentary, and certainly, the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, has often been critical of the administration; but I call that politics. For an example, the senior Senator from Oregon signed a "declaration of conscience," June 1, 1950, which said in part:

> The Democrat administration has initially created the confusion by its lack of effective leadership—by its complacency to the threat of communism here at home.

The question at point is not that Mrs. Luce engaged in politics during her career, but, Is she qualified to be the Ambassador to Brazil? I have lived all my life on the border of Mexico, and I have traveled extensively in Mexico and other Latin countries, and I think I have an understanding of what the people of those nations seek in the Americans who not only visit them, but who are sent to represent the United States in an official way. Mrs. Luce has these qualities to an outstanding degree. Her services as Ambassador to Italy have never been criticized, to my knowledge. On the other hand, I have heard nothing but high praise from friends in Italy for the way in which she conducted that office. Mrs. Luce is taking this appointment seriously. She is learning the language of the country. She is learning the customs. She will go to Brazil completely equipped to step into this position and do for this country an outstanding job in representing us and bringing our two countries closer together.

Life presents many peculiar and difficult to understand situations, and, certainly, when the senior Senator from Oregon and the junior Senator from Arkansas, who were leaders in the fight against the late Senator McCarthy, engage in what I believe to be the same tactics they accused Senator McCarthy of using, we find a most incongruous picture.

I hope that the Foreign Relations Committee, in its next meeting with Mrs. Luce, will conduct questioning as to her ability, and not as to her activities as a politician, for if she is to be judged by political remarks, then all of us in politics are open to criticism, because none of us has been pure in our references to opposition parties or candidates during periods of election.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

LEGISLATION IN THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT FIELD

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, with the Kennedy labor bill reported to the Senate by the committee and the majority report and minority views filed, it now becomes our duty to consider this bill, S. 1555, on its merits as a reform measure in the labor-management field.

The weaknesses and inadequacies of this bill are apparent to the public, have long been apparent to colleagues who recognize the need for truly effective legislation, and now are evidently apparent to its own proponents. This revelation came about as the majority faction of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee decided the no-man's land provision did not meet their own requirements, and they proposed striking that provision from the bill. Sponsors were willing even to report a bill with a void in this area, with the agreement they would accept without reservation the recommendation of the 12-man labor committee panel of experts if this recommendation were made unanimously.

Just yesterday in executive session it was decided that the provisions relating to no-man's land, which would require each State to set up subservient arms of the NLRB which would take their instructions from Washington, really did not solve the problem. But, rather, it would nearly double the present 2-year lag in processing cases before the National Labor Relations Board. When we consider the turmoil caused in a business which has a case before the Board, this provision is certain to increase the number of business failures, and hence increase the unemployment rolls.

In view of this, the committee agreed they would be willing to strike this no-man's land provision should the panel of experts be able to offer any kind of an acceptable substitute next week. In such a rush were they to report some kind of labor bill, regardless of its effectiveness, that they were willing to report a bill void in this important respect in the hope that the panel later would magically produce the wanted solution.

We of the minority have watched the evolution of this bill, and this is just one more example of the slipshod legislative technique and shoddy draftsmanship which characterize this bill.

If there is any doubt about how the public feels about this bill, here is an excerpt from an editorial in the High Bridge, N.J., Gazette, printed on March 5 of this year:

> A vote for the Kennedy bill is an easy out for the nervous lawmaker who, for a number of reasons, may prefer not to irritate the labor bosses, and whose constituents are uninformed or indifferent or both. He can then please the labor barons and pose at the same time as a champion of labor union reform. On the other hand, the conscientious Congressman who realizes what a phony bill this is must be a very brave man to vote against it when there is no hint of support or appreciation from the homefolks. Useful as this bill could be to the union hierarchy—whose "fat cats" will bring every pressure to bear for its passage—it is a disservice to the rank and file union member and an insult to the public at large.

On previous occasions the gimmicks of this bill have been cited. These gimmicks are intended to give the bill a facade of effectiveness, an appearance of dealing with abuses in the labor-management field, and of placing in the hands of union members the rightful control of their organizations. But the bill does nothing of the kind, as has been shown time and again, because of the shallowness and deceptiveness of its language.

To legislate effectively a true labor reform bill, we must first eliminate these gimmicks and write into the bill provisions which truly give the union member protection of his rights as a citizen.

This is only one step toward giving the public the type of legislation they demand.

Second, we must drop the Taft-Hartley amendments which are irrelevant to corruption and racketeering. Amendments to correct these abuses are the substance of a bill which is to be titled a labor-reform bill. Revisions in other areas of the Taft-Hartley law ought rightly to be left to the 12-man panel of labor law experts appointed by the Labor Committee specifically to study this problem.

The final step is the adoption of amendments to correct six glaring loopholes in the Kennedy bill.

They are:

First. Impose fiduciary obligations, enforcible by union members, on the officials of labor unions.

Second. Impose the effective sanctions of denial of tax immunity and of access to the National Labor Relations Board, the National Mediation Board, and so forth, to unions which violate the bill's provisions.

Third. Solve the problems arising out of the no-man's land by permitting the States to exercise jurisdiction in those classes of labor cases which the Federal Labor Board refuses to entertain.

Fourth. Limit organizational and recognition picketing by unions which clearly do not represent a majority of the employees of the picketed employer.

Fifth. Close the loopholes in the present law dealing with secondary boycotts.

Sixth. Limit effectively political expenditures and contributions by labor unions.

It is clear that what is needed, and what the public is insistently demanding, is Federal legislation designed both to assure some minimum measure of internal union democracy and effectively to curb corruption and racketeering which the McClellan committee revealed.

It now becomes our task to piece together effective legislation, salvaging a bill rushed to the Senate in a state of complete unreadiness, and transfusing into it the strength and fiber which its sponsors adamantly refused to accept.

I ask unanimous consent that a number of quotations from editorials across the Nation be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the extracts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EDITORIAL COMMENTS FROM LEADING NEWSPAPERS CONCERNING LABOR REFORM LEGISLATION

Springfield (Mass.) Republican: "There are things in the administration bill which are stronger than any KENNEDY has yet suggested and which are needed."

Tulsa Tribune: "There will be several labor-management reform bills introduced at this session. The first of these is already in. It is Senator KENNEDY's weak-kneed measure. He omitted entirely reference to secondary boycotts, blackmail picketing, Federal Trade Commission regulation of union restraints or the endowment of the Secretary of Labor with power to investigate racketeering cases.

"President Eisenhower's program does not dodge these paramount issues. He proposes bluntly to 'give the Secretary of Labor power to police union fund accounting and require democratic procedure in union operation'; to 'tighten present secondary boycott bans of the Taft-Hartley Act so as to prohibit coercion of employers as well as employees'; to 'prohibit picketing to give a union bargaining rights in cases where employees have indicated they don't want a union.'"

Milwaukee Journal: "The President's 20-point program is remarkable for its restraint.

"But Kennedy needs to be held to his pledge that a second measure incorporating Taft-Hartley changes will be forthcoming. And at minimum, this bill should include the Eisenhower restrictions on picketing, secondary boycotts, and broader powers to the States."

St. Louis Post Dispatch: "The public interest in this affair is an effective but moderate and nonpunitive labor law which includes reasonable restraints on picketing and secondary boycotts as well as rules for funds reporting and union democracy. The administration bill meets that requirement; the Kennedy bill does not."

Pueblo (Colo.) Chieftain: "Instead of the provision which establishes a new unfair labor practice, which is picketing for the purpose of 'the personal profit or enrichment of any individual by taking or obtaining any money or other thing of value from such employer against his will or with his consent,' the Bureau believes that it is a much broader issue which should prohibit picketing of an employer, whose employees do not wish to join a union, which is commonly disruptive to the business of the employer, but under such pressure forces the employer to give in and sign up whether most of his employees want to or not.

"The Bureau contends that this is compulsion by a minority, or by complete strangers, and not legitimate collective bargaining."

Oakland Tribune:

"Secretary Mitchell has no objection to the two-package approach, as long as one of the packages contains provisions that outlaw secondary boycotts and blackmail picketing, and that there is assurance they will not be sidetracked.

" 'We must demand,' he declared, 'that despite obstacles put in the way by special groups, this session of Congress enact the laws that America needs.'

"It is not an impossible demand. In truth, it is sensible, and is one that must be met. If the contemporary Democratic leadership for any reason fails or refuses to enact such laws, then the American public will have been deprived of protection that it needs and which a big portion wants."

Wall Street Journal:

"The administration submitted a fairly comprehensive bill designed to protect union members from abuse by their own leadership and to protect the public from certain union abuses. It is a much stronger bill than that offered by Democratic Senator KENNEDY.

"The administration's proposals for dealing with abuses such as secondary boycotts and blackmail picketing are necessary not only in themselves. They are also necessary as grim reminders to Congress and the people that the larger problem of union power must be tackled at its sources, including the unions' immunity from laws applied to all other citizens."

Syracuse Herald-Journal:

"His [President Eisenhower's] new labor bill would tighten restraints, for example, on secondary boycotts and blackmail picketing.

"We agree with Secretary of Labor Mitchell. These are cardinal provisions.

"Neither is in the labor-management reform bill introduced January 20 by Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY."

St. Paul Pioneer Press: "President Eisenhower's proposals for new labor legislation are moderate, constructive and not of a punitive nature. His program is mainly intended to protect honest unionism and the public against corruption and racketeering. He also proposes reasonable regulation of secondary boycotts and so-called blackmail picketing."

Wilmington News:

"On the whole, however, the proposals [the administration's] should have considerable appeal to both labor and management.

"This is true because the President has addressed himself primarily to correcting evils and improper practices that should be ended for the good of all concerned. Employers have much to gain if they can deal with honest unions and honest labor leaders—and the unions themselves, officials and members both, have much to gain from the house-cleaning that these reforms would bring about.

"To our mind, the President should be given credit for addressing himself to the main problem confronting the Congress now and coming forward with a program that would have a chance of enactment. Certainly it would, if enacted, go a long way to 'assure the American public that true, responsible collective bargaining can be carried on with full protection to the rights and freedoms of workers, and adequate guarantees of the public interest.' "

Kansas City (Mo.) Star:

"Yet as the administration's labor program emphasizes, there is much more to be done. Particularly has Secretary Mitchell emphasized the practices of the secondary boycott and organizational picketing.

"The administration's one-package labor proposal is a comprehensive plan that would give the Nation the fair and workable labor code it has never had.

"Secretary Mitchell has given no ground in his demand for tight regulation of secondary boycotts and organizational picketing * * *. We see nothing punitive in the amendments but, rather, they recognize the obligations of any segment of the economy, be it labor, business or what have you.

"But we detect a growing demand for public protection. It will have to come eventually. Those who ignore the public interest now, will have to accept responsibility for the failure."

San Francisco Examiner:

"Of the two, the administration bill is preferable.

"The administration bill thus deals with abuses disclosed by the McClellan committee's investigation of labor racketeering.

"In addition, it seeks to improve the legal processes for preventing or adjusting labor disputes.

"It would do all that the Kennedy bill purports to do, and some things besides which the Kennedy bill omits.

"In our opinion, the administration bill is an earnest effort to protect the interests of labor, management, and the public. If it has flaws, let them be developed in honest debate."

Hartford Courant: "There is no doubt that the Eisenhower 20-item program is more comprehensive than that submitted by Mr. KENNEDY."

Beaumont (Tex.) Enterprise: "When one considers the vast and growing power of labor unions and the dagger which that power holds at the economic heart of the Nation when unscrupulous men are in control, he must conclude that Mr. Eisenhower's program is moderate and full reasonable.

"With dangerous characters like James R. Hoffa on the loose, one wonders why the Chief Executive's proposals were not even stronger."

Portland Oregonian: "An amendment (in the administration bill) to the secondary boycott provisions would protect employers and employees not directly involved in a labor dispute. But it would clarify the right of a union to picket farmed out work of struck employers and permit secondary picketing of employees engaged in work at a common construction site with the primary employer, under certain circumstances.

"A second proposal * * * is to prohibit picketing for organizational purposes of an employer who has recognized another union in accordance with law, or where a representation election has been held within the past 12 months, or where 'it cannot be demonstrated that there is a sufficient showing of interest on the part of the employees.'

"The use of pickets for the purposes of union organization where no legitimate labor dispute exists cannot be justified. Similarly, the extension of secondary activities againsst employers and their workers should be clearly banned and the present evastion of the law eliminated."

Plainfield (N.J.) Courier-News: "The Kennedy bills skip over the matter of union secondary boycotts against third-party employers as well as prohibiting picketing where employees have indicated they do not want a union.

"Democrats and Republicans agree that some action should be taken by Congress in an attempt to take the rackets out of the unions.

"The President's message was designed to curb such abuse.

"When, and if, Democratic Members of Congress are faced with a decision on the questions of secondary boycotts and picketing to force union affiliation they should keep one thing in mind. Some of the Democrats in Congress may owe their election in part to union support, but they were elected to represent all of the people."

Springfield (Ohio) News: "Mr. Eisenhower has presented a package that includes other needed changes in the Taft-Hartley law. Most of these proposals should be enacted, too.

"Most important among them are provisions to outlaw organizational picketing and secondary boycotts, and to protect the integrity of long-term contracts that do not carry reopening clauses. Amendments wanted by labor and recognized as fair by the late Senator Robert A. Taft have to do with the non-Communist oath and eligibility of strikers to vote in representation elections."

East Liverpool (Ohio) Review: "The President's recommendations, if adopted outright, would take unionism off the defensive in the United States and give it the status its most farsighted leaders have sought for it—the status it can never enjoy as long as some elements in unionism are admittedly and brazenly dishonest and corrupt."

Rockford Register-Republic: "Labor-reform proposals submitted by President Eisenhower to Congress Wednesday are much more complete and would be far more effective than the piecemeal bill thrown into the hopper last week by Senator JOHN KENNEDY, the Massachusetts Democratic presidential hopeful.

"The real objective of the President's labor proposals is to put a halt to improper practices without imposing arbitrary restrictions or punitive measures on legitimate activities of honest labor and management officials. Mr. Eisenhower's broad program gets to the core of many of the illegal and strong-arm practices of unscrupulous labor leaders.

"Mr. Eisenhower includes some of labor's requests in his proposals.

"In the main, adoption of the President's recommendations would be a long step toward ending the abuses of power and the improper practices which the public demands be outlawed."

Philadelphia Inquirer: "Sincere friends of labor, Democrats as well as Republicans, have spoken out strongly against both secondary boycotts and blackmail picketing. We believe Senator KENNEDY, in Wednesday's committee session, offered no valuable reasons why his bill should not cover this ground.

"Reform legislation should avoid any undue restrictions upon labor and its essential rights. But the need for real, permanent reforms should not be shrugged aside. The administration labor bill faces up squarely to the task of dealing with blackmail picketing and secondary boycotts. The Kennedy bill does not."

Rock Island Argus: "The Eisenhower administration's labor bill is a considerable improvement over the Kennedy bill, formerly known as the Kennedy-Ives bill.

"It goes further in cracking down on union corruption. It sets up no new restrictions on management in regard to spending for employee relations. Its provisions regarding the Taft-Hartley Act are more realistic.

"It would impose tighter restrictions on secondary boycotts—an issue that the Kennedy bill completely overlooks—and bar organizational picketing where employers have rejected a union."

Wilkes-Barre Record: "Eisenhower presents his program as a complete approach to curbing labor-management abuses, including picketing-boycott provisions."

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette: "But there are important dissimilarities. The administration bill provides stiffer penalties. Under it, for example, employers and unions who violate its terms can lose access to the National Labor Relations Board, and a recalcitrant union can lose its privilege of tax exemption. The administration bill, unlike Senator KENNEDY'S, would considerably strengthen the curb on secondary boycotts—on those activities whereby a union in conflict with one employer puts the pressure on other employers who do business with him. And the administration bill would deal far more extensively than Senator KENNEDY'S with so-called blackmail picketing—as, for example, when a union tries to force an employer to recognize it as bargaining agent although another union already holds that right lawfully. Senator KENNEDY would ban such picketing only where the object is to extort money from the employer."

Lancaster (Pa.) New Era: "Both deal with racketeering labor leaders; the Jimmy Hoffas, Dave Becks, and Johnny Dios. The Kennedy bill, for all practical purposes, stops there. The Eisenhower measure goes further. It would deal with such matters as secondary boycotts, blackmail picketing, etc.

"On this point, Senator KENNEDY says 'broad Taft-Hartley revisions * * * should definitely be considered by the Congress this year, and I can definitely assure the Senate that a second labor bill will be reported to the floor this year.'

"Well, if the Senator really means that, why not have him accept the President's proposal, merge them with his own and enact them? As a matter of fact, the administration measure is remarkable for its restraints."

Port Huron (Mich.) Times-Herald: "To the extent that it gets to the heart of the obnoxious union practices and would focus publicity and governmental scrutiny on records, President Eisenhower's labor reform bill demands the attention and support of every Member of Congress.

"Because it demands amendment of the Taft-Hartley law to impose tighter curbs on secondary boycotts and outlawing coercive picketing, the administration measure would provide the best answer so far to the unethical practices of some labor unions.

"We can see no justice in continuing a practice which permits picketing to compel an employer to give union bargaining rights in cases where employees have indicated they don't want a union—that's un-American."

Burlington (Vt.) Free Press: "Senator KENNEDY, of Massachusetts, has dropped the pale Kennedy-Ives labor bill in the hopper again, with a few changes.

"KENNEDY leaves out two vital measures which the Eisenhower administration considers vital to labor reform. It does not outlaw the secondary boycott and blackmail picketing.

"KENNEDY defends his weak bill by saying it deals with racketeering only, using provisions on which everyone can agree, and leaves 'problems of collective bargaining and economic power' for separate consideration."

St. Louis Globe-Democrat:

"Of the two labor law proposals now before Congress, that of President Eisenhower is manifestly better for the Nation's welfare.

"Mr. Eisenhower's plan includes virtually all the corrections envisaged by Senator KENNEDY'S bill against internal union corruption, bribery, and racketeering. And it goes much further.

"The Ike measure also would prohibit secondary boycotts and outlaw blackmail picketing designed to force an employer to deal with a union representing a minority of his employees—or perhaps no employees at all.

"The secondary boycott should have been barred years ago.

"The Eisenhower proposals are far from harsh to labor, much less rigid than demands made by some of the more conservative members of his party.

"Should any labor measure by adopted by this Congress, in event of a radical upset in present outlook, it certainly should be the President's bill. The Kennedy plan would be the mildest of palliatives, more a pandering to labor than a reform to labor law."

Rockford Register-Republican:

"This form of coercive, or racket, picketing has been used to force owners of numerous small businesses to sign contracts with unions when employees showed an interest in being represented by the unions; in some cases, employers who refused to be intimated have been subjected to violence.

"Secretary Mitchell spoke for the administration in calling for an effective labor law this year. Without curbs on secondary boycotts and coercive picketing, a labor bill would not get to the core of the problem. It would be only half a loaf."

Dallas News:

"The Kennedy bill contains more whitewash than cure.

"Recommendations in the President's labor message to Congress go much further. In addition to requiring union funds to be properly recorded and publicized as the Kennedy bill would do, the administration would restrain blackmail picketing and tighten down on the secondary boycott.

"The worst result might be that enactment of the Kennedy measure might deceive the public into thinking that labor abuses had been ended and that the issue could safely be forgotten. The big need is to arouse voters to demand a racket curb with teeth."

Lima (Ohio) News:

"Both have something to say on shakedown and coercive picketing.

"But here it seems probable the administration measure will be stricter and more specific. Also that it will supply much-needed definitions and prohibitions on secondary boycotts."

Wichita Falls (Tex.) Times:

"The Kennedy bill, however, still lacks teeth.

"Witnesses who have appeared before the Senate Labor Subcommittee on the Kennedy bill have voiced two major objections. Its provisions do not adequately protect the right of individual union members to have a say in union affairs, which hints that it still won't hit such targets as the Teamster's Hoffa, and it does not stop practices which have enabled corrupt union leaders to get and retain their positions of dominance—organizational picketing and secondary boycotts.

"At this point, the Kennedy bill seems premature and at best only a start, not the finished product, toward the labor reforms which the findings of the McClellan committee have made urgent."

Washington (Pa.) Observer: "But when union processes, such as picketing and jurisdictional boycotts, are used to throttle business enterprises which are not involved in existing labor disputes, certainly unions are going too far."

Columbus Dispatch: "If the final choice is between the administration and the Kennedy measures—and this would seem to be the case—the administration proposal is much more specific and much fairer to the public at large."

Utica Observer-Dispatch:

"Monitor Smith compared the Kennedy bill to a teapot with a hole in it. It looks attractive but it won't work.

"He said he found rank and file teamsters agreed with him that the Democratic bill fails to take care of the question of reprisals and it permits corrupt labor union leaders to use the most effective weapon they have for corruption and coercion * * *, the recognition of organizational picket lines."

Hudson (Mass.) Sun (under byline of Columnist Ralph Robey): "The administration bill is both a better and a stronger measure. In general it also prohibits wrongdoing within unions, but it goes farther. It also provides controls over secondary boycotts and coercive picketing."

San Diego Union:

"If we are to have labor legislation worthy of the name, the rights of the worker must be protected. He cannot be permitted to be used as an instrument for entrenching and expanding the power of a corrupt labor boss. The secondary boycott and blackmail picketing can be used to force the worker to be an unwilling accessory to extortion.

"The Eisenhower administration has shaped its labor bill to meet these evils. But Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY, Democrat, of Massachusetts, has ignored them in his proposed legislation. Senator KENNEDY'S thesis is that a bill protecting union democracy and touching on procedural reforms within the unions is enough.

"But corruption is much more than an internal affair. It affects the national interest. It will do no good to disclose the symptoms of corruption without striking against the basic causes of it. Secondary boycotts and blackmail picketing have been identified as causes.

"If that is so, they should be eradicated. Organized labor has a responsibility in this, too, and must give its best consideration to the proposed legislation."

Ogden Standard-Examiner: "President Eisenhower demands a ban on blackmail picketing and secondary boycotts in any labor legislation Congress passes. Secretary of Labor James P. Mitchell is backing him up in these demands. They have a tough fight on their hands but they deserve to succeed."

San Diego Tribune:

"The two proposals show their major differences when it comes to outside reforms.

"The administration bill is much broader in this respect. It contains provisions against secondary boycotts and blackmail picketing.

"The Kennedy bill does not touch these problems. The Senator maintains that amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act—the place to get at such matters as picketing and boycotts—ought to be placed in a separate labor reform bill.

"But these are the very abuses about which the public has been aroused by disclosures of the McClellan committee.

"Do-nothing or half measures simply won't do in 1959."

Pensacola Journal:

"It will be remembered that a second labor bill never got through the last session and Secretary Mitchell, therefore, is wise in urging that the pressure be kept on the Democrats not to forget the whole package.

"The public is fed up with many of labor's practices and the Democrats will lose rather than gain support if they fail this time to put through adequate controlling legislation, especially as they have plenty of votes to do so."

Peoria Journal Star:

"The milksop Kennedy-Ervin labor bill sailed through the Senate labor subcommittee yesterday without the prohibitions of blackmail picketing and secondary boycotts which are necessary to any effective labor legislation.

"It will not be satisfactory to the country, nor will it be of any effect in curbing labor abuses, unless the amendments voted down by the subcommittee are added to the bill before it receives final Senate action."

Knoxville Journal:

"As has been pointed out here, even when finally enacted the Kennedy bill will achieve nothing so far as the public is concerned. The bill has been presented to the country as one which is supposed to protect the money of the union member as well as other rights of the country as a whole.

"The worst thing about it—and undoubtedly this represented KENNEDY's real purpose in offering it—is that its enactment will effectively block all attempts to pass a bill which would really meet the requirements of the country in respect to placing a curb of some kind on union bosses' power. The majority in Congress will take the position that a reform bill has already been placed on the books and no additional legislation is therefore needed."

Bristol (Conn.) Press:

"Secretary of Labor James P. Mitchell has long been on record against any legislation which could be described as punitive toward labor. His record with reputable labor leaders has been a good one.

"Under the circumstances, it might be reasoned that when the Secretary speaks of the type of legislation needed to correct labor abuses that labor leaders might be inclined to side with them convinced that he really has their interests at heart.

"Mitchell is convinced that the Congress must act into law the most just proposals now being considered and he further considers the administration bill as the best that has been offered.

"He has told the Congress that Senators LYNDON JOHNSON and JOHN F. KENNEDY have the votes to do as they wish. No half measures will suffice. Despite obstacles which will be posed by special interests, it is up to Congress to pass the type of legislation that America needs."

Greenville (S.C.) News:

"The administration's offer to accept a two package labor bill this year puts Congress right where it belongs—on the spot.

"Until Secretary of Labor Mitchell made the offer, there seemed a good chance that Congress would put on a repeat performance of last year's fiasco when no labor bill at all was passed. As a result, even the hoodlums infesting the union business escaped punishment.

"This year Senator KENNEDY has announced he will offer again his mild bill. It is on the side of the angels, carrying the stamp of approval of both the AFL–CIO and the NAM. It is aimed only at the hooligans like Jimmy Hoffa and Johnny Dio and the union treasury robbers like Dave Beck who have disgraced the union movement.

"But Secretary Mitchell and several Senate and House Members promise not to rest on that. They will also back legislation aimed at curing other ills flowing from the abuse of union power."

Akron Beacon-Journal:

"'Whatever the packaging, it's the product that counts.'

"With these words Secretary of Labor James P. Mitchell made it clear that the administration won't argue as to whether Congress writes labor legislation in one bill or in two.

"This puts responsibility squarely on the Democratic leadership. There can be no excuse for failing to pass antiracket legislation, which is supposedly favored by almost everyone but which got shunted aside at the last session."

FREE UNION MEMBERS FROM BONDAGE

There's an old joke about the Boy Scout who was asked by his Scoutmaster, "What did you do as your good turn today?"

"I helped an old lady across the street," replied the lad.

"Good for you," said the Scoutmaster.

"Yeah," said the boy. "I had a hard time doing it, too. You see, she didn't want to cross the street."

The story points up the core of the issue involved in labor reform legislation now pending before Congress. Many labor bosses, in the name of doing a good turn, force "help" upon a person who didn't ask for help and compel him to do something he didn't want to do in the first place.

Free workers have every right to organize voluntarily. But no one has the right to force them to organize involuntarily.

While the issue is clouded in many thousands of words, basically it is a question of free voluntary unionism versus slave involuntary unionism.

The Democratic-sponsored Kennedy bill (S. 505) confines its reforms principally to better measures for putting certain crooked labor bosses in jail. It would, however, leave the door wide open for continued coercion in the name of labor. It would, in effect, permit the Boy Scout to qualify for his good turn by dragging the old lady across the street by her gray hair if she refused to come along nicely.

The administration-backed Goldwater bill (S. 748) also provides for better methods of putting the crooks in jail, and it does a more thorough job in this respect than the Kennedy measure. But on the matter of coercion, it provides that the wishes of the old lady be taken into consideration before any good turn is chalked up for the day.

Every evil, every form of labor corruption that has been brought to light by the McClellan committee, may be traced to the source of involuntary unionism. Whether they involved payoffs for insurance, mismanagement of pension funds, bribery for soft contracts, shakedowns of legitimate business for protection, stealing in the form of loans that are never repaid, or any other form of corruption, in every case it was the result of machinations of union bosses individually. In no instance did labor itself—that is the union members—vote to permit these crimes in their name.

The reason is simple—their union membership had little meaning and therefore it engendered little responsibility. Many members never joined, they were signed up when they applied for work. They had about as much say-so about it as about their withholding tax. Often they had less, for Government elections guarantee the right to vote whether your dues are paid or not, and they are held more frequently than some union elections.

A case this week in Miami, Fla., involving the Teamsters, Jimmy Hoffa's notorious racket, is an example. The union bosses sought to bring pressure on an employer by exploiting racial tension—the workers themselves didn't even know what was going on. Had the workers wanted to joint the Teamsters, they could have done so very easily, and they could strike if necessary for concessions from employers. But that isn't the way such unions are run. The union boss deals directly with the employer—the workers are just pawns. If the employer yields, the men don't join, they are signed up whether they want to or not, or fired, and the union begins extracting tribute. Those who protest are advised to make sure their accident insurance is paid up.

Other unions which wear the mantle of respectability are just as guilty. When loopholes in the law permit the bosses to enjoy a guaranteed dues-paying membership, there is no incentive for responsibility to the members. After all—they can't get disgusted and quit, not if they want to eat.

The way to have responsible unions is to make them responsible—to their own members, by emancipating these members from all forms of compulsion. The union bosses are spending millions to defeat legislation that would free their own members from bondage.

Let every provision of the opposing labor reform bills be examined in the light of whether it will increase the influence of union members or union bosses. And let's have the courage to resolve every case in favor of union members.

[From the Palm Beach Post-Times, Apr. 5, 1959]

MAJORITY PARTY

The "majority party" in the United States today is Walter Reuther's COPE—organized labor's Committee on Political Education.

That was the flat statement of U.S. Senator KARL E. MUNDT Republican of South Dakota, before a meeting of the Executives Club of the Palm Beaches here last week. In support of his contention he declared that COPE has more political workers, more publications, and more campaign funds than the other parties combined. And more Members of Congress, he said, are beholden to COPE than to either the Democrats or the Republicans.

Assuming that this is true—and we have no reason to doubt it—whither are we heading?

The present direction, at least, is obviously toward the Socialist-Labor government about which Donald R. Richberg warns in his book on the labor union monopoly. If such an economic dictatorship is achieved, the end is in sight for the constitutional government and constitutional liberties which made America a great Nation.

Already millions of working people are living under a form of dictatorship, imposed on them by a handful of labor bosses who even now are working hard to tighten their grip on their subjects. Their immediate objective toward that end is passage of what purports to be a labor reform bill now before the U.S. Senate—the so-called Kennedy-Ervin bill.

Senator MUNDT termed this a "namby-pamby" piece of legislation which has not a single effective paragraph in it. Ostensibly designed to protect the rights of the individual worker as well as those of the general public, it lacks the basic elements needed to accomplish either objective.

Most glaring deficiencies of the bill are its failure to deal with the two worst racketeering abuses disclosed by the McClellan committee hearings—secondary boycotts and blackmail picketing. It gives the membership no control over strikes, provides no fiduciary relationship between dues-paying members and their fund-handling officials, and ignores the practice of compulsory levies for political purposes.

It does carry a requirement for an honest, secret ballot in electing union officers, but makes no provision for an honest count of the ballots. Neither does it guarantee union members freedom of speech on union matters, equal protection of union rules, the right to a fair trial for alleged infraction of union rules, nor the right to appeal an adverse decision.

It should surprise no one, then, that the Kennedy-Ervin bill has the support of the union bosses. And Senator MUNDT, among others, sees in this fact the measure of the bill's value as a labor reform measure. The big union bosses, need some innocuous piece of legislation which they can sell as a cure for the evils disclosed by the McClellan committee to a public which was aroused, and, for a time at least, was demanding an effective remedy.

Sad to say, even the Florida delegation in Washington has shown a tendency to go along with this legislative farce. When the prototype of the present bill went through the congressional mill last year—the Kennedy-Ives bill—only Representatives HERLONG, HALEY, and CRAMER voted against it. Voting in favor were Senators GEORGE SMATHERS and SPESSARD HOLLAND, and the Representative from our own district, PAUL ROGERS. The bill was defeated in the House, but with the new COPE-stacked Congress, its successor may be rammed through this year.

If it is, COPE and ADA will have scored a signal victory, and the Democratic and Republican minority parties will have been shoved farther into the background. The powerful labor bosses will have been appeased, political expediency will have been served, and the Reuther forces will have advanced another giant stride toward complete control.

We will let Senator MUNDT ask the pertinent question: "Are we going to face the facts and keep America free—and American?"

NEED OF EXPANDED AIRLINE SERVICE IN KANSAS

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, Kansas is greatly in need of expanded airline service. In large areas in my State no present airline service is available. The lack of such service is working to the detriment of many communities in more than half the State.

There is pending before the Civil Aeronautics Board an application for greatly expanded airline service, under docket No. 5482. Extended hearings have been held and I cannot urge too strongly early action on the application.

Yesterday, at Salina, Kans., a meeting was held by representatives from the affected areas, including Great Bend, Hays, Manhattan, Pittsburgh, Goodland, Topeka, Oberlin, Concordia, Beloit, Salina, Emporia, Parsons, Independence, Kansas City, Junction City, and Hill City, who urged immediate action on docket No. 5482.

I ask unanimous consent that the telegram may be made a part of these remarks and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SALINA, KANS., April 16, 1959.

Hon. FRANK CARLSON,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

The undersigned cities and their respective chambers of commerce meeting in Salina, Kans., this date as Mayors' Committee of the State of Kansas through the auspices and organization of the Kansas State Chamber of Commerce; do hereby jointly and severally protest any further delay or continuance in the Kansas-Oklahoma local service case, docket No. 5482, et al., and respectfully request an early decision therein.

R. E. Morrison, Great Bend; Merle O'Loughlin, Hays; Myron Rooks, Manhattan; James Bevelli, Pittsburg; Selby S. Soward, Goodland; Lawrence R. Smith, Topeka; Marie Engleman, Chairman Joint Cities of Western Kansas—represents 12 western cities; Donald Frederickson, Oberlin; Dean W. Larson, Concordia; Wayne Moran, Beloit; Harold Yeager, Salina; H. E. Hamlin, Emporia; Keeney Charles, Parsons; R. P. Johnson, Independence; Charles F. Arnold, Kansas City; Robert K. Weary, Junction City; Don Fredrickson, Oberlin; Ralph Bethell, Hill City.

FREE WORLD REGRETS DULLES' RESIGNATION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the resignation of Secretary of State John Foster Dulles has sorrowfully stirred the hearts of men, not only in this country, but around the world. At the same time, it has stimulated a reevaluation of his outstanding role as Secretary of State.

The heartfelt regrets expressed by the President, Members of Congress, and other leaders and responsible people in this country and abroad have been multiplied manyfold in other lands. Over all, these illustrate the high esteem and respect which Mr. Dulles' service to his country and to the cause of world peace has engendered in the hearts of mankind.

As could be expected, the single exception is the report of joy in the Communist bloc. However, this too, in its own way, is a tribute to Mr. Dulles' contribution to the cause of peace and freedom—to his stalwart opposition to the efforts of communism to expand its sphere of control and influence.

A major conviction and a realistic one by which Mr. Dulles conducted policies relating to the Communists—which, no doubt, they disliked—was that no agreement with Moscow was worth anything, unless it was self-enforcing.

As we look to the future, we get a better idea of this great man's service to his country if we assess the scope and magnitude of the responsibility which must now fall upon his successor.

Today's newspapers carry tributes to the Secretary's outstanding service to his country, as well as report the sorrow and regret felt around the world at his resignation.

I request unanimous consent to have one such article, by Joseph W. Grigg in today's Washington Post and Times Herald, printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ONLY RED BLOC CHEERED BY NEWS DULLES MUST QUIT STATE DEPARTMENT

(By Joseph W. Grigg)

LONDON, April 15.—America's free world allies expressed shock and sorrow today at the resignation of U.S. Secretary of State John Foster Dulles. The Communist Czech radio applauded the news.

Radio Prague said Dulles' resignation was the "farewell of a typical representative of the outdated and old-fashioned power policy." It was the first comment from behind the Iron Curtain.

Russia's Tass news agency distributed the news of Dulles' resignation without comment. Dulles has been the Kremlin's chief "whipping boy" for years although the campaign of vilification had been somewhat muted since his illness.

UNEXPECTED TRIBUTE

However, an unexpected tribute was paid to Dulles by an unidentified diplomat at the Soviet Embassy in London. "Leaving policies aside, the man's devotion to his principles were indeed admirable," he said.

President Eisenhower's announcement came as a shock, even though it was not unexpected.

This was mixed somewhat with a feeling of relief that the die was finally cast. Some Western officials felt the continued uncertainty about United States policy leadership was a grave weakness for the West.

A saddened Prime Minister Harold Macmillan heard the news a moment before walking with bowed head from his official residence at 10 Downing Street on his way to Parliament.

"This is indeed sad news," he told Commons. "President Eisenhower once referred to Mr. Dulles as a dedicated man. From my long experience of him, I know how true this is."

British Foreign Secretary Selwyn Lloyd expressed "profound regrets at the decision that had to be taken."

French President Charles de Gaulle was meeting with his cabinet in Paris when the news arrived. There was no immediate comment from de Gaulle.

DULLES VIEWED AS SYMBOL

However, Premier Michel Debré, Foreign Secretary Maurice Couve de Murville, and other members of the government lauded Dulles.

"Whatever the differences there has been between the Western Powers, Dulles will remain a symbol because of his courage and fortitude," Debré said.

Couve de Murville said "it is sad news to me, for Mr. Dulles was a personal friend whom I liked and admired very much."

A statement issued by the West German Government at Bonn said Dulles' resignation was a heavy loss not only for the American people but also the whole free world—and especially the German people.

Adenauer, vacationing at Lake Como in Italy, voiced his deepest regrets, according to a spokesman.

German opposition Socialist Deputy Chairman Herbert Wehner expressed sympathy for Dulles in spite of past sharp disagreement with some of his cold war policies.

In London, opposition labor leader Hugh Gaitskell said he sometimes disagreed with Dulles but was sorry to see him resign.

Buckingham Palace said through a spokesman: "Queen Elizabeth will be saddened by the news."

Field Marshal Viscount Montgomery also expressed sorrow and said the West has lost a tower of strength and Britain a great friend.

COMMENT ELSEWHERE

There was this reaction elsewhere:

Rome: Italian Foreign Minister Giuseppe Pella voiced his deep regret.

The Rev. Avery Dulles, a Jesuit in Rome, tonight refused comment.

Vienna: Foreign Minister Leopold Figl said "it is a regrettable fact that Dulles had to decide on his resignation at a time just before important political decisions."

Tokyo: Foreign Minister Aiichiro Fujiyama expressed regret.

The Hague: Netherlands Foreign Minister Joseph M. A. H. Luns said Dulles' resignation is a great loss to the free world.

Barcelona: Turkish Foreign Minister Fatin Rustu Zorlu, visiting Spain, said Dulles "deserves the respect and admiration of all who love liberty." Dulles, he said, "was one of the persons who had contributed the most to the fight for peace."

Ottawa: Prime Minister John Diefenbaker and liberal Opposition Leader Lester B. Pearson expressed regret. Diefenbaker paid tribute to Dulles' dedicated purpose and unchallengeable integrity.

GOVERNMENT RELEASE OF STOCKPILED COPPER

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, the copper market in London since March 16, only a month ago, has dropped from $0.3240 to $0.2890, a decline in the price of copper of 3½ cents a pound.

On yesterday there was submitted in this body a resolution cosponsored by 20 Senators, asking that the administration not release any of the 128,000 short tons of copper it has in 1 of its 3 stockpiles. In that resolution it is stated:

That it is the sense of the Senate that the best interests of the country, from both the national security and economic standpoints, will not be served by the release of any part of any governmental inventory of copper at this time, but on the contrary incalculable damage to the national security and the economic well-being of the Nation would result by such action.

Mr. President, for more than 2 years the hard rock mining industry has been in difficult straits. Only in the past 5 or 6 months has there been a comeback of sorts.

This morning I called Mr. Walter Dougherty, the financial secretary of the Butte Miners Union and he informed me that in Butte at the end of March the number of dues-paying miners was 2,376. This is approximately 500 more than the number employed 6 months ago. Mr. Dougherty told me that he did not have the figures of the number of craftsmen working in and around the Butte mines, but it was his understanding that including craftsmen with the miners the total number of those employed was approximately 3,020.

In the southern section of Butte there is a manganese plant but only 3 dues-paying members are working there at the present time, whereas 2 years ago there were in excess of 150 workers.

Mr. President, these facts indicate the difficulty which those of us who come from the hard rock regions confront. Copper, lead, and zinc are the hardest hit of all the metals, and they have been the hardest hit for a long time.

I know the distinguished Presiding Officer of the Senate, our colleague from Utah [Mr. Moss] is well aware of the situation in his own State, as is my colleague the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], who had something to say about this matter yesterday.

I should like to point out to the Senate that 2 years ago more than 5,000 men were working in the Butte copper mines. Today, including the craftsmen, only a few more than 3,000 are employed.

If the decline in the price of copper continues—and such decline could be brought about by the release of 128,000 short tons in Government stockpile—it will mean that a depressed condition will become much more depressed. I hope, therefore, that the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, under the direction of former Governor Hoegh, of Iowa, will see fit immediately to issue a statement that so far as the Government of the United States is concerned none of the 128,000 short tons in the stockpile will be released, to further depress the domestic economy in this particular field.

I wish to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that since yesterday copper has dropped another three-fourths cent on the London market. As a result, because of the uncertainty and the possibility that the stockpile may be released in whole or in part, a depressed condition has been created in the industry which will become worse and not better unless and until the situation is brought to a head.

So I ask, in behalf of the people whom I, in part, represent, the copper miners in Butte and in the Rocky Mountain West, that some action be taken by this administration which will afford some stability and a little encouragement to this industry at this time.

This morning I called Don Paarlberg, one of the President's assistants at the White House. Mr. Paarlberg told me that the matter was under discussion but no decision had been reached.

In the interest of all concerned, and especially insofar as our own economy is concerned, I hope that this matter will be settled once and for all.

I also wish to point out in this respect that, though it is only a rumor, it is my understanding, on the basis of a purported statement made by Mr. J. Roy Price, who is an Assistant Director of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, that supposedly contacts of some sort were to have been made with Canada, Mexico, Peru, and Chile, to indicate to them that there was a possibility this was going to be brought about.

Therefore, not only is it important to our domestic economy that the Government's stockpile be maintained and not released, but also it is important in the field of Western Hemispheric relations.

I conclude, Mr. President, by stating once again that this matter, which is so important to the economy of the western area of the country, should be given serious consideration, and, in line with the suggestion made by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] on yesterday, that "this copper should be removed to a jurisdiction which would prevent any possibility that it could be dumped on the markets."

In that way we could be sure that the one stockpile over which the Congress has no jurisdiction—as it evidently has no jurisdiction over this stockpile—would be put in one of the other two stockpiles and thereby would be subject to the will and the intent of Congress. In this way we would at least have to be advised of what was going on and then be in a position to do something about it.

ITALIAN DECISION TO ACCEPT IRBM MISSILES

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, as a member of the Armed Services Committee, I was glad of the Italian decision to accept IRBM missiles. It deserves to be acknowledged as a gesture commanding respect and appreciation. In fact, Italy was the first country in continental Europe to reach agreement for the stationing of these weapons on its territory for its own as well as for Western defense. As we all know, Great Britain had already done so.

The Italian Government, although aware of the fierce opposition it would have met at the hands of the Communists, persevered in its initiative in the firm belief it would thus serve the interests of its own people as well as the interests of general peace.

I believe that in the face of the violent campaign launched by the Communists against the democratic government of Prime Minister Segni we want to pay our tribute to all freedom-loving Italians.

I am convinced that there is nothing more hypocritical than the intimidating campaign the Communists have been waging for years and that now is being reenacted in Italy. These weapons do not represent a threat against anybody, for they will never be used for aggressive purposes. These weapons, like all the rest of the NATO system, have a purely defensive character.

It is one more move that aims to the strengthening of the free world defenses and represents a bulwark against the aspirations of world domination by international communism.

Like the United States, we know that Italy has long since stated its position in favor of general and controlled disarmament. Italy has also participated in the Geneva talks on prevention of surprise attacks whose progress has been frustrated—as is the case in other fields of disarmament—by the constant Soviet refusal to consent to valid systems of control.

The Communists should be well aware of all this and should exert their pressures on the U.S.S.R. in order to make disarmament possible—not on freedom loving countries.

Mr. President, the governments that have been in power in Italy since World War II have given proof of great insight and political foresight. The decision of Prime Minister Segni's government falls in line with the policies of Western solidarity and courageous and timely sense of responsibility that were first outlined by the late Signor De Gasperi.

For these reasons I join in applauding its initiative, but also emphasize the ever increasing importance that Italy has in world affairs and the wisdom of the Italian Government in international decisions and the value of consultation with them prior to the forthcoming talks between the East and West.

THE INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I wish to commend Vice President NIXON for his address on Monday evening, April 13, before the Academy of Political Science supporting the proposal that the International Court of Justice be more fully utilized as an effective instrument of world peace.

For many years I have advocated greater reliance on the use of law rather than force to settle international disputes. It is gratifying to see more and more men in public life lending their support to such an idea.

The International Court of Justice as a means of settling disputes between nations was supported by President Truman over 13 years ago. The Court was forcefully and ably backed by the Honorable Dean Acheson in 1946 before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee when he spoke on behalf of President Truman's administration in his role as Under Secretary of State.

The Senate of the United States on August 2, 1946, by a vote of 62 to 2 approved Senate Resolution 196, as introduced by the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] and declared acceptance by the United States of the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice in all legal disputes concerning the interpretation of a treaty and any question of international law.

The resolution quite properly provided that the Court's jurisdiction would not apply to "disputes with regard to matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States."

An amendment, however, was added on the Senate floor—the so-called Connally amendment—which provided that the United States itself would determine which were domestic disputes and therefore not within the Court's jurisdiction. Similar reserve clauses were later adopted by almost all of the countries which have accepted the Court's jurisdiction. As a result, the International Court of Justice has operated with its hands tied. Since the Court was established in 1945, it has decided only 10 cases.

There is general agreement among students of international law that the Senate's adoption in 1946 of the Connally amendment was one of the major causes for the International Court of Justice being so ineffective. This is what the distinguished lawyer, Charles S. Rhyne, past president of the American Bar Association, and present chairman of the Committee on World Peace Through Law of the American Bar Association said on this point this past March 10:

> I am therefore firmly convinced that one of the major causes for the empty courtroom of the United Nations' Court is the Connally reservation which was created by the U.S. Senate, is maintained by the U.S. Senate, and can be removed by the U.S. Senate.

In order to make the International Court of Justice a more effective instrument of world peace through law, during the past month I submitted a resolution, Senate Resolution 94, which would delete this reserve clause.

I was, therefore, most edified to note the Vice President's assurance in his April 13 address that the administration will in the near future submit to the Congress its recommendations for modification of the reserve clause.

Quite frankly, I have been quite puzzled as to the reason for the administration's delay in submitting such recommendations in view of the President's indication in his state of the Union message that proposals would be forthcoming concerning our relationship to the International Court of Justice.

I have also asked the State Department to give us its observations and views on Senate Resolution 94. Such a statement has not been forthcoming. There has been no indication from the appropriate agencies of the executive branch.

When I submitted my resolution I said:

> I hope the administration will support my resolution. I hope the State Department will come before the Committee on Foreign Relations and in its testimony offer its support to the resolution.

The announcement this week of the administration's interest in the Court gives me reason to believe that perhaps my hopes will prove fruitful. Nothing could please me more. This is an issue which rises above and beyond partisan politics. Efforts to advance the cause of world peace through law demand the support of leaders of both of our great parties united in a common cause on behalf of peace based upon justice.

It is only logical that the United States, which has a Government based upon the rule of law, rather than the rule of men, should take the lead in promoting the International Court of Justice. It is not an accident that none of the Communist countries has ever agreed to submit to the jurisdiction of the Court to settle international disputes.

The time is now at hand for the Senate of the United States to give concrete evidence of our desire for world peace through law by deleting the reserve clause. I may add that it is also late, and time is running out for the executive branch to give us its support and its sense of guidance and direction.

Even if the Soviet Union continues to reject the Court's jurisdiction, our action will indicate to the world which country is for a just peace based upon law and which is not. We have, I submit, Mr. President, nothing to lose and everything to gain. But it will require some executive leadership, and not merely a few paragraphs in the state of the Union message. The resolution is here. What we need now is an indication from the President and the State Department that their interest in it is broader than merely a speech by the Vice President, who gives us his assurance of sincere interest in the question of effective rules of law among the nations of the world.

GOVERNMENT BONDS

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, a considerable number of bonds of the U.S. Government reached alltime lows yesterday. This represents a loss of many millions of dollars to many citizens who bought bonds of their Government in good faith. Victory bonds were selling at a little above 84 yesterday. This trend toward lower Government bond prices has been promoted by policies of our Government. The present situation has been brought about partly by those policies. If they are continued, the consequences will be even more severe than those already apparent, which are severely hurtful.

STATE INCOME TAX ON EARNED INCOME OF NONRESIDENTS

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, a subcommitee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary is presently holding hearings on a proposed constitutional amendment to limit the powers of the States to tax the personal income of nonresidents. I emphasize that it relates to earned income. While these hearings have focused on the situation as it affects the States of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, also concerned is every one of 32 States which imposes a similar State income tax. I am therefore raising the issue now to call it to the attention of my colleagues from all these States, as it is important to all of us.

It is a matter in which the decision must finally rest on what is fair and proper to the individual and to the incentive he has to remain at his work, as well as on what is essential to the budgets and financing of so many States.

At the present time 17 States are without an income tax, while 32 States impose such a tax, and every one of the latter taxes the income of nonresidents whose income comes from within such States. The pending constitutional amendment would permit the residents of the 17 States to work in a neighboring State, reap the full benefits of its government, its economy, and its business climate, without making any direct contribution to these factors. Yet their employment opportunities and their earning power are built upon the existence of effective State and local government in the place where they are employed and the manifold levies of government there.

There is little doubt about the legal right of the State where a man works to tax his income. It has been established by Supreme Court decisions, and the present move to deal with the situation by way of a constitutional amendment bears out the legal situation. The witnesses appearing before the subcommittee are addressing themselves to this phase of the problem in an expert manner. I am addressing myself to the moral right—the inherent fairness of imposing such taxes on nonresidents, so that they can carry their share of the load.

Would it not be absurd if a man could get up in the morning, cross a State line to go to work, earn his pay, take his amusement, be protected, and spend most of his waking hours in a State where he does not have his home, and then, by crossing the State line again in the evening, contribute nothing to the operation of the place where he passes most of his life? He certainly should bear the cost for his fair share of the benefits received all day long out of his earnings from the economy of the State where he works. Otherwise, it would be discriminatory against the other citizens of that State.

There is always a claim of inequity in any tax system. In my own State of New York there is a situation covering allowable deductions for residents and nonresidents which has been the basis for much criticism by nonresidents, though there are substantial reasons for this differentiation, and it has been specifically upheld by the Supreme Court. I certainly favor adjustments to meet the criticism so far as possible. However, the way to deal with these problems is not to destroy the power of the State to tax what is legitimately subject to tax. As a matter of fact, Governor Rockefeller, of New York, has taken up this matter with the Governors of the adjacent States of New Jersey and Connecticut, whose citizens are most concerned, in order to work out needed adjustments. The preliminary report on the committee, which was published in December 1958, recommended some revisions on this basis, and the present administration of the State, in the full knowledge that this will have the effect of reducing somewhat the needed State revenues, will try to negotiate a fair formula.

The principle that such taxation is proper should not be taken away by constitutional amendment, but every effort should be made to make it reasonable and fair. Otherwise, an adverse public opinion could well create receptivity to a restriction on the State power of taxation.

I ask unanimous consent to make a part of my remarks, for the enlightenment of my fellow Members of the Senate, a statement issued by the Honorable Joseph H. Murphy, commissioner of taxation and finance, and president of the New York State Tax Commission, before the Senate Committee on Constitutional Amendments; also a very interesting report made at the special request of the preceding Governor of New York, the Honorable Averell Harriman, which outlines the problem and states various types of adjustments which might be made.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE JOSEPH H. MURPHY, COMMISSIONER OF TAXATION AND FINANCE, AND PRESIDENT, NEW YORK STATE TAX COMMISSION, BEFORE THE U.S. SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS, WASHINGTON, D.C., APRIL 16, 1959

Mr. Chairman, my name is Joseph H. Murphy, commissioner of taxation and finance and president of the New York State Tax Commission. I have been asked by Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller to represent him before you.

I should like to thank you, not only on my own behalf but also on behalf of Governor Rockefeller, for this opportunity to present the views of New York State on Senate Joint Resolutions 29 and 67.

As I understand it, Senate Joint Resolution 29 prohibits State taxation of income derived from personal services of nonresidents. Senate Joint Resolution 67 contains a similar prohibition, with certain ramifications not here material.

As Governor Rockefeller has indicated in his letter of April 9, 1959, to the Honorable JACOB K. JAVITS and to the Honorable KENNETH B. KEATING, Members of your honorable body, the State of New York is unalterable opposed to amendments of this nature.

Personal income taxation is a most provocative subject today—regardless of who is affected. We in New York have had considerable reason in recent months to be most sensitive to the implications of any action in this area. In the field of State taxation of nonresidents, we have had the king-size version of a nationwide problem.

State taxation of nonresidents is another of the social and economic problems created by complex metropolitan areas which embrace more than one State. These problems are not new in New York, but they have been greatly magnified in recent years as transportation facilities have been improved, as living standards and incomes have risen, and as the desire for home ownership has been heightened.

It would be a repugnant arrangement, indeed, if Government could decide that individuals must live in the same State from which they derive their livelihood.

Naturally, there has never been any question in this country about the inherent right of a free choice of residence. Nonetheless, problems do arise when the choice is made to reside in a State other than the one of employment. New conditions are created which, at first blush, seem difficult to reconcile with historical concepts of the citizen's relation to his government.

However, a large part of the problem of nonresident taxation, in the public mind, at least, stems from a misunderstanding of the conditions under which a citizen can be subject to taxation by two jurisdictions. This, then, is the framework within which lies the special problem of income taxation of nonresidents.

In New York State the concern of our administration is no different with respect to nonresidents than it is with respect to those who both work and reside within the State. The man who works in New York but takes the ferry home in the evening is every bit as much a part of our community as the man who rides home on the subway. Whether he is a New Jersey machinist working on a missile project on Long Island, a Connecticut stockbroker on Wall Street, or a Vermonter making turbines in Schenectady, his well-being is inextricably tied to that of the State of New York. We are equally indebted to these individuals for their individual productivity, their ingenuity, and industry.

These great indispensable human resources, we believe, must be carefully tended and developed if we are to prosper. Consequently, we can ill afford to antagonize in anyway or to subject to discriminatory taxation any segment of our work force. For above all, our new administration in New York is attempting to implement by direct and practical means the primary goal of maximum progress through economic growth. Any form of repressive taxation can hardly contribute to this progress.

I am sure you are quite aware that we in New York have had to make some hard decisions in the tax field in recent months. We have had to recognize that the economic health of the State is intimately tied to the soundness of its financial condition. This, in turn, requires a tax structure adequate to meet our urgent requirements but carefully designed to minimize interference with economic growth. Nonetheless, the ancient burden of taxation, we feel, cannot be and indeed should not be disguised or sugar coated. It is a bitter medicine, but like all good medicines it should improve the health of the patient.

As we move nearer the goals we have set for ourselves, the obvious rewards will not be confined to those who reside in New York State. You may rest assured that as I am speaking now, the great human and economic resources of the State of New York are being mobilized for this effort.

For the past 40 years of State taxation of personal incomes, there has been virtually constant argument regarding the treatment of nonresidents. There has been much discussion, for example, about the relative priority of tax claims over the income of nonresidents as between the State of residence and the State of employment. Although there is an abundance of strong arguments on both sides of these questions, the basic legal issues have long since been resolved.

In an early and crucial case in this area, Mr. Justice Pitney, in affirming the rights of States to impose an income tax on nonresidents, succinctly stated the essence of the matter—that a State "may levy a duty of like character and not more onerous in its effect upon income accruing to nonresidents from their property or business within the State or their occupation carried on therein.[1]

We in New York, and I believe all the other income tax States, adhere to the belief that the measure of a taxpayer's liability should be the benefits conferred upon him by the taxing jurisdiction. These benefits, I shall attempt to show later, are numerous and extensive with respect to his economic and social welfare.

At the hearings which preceded the adoption of our New York law in 1919, the question of what to do about nonresidents was discussed at great length by the legislators and their staff of experts. They felt that taxing residents only would lead to considerable emigration to neighboring States which had no income tax. In reviewing the deliberations of the legislative committees of that time it is clear that the decision to tax nonresidents was not based primarily on the desire for additional revenue, but rather because it would be the means for discouraging future tax avoidance through emigration. Our experience with taxpayers of all kinds indicates that that conclusion is just as sound 40 years later as it was then.

In recent years there have been countless instances where tax laws in some jurisdictions have given rise to situations in which taxation or some particular feature of it has become one of the major determinants of economic behavior. This is certainly alien to what we in New York feel should be sound tax policy consistent with basic democratic principles. If I were to select one principle of taxation to which we firmly subscribe I would choose this one—that tax laws should be revenue measures, which, in and of themselves, do not introduce artificialities in our business conduct. A corollary, of course, is that tax laws should not be such that they become primary determinants of our behavior in other spheres.

If nonresidents were to be exempted from taxation in New York State and in the 31 other income tax States, I am frankly concerned about the potential extent of social and economic dislocations which may result. Over and above this consideration, the fact would remain that to exempt nonresidents from the income tax in the State in which they are employed would represent a flagrant discrimination against the resident taxpayer who would be paying in full for the many services and functions enjoyed by the nonresident.

Stated briefly, our conviction in this matter is that nonresidents should be taxed because of the various benefits they receive. I am reminded of the opinion in a very old tax case in which the pith of this was very well stated: "The power of taxation, indispensable to the existence of every civilized government, is exercised upon the assumption of an equivalent rendered to the taxpayer in the protection of his person and property, in adding to the value of such property, or in the creation and maintenance of public conveniences in which he shares."[2]

Obviously, under the best of circumstances the value of these public services can only roughly be measured. Many people today tend to overlook these fundamental functions of protection of the person, the enjoyment of life and liberty, the right to acquire and possess property of every kind and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety, subject to reasonable laws. These are the real purposes of government which we should never take for granted. These are among the things we are paying for with taxation.

To be more specific, one can hardly overlook the value to the commuter of the highly efficient but costly system of parkways and expressways in the metropolitan area—or the extensive recreational facilities, State parks and so on, either just north of the New Jersey line or along Long Island Sound convenient to Connecticut—or, in another area, the policing of working conditions by our Labor Department as well as its labor mediation facilities—or, the very recent aids granted to railroads by our 1959 legislature which were designed primarily with the commuter in mind. The list is virtually endless.

I recently read in the press a statement alleged to have been made by one of our nonresidents. He acknowledged that certain services were performed for his convenience—specifically that the streets were paved between Grand Central Terminal and the RCA Building. Now, I think that most nonresidents appreciate that we are furnishing a great deal more than the paving of 10 blocks of streets in New York City.

Aside from the many obvious, direct services performed in New York State, it is very easy to ignore a factor of overriding importance—the economic environment. New York State, by the waving of a magic wand, did not suddenly become a good place to work. Those who derive their livelihood in our State have found a whole social and economic system ready and waiting for them—a system of orderly markets, peace and order, a corps of skilled workers, a vast business apparatus, and an atmosphere conducive to economic progress. All this has been developed by years of careful husbanding of resources by government in an active partnership with private enterprise.

While we feel that we have a fine economic environment at the moment, we feel just as strongly that we have not achieved perfection and that substantial further progress can be and will be made here. The stimulation of the economy with minimal guidance, we feel, must come from our State government. The costs, as well as the rewards, of this great endeavor must be shared by all of the participants. Our great concern now is that these costs be shared fairly. If the costs bear harshly on any sector, we want to know about it and to take corrective action.

At various times in my remarks I have used the expression "favorable business climate." Permit me to tell you what we mean and what we are striving toward. First of all, we believe it means putting government's house in order by operating within a sound budget structure with everyone bearing his fair share of the load. Secondly, we believe it means to provide and guard a free competitive environment in which industry can produce and sell to the direct benefit of owners, management, and employees. Third, we believe it means to create and safeguard a system which encourages the individual to choose the type of employment he prefers and in which he excels; to choose the location in which he will work and the conditions under which he will work. Finally, we believe it means actively to promote the establishment of new enterprises and the expansion of existing facilities in order to produce a maximum of productive and profitable job opportunities.

This is the broad outline of our program in New York State. It is directed toward all who derive their income within New York, and we believe very strongly that all should contribute to the cost of the program.

Because of the widespread interest in the subject, we have developed substantial analyses of data relating to nonresidents subject to our tax. As a group, nonresidents differ materially from residents; not only residents in general but also those who reside in New York City.

To begin with, we have about 190,000 nonresidents subject to our tax, 137,000 from New Jersey, 20,000 from Connecticut, and the remainder scattered throughout the country. In terms of tax liability, nonresidents as a group in 1956, the latest year for which we have complete data, paid a total tax of $33 million—$20 million from residents of New Jersey, $8 million from residents of Connecticut, and the remainder scattered.

To illustrate the differences between residents and nonresidents, the average total income reported by all residents (before deductions and exemptions) was $5,950. Residents of New York City do not differ materially as their average income was $5,953. The New York State income of New Jersey residents, by contrast, averaged $7,022, or 18 percent more than residents; and Connecticut residents $11,434, or 92 percent more than residents. Nonresidents, as a group, had average New York incomes of $7,287, or 22 percent higher than residents.

From another standpoint, a percentage distribution of residents and nonresidents by total income classes makes it abundantly clear that our nonresidents as a whole are far from typical taxpayers. In relative terms, nonresidents have one-sixth more taxpayers with gross incomes between $5,000 and $10,000 than residents; over twice as many between $10,000 and $25,000; almost 50 percent more between $25,000 and $50,000, and two-thirds more with gross incomes in excess of $50,000.

Available statistics indicate that the income of New Jersey residents is slightly less than the income of New York residents on an average and taking both States as a whole. These statistics highlight the more favorable position in which New Jersey residents working in New York find themselves.

As income is generally regarded as a reasonable indication of how much something is worth, let us see what proportion of total income reported in New York State was earned by nonresidents as a group. In our total revenue picture, the $33 million derived from nonresidents represented about 2 percent of New York State's total revenue for 1957–58. However, our studies also indicate that nonresidents received 5.3 percent of all income reported. This means that the nonresident receiving over 5 percent of all income reported within the State of New York pays only 2 percent of the cost of our State government. This impresses us as a fair bargain.

Does it not seem fair that the nonresidents should make a fair contribution for governmental services in return for such obviously favorable conditions? Here we must remember that for the nonresidents these averages are based solely on their incomes reportable to New York State. As the earnings of nonresidents are so high, the amount of "other income", which is not subject to the New York tax, such as dividends, interest, capital gains on securities, rents or other income earned outside New York State, would be significant.

The basis of equity in our method of taxing nonresidents is closely related to this "other income". Since legally we do not and cannot recognize the existence of this income, we have felt that, in general, we cannot recognize these other deductions which, in the main, are of a personal nature and are unconnected with the production of income in New York.

I realize that it is difficult to convince a taxpayer whose entire income is earned in New York that he cannot deduct the property tax or the mortgage interest on his New Jersey home. Yet, if he moved to another location in New Jersey and rented his original home, I believe he would have no difficulty understanding that as we do not tax his rental income, we could not recognize the taxes or any other costs attributable to the rental property.

As a matter of fact, we in New York are sympathetic to this particular problem which the nonresident faces. Under our new tax law, the maximum optional deduction, available to nonresidents as well as residents, was increased from $500 to $1,000. This will have a very beneficial effect on nonresidents earning over $5,000 annually in New York State. It will result in a reduction in taxes for a great many nonresidents.

We are presently exploring the ramifications of allowing the nonresident to prorate his deductions based upon his New York earnings. In doing this, we are motivated by a concern for the wage earner whose sole earnings are derived from New York employment and who does not receive any of the other forms of income which we do not tax. This, in no wise, alters our position that the nonresident has a real and substantial obligation to the State of New York for the extensive benefits he receives in the way of public services, higher pay, and favorable working conditions.

Now, let us approach it from another standpoint. While no precise measurement can ever be made of the value of basic public services to any citizen or any group of citizens, a rough comparison can be made between what the nonresidents pay us under the personal income tax and an approximation of their share of basic costs. Since most of our nonresidents are employed in New York City, for purposes of illustration we can make a crude allocation of their share of the cost of basic governmental services in New York City. As you are probably aware, virtually all the nonresidents employed in New York City are from New Jersey and Connecticut.

Our statistical studies indicate that New Jersey and Connecticut taxpayers constitute 7.2 percent of the total number of taxpayers employed in New York City. It follows then that 7.2 percent would be a rough approximation of the nonresidents' share of basic municipal costs.

During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1958, New York City spent about $427 million on basic services, including only police, fire, sanitation, and the local judicial system. And I must point out here parenthetically, that New York City annually receives hundreds of millions of dollars in the form of financial aid from the State government. If we then apply the 7.2 percent factor to the $427 million spent by New York City, we find that the nonresidents' share of the cost would be approximately $31 million. The $31 million contrasts with $28 million of personal income tax paid by residents of these two States.

This method, of course, assumes an equal sharing of cost on a per capita basis. If we calculated the nonresidents' share on an income basis, that is, relating the total New York income of the New Jersey and Connecticut residents to the total income of all persons in New York City, as shown on our tax returns, the nonresidents' share increases to 9 percent. Applying the 9 percent to the $427 million in cost indicates that the nonresidents' portion of the burden would be over $38 million.

This simple illustration, obviously, does not take into consideration any of the multitude of direct and indirect services and functions of the State Government itself nor does it take into consideration the intangible, but very valuable, feature of favorable economic environment. The fact that the average income of nonresidents is so much higher than that of residents appears to be mighty convincing evidence of just how valuable the environment is. You can readily see that despite the crudeness of these approaches, New York State is certainly not overcharging for all that it provides to the nonresident who is working here. It seems to us that a strong case could be made to the contrary.

Certainly, no income tax law can ever be perfect in design, nor is it possible for a tax law, however carefully designed, to fall with precisely equal weight on all taxpayers in similar circumstances. It does appear, though, that in actual practice the New York State tax approaches this ideal for the vast majority of taxpayers.

Much of the discussion about the problem of the nonresidents reminds me of a conversation I once had with a small industrialist. Several years ago this man located his new plant in a relatively undeveloped area. When he built the plant, real estate taxes were very low. Several years later they were many times higher, but, you see, shortly after he built his plant, his employees, many coming from distant locations, built homes in the area. Many municipal services were needed and furnished. The community then drew many other industries to it and in a relatively short period, my acquaintance's plant was the center of a full-fledged small industrialized community. Yet in an adjoining township, which remained undeveloped the taxes were still very low.

My acquaintance felt that he had made a very big mistake in building his plant where he did rather than in the adjoining township. The point of my story, gentlemen, is that there are very few, if any, tax havens today. The blessings of growth are numerous but they do carry with them the responsibility of taxation.

It is all too easy to assume that the costs of operating the government of New York State or New York City should be borne entirely by those who live there. However, I do not believe that most nonresidents subscribe to this theory, no matter how pleasant a thought this would be from their viewpoint. If a business is situated in a community, the owner clearly recognizes his social responsibility to pay taxes on the profits of the business to the community in which his business is conducted. I think that most nonresident salary recipients recognize the same responsibility—not that they are philanthropic about it; it is just a hard reality.

Again I should like to thank you, gentlemen, both on my behalf and on behalf of Governor Rockefeller, for this opportunity to present the views of New York State.

DECEMBER 3, 1958.

Hon. AVERELL HARRIMAN,
Governor of the State of New York,
Albany, N.Y.

DEAR GOVERNOR: In January of this year, after a conference among the Governors of New Jersey and Connecticut and yourself, a three-man committee was constituted to examine into the problems raised by the New York tax on income of nonresidents of the State. The Governor of New Jersey designated, as his representative, William E. Warren, Esq., dean of the Columbia University School of Law and a resident of New Jersey. The Governor of Connecticut designated, as his representative, Roswell Magill, Esq., a leading tax law specialist practicing in New York City and a resident of Westport, Conn. You did me the honor of naming me as your representative.

It was understood that the committee would work informally and that each representative would report separately to his principal. The committee was not empowered to take action.

The members of the committee consulted with each other on several occasions. In addition, we received excellent advice from various private citizens. A report of the Federal Bar Association of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut was particularly helpful. I am informed that Dean Warren and Mr. Magill have already reported informally to their respective principals. My purpose in writing this letter is to render a similar report to you.

THE WORKINGS OF THE NEW YORK TAX

Since 1919, New York State has imposed a tax on certain income of nonresidents of the State. Twenty-eight other States also impose a tax on nonresident income. The New York tax rate is graduated from 2 percent to 7 percent.

The relative burden of the New York State income tax on residents and nonresidents may be summarized as follows:

(a) On the income side, the tax base for nonresidents is much narrower than that for residents. Residents of New York are taxed on income from all sources, including earnings, dividends, interest and other investment income, and gains from the sale of property. Nonresidents, on the other hand, are taxed only on income from New York sources. (A nonresident who works partly within and partly without the State, may allocate his earnings on the basis of the time spent in New York.) This includes primarily earnings within the State. Dividends, interest, and other investment income are not subject to the New York tax, even though the securities are physically located in New York State. Similarly, gains from the sale of intangible property such as securities are not subject to the New York tax in the hands of nonresidents even though physically located in New York State, unless the nonresident is a dealer.

(b) On the exemption side, residents and nonresidents are treated alike. Both are entitled to $1,000 exemption if single, or $2,500 if married, and to $400 for each dependent.

(c) On the deduction side, nonresidents are entitled to less benefits than residents. If a resident chooses to itemize his deductions, he may deduct such items as interest on borrowed money (such as a mortgage on his home), real estate taxes, all charitable contributions, medical expenses and up to $150 of life insurance premiums. A nonresident, however, is limited in his deductions to those items connected with his taxable income from New York sources. He is not permitted to take deductions for the above-mentioned items except with respect to contributions to New York charities. On the other hand, if a taxpayer chooses to take the standard deduction of 10 percent of taxable income, or $500, whichever is less, he may do so whether he is a resident or nonresident of New York.

Finally, the nonresident has his tax initially withheld at the source, that is, by his employer, while the resident does not.

THE BACKGROUND OF THE PROBLEM

Over the years, since the New York tax on nonresidents was first imposed, there have been periodic protests by the residents of the neighboring States. In its most virulent form, this protest is predicated on the assertion that nonresidents should not be taxed at all by New York. The slogan "Taxation Without Representation" is the war cry of these protestants. I believe this shibboleth can be disposed of in short order. First of all, on purely legal grounds, it is without foundation. A tax on the income of nonresidents from sources within the State was specifically held constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1920 (Shaffer v. Carter, 252, U.S. 37 (Oklahoma income tax); see also Travis v. Yale & Towne Mfg. Co., 252 U.S. 60 (New York income tax)). The Supreme Court reaffirmed its position on this score as late as 1956 in a case specifically involving the applicability of the New York tax to a New Jersey resident (Goodwin v. State Tax Commission, 352 U.S. 805).

More importantly, however, is the fact that practically every State taxes nonresidents in one form or another. New York residents, for example, pay excise taxes in the adjoining States (such as the gasoline tax) which became part of the general revenues and go to support facilities used by all citizens, resident and nonresident alike. The fact that New York residents have no voice in the selection of the officials who decide to impose such taxes has never been an inhibiting factor. It seems clear that, in a similar fashion, the income tax paid by nonresidents to New York State covers, in part, the cost of facilities and services which these nonresidents use in producing the income subject to tax. These include police and fire protection, improvement and maintenance of toll free roads, streets and sidewalks, street lights, transit facilities subsidized by tax exemption and a myriad of other facilities and services which are taken for granted. It is no answer to say that the income tax is paid to the State and that the facilities and services are provided by the local county and municipal governments. New York State provides substantial financial assistance to these local units so that indirectly, if not directly, the State income tax helps to pay for the cost of these facilities and services.

The more reasonable basis of protest by nonresidents is that they are discriminated against in the matter of deductions. The wage earner who owns a home in New Jersey, and commutes to New York daily, resents the fact that in computing the tax which he must pay to New York on his earnings, he cannot deduct the interest on his mortgage, the real estate taxes on his house, contributions to his local church and charities, doctors' bills, etc. He feels that this is inequitable and that in some fashion he should be able to get the benefit of these items as residents of New York State do.

As reasonable as this position appears to be, it is not without its weaknesses. The nonresident wage earner forgets that only a portion of his income is subject to the New York tax—if he has dividends on stocks or interest on savings bank accounts, he need not report and pay tax on those items. In terms of comparison with the resident who has to pay tax on these items, the nonresident has an advantage. Thus, for example a nonresident who has $6,000 of earnings in New York and $600 of dividend income and utilizes the standard deduction, will pay a tax on only $5,500 (before exemptions), while a resident will pay a tax on $6,100. Nor is this a hypothetical situation. Contrary to what is generally believed, nontaxable income of nonresidents is received by a significant proportion of persons in modest circumstances. Insofar as dividends and interest alone are concerned, 20 percent of the taxpayers with gross income between $5,000 and $6,000 receive such income and among the recipients, it averages $545 a year. At the $10,000 level, 1 out of every 2 taxpayers reports income from dividends and interest of almost $1,500 annually.

Another aspect of the situation which is overlooked is the fact that nonresidents are entitled to the full exemptions even though they are required to report only a portion of their income. Thus, a nonresident married taxpayer with two children who has earnings from within New York State of $10,000, nontaxable income of $1,500, and takes advantage of the standard deduction, will pay tax on only $6,200, while a resident taxpayer will pay tax on $7,700.

The foregoing examples are not intended to imply that nonresidents and residents in the same financial position should necessarily pay the same tax. After all, there are substantial differences in the benefits received by each from governmental services and facilities provided directly or indirectly by New York State. But they do indicate that the alleged discrimination is substantially less than is generally understood.

Finally, the most important weakness in the position of nonresidents who complain about the New York State tax stems from the fact that neither New Jersey nor Connecticut have a State income tax. If our neighboring States imposed an equal or higher tax than New York, their residents would not have to pay any New York income tax. The reason for this is that the New York law provides that a nonresident who is required to pay an income tax is entitled to credit against his New York tax the amount of tax paid to his home State on the income subjected to tax by New York.

I do not conceive it to be within my province to question the system of taxation of our neighboring States. If, for historical reasons or otherwise, New Jersey and Connecticut choose not to raise their revenues through an income tax, that is their business. I suggest, however, that under such circumstances, the complaints of their residents against New York are less justifiable, particularly where the claim is for complete exemption from the New York tax.

Despite the fact that I believe there is a logical answer to the complaints by the residents of our neighboring States, it nevertheless appears to me that there is sufficient basis to their complaints to justify an examination of various alternative modifications in the New York law. In analyzing these modifications, however, I consider it important that the financial aspects of the situation be taken into account. In this connection, it should be noted that in 1957, New York derived revenue of more than $34 million from the income tax on nonresidents, of which $23 million was paid by New Jersey residents and almost $7 million by Connecticut residents.

ALTERNATIVE MODIFICATIONS AND THEIR FINANCIAL IMPLICATIONS

Perhaps the simplest relief which could be given to nonresidents is in the area of charitable deductions. At present, nonresidents are only permitted to take deductions for contributions to New York charities. As a practical matter, this limitation operates to discriminate against the lower income taxpayer. The high income bracket nonresident has available to him a simple device for avoiding the limitation. He organizes a family foundation as a New York membership corporation and thereby gets a deduction for all his contributions to the foundation. The foundation then distributes the contributions so received to the nonresident's favorite charities within and without New York State. The lower income bracket taxpayer has no such flexibility. His charitable contributions are too small to warrant the effort or expense of a foundation. As a result, he loses the tax benefit of his contributions. It seems to me that this situation should be rectified. The public interest in supporting worthwhile charities does not know State boundaries.

Another item of deduction, which is a source of irritation, involves medical expenses. A nonresident is not permitted to deduct, for New York tax purposes, any such expenses incurred either on behalf of himself or his dependents. This can produce an incongruous situation. A Connecticut resident who works in White Plains, and whose only income is from salary, is in a serious auto accident on his way to work. He runs up substantial medical bills but he derives no tax benefit from paying them. If he lived in Bedford, N.Y., just inside the Connecticut line, he would not have such disadvantage. There is unfairness in such a situation. In both cases, New York derives its revenue based upon the individual's capacity to work. In both cases, that capacity is seriously inhibited. Obviously, the unfairness is considerably less where the accident involves not the taxpayer but one of his dependents whose capacity to work and produce income is not involved. Perhaps an appropriate solution would be to limit the medical expense of a nonresident to those expenses incurred by the taxpayer himself. It is difficult to estimate how much revenue loss would be involved in such a procedure. Available statistics indicate that an allowance to nonresidents of the same benefit from the medical expense deduction as is allowed to residents would cost New York State about $1,300,000 annually. Obviously, the loss from allowing only medical expenses of the taxpayer would be somewhat less.

Still another area which has produced complaints is the deduction of real estate taxes and interest. The nonresident is not permitted such deductions while the resident is. Here the unfairness is not so apparent. The New York resident must report and pay tax on income from all sources. The nonresident, on the other hand, is required to report and pay tax to New York only on income earned in New York. Investment income and income earned outside the State is exempt. Thus, the nonresident has tax-free income which can offset these items which are not deductible. Indeed, if these deductions were permitted, a nonresident who owns and rents property located outside New York and derives income from it would reap an affirmative advantage; he would get the tax benefit from deducting the real estate taxes and the interest on the mortgage against his other income without having to pay tax to New York on the rent. It is true that such an analogy provides little comfort to the nonresident wage earner who lives in his house and pays taxes and mortgage interest on it. Statistics as to the amount of revenue involved in such deductions are not readily available. Nevertheless, it would appear that there are sufficient possibilities of loss of revenue from permitting such deductions to require the conclusion that no change should be made in the present law.

Thus far, I have dealt with the more important specific items of deductions which are desired by nonresidents. Actually, there are a large number of other deductions which are also involved, e.g., life insurance premiums, alimony, a variety of taxes, casualty losses, etc. In my judgment, it would be unwieldy to attempt to deal with each such deduction individually. Several suggestions have been made, however, that the whole area of deductions should be dealt with as a package. Among these are the following:

(a) Nonresidents should be entitled to the benefit of all the deductions presently permitted to residents. If this change were made, it is estimated that the loss of revenue to New York would approximate $4,700,000 annually. This is a substantial figure. In view of the fact that nonresidents are required to report only their income earned in New York and that their income from other sources is not taxed, giving them the full benefit of all deductions would produce an unfair advantage.

(b) Nonresidents should be permitted to get the benefit of all deductions on an allocated basis—namely, that proportion of all deductions which their income taxable by New York bears to their total income from all sources. It is estimated that this proposal would produce a revenue loss of $3,500,000 annually. The proposal of an allocation formula has considerable appeal. The theory behind it is that it causes the nontaxable portion of a nonresident's income to bear a proportionate share of the deductions. Certain administrative difficulties are involved which will be discussed later. On the other hand, there appears to be no sound reason why the benefits of an allocation of deductions should be given to nonresidents, while at the same time permitting them to have the full benefit of exemptions on an unallocated basis. If any modification is to be made along the lines of this proposal, it should provide for an allocation of both exemptions and deductions.

(c) Nonresidents should be permitted to deduct the excess of all deductions over nontaxable income. A variation of this proposal is that nonresidents should be given the option on a lifetime basis of reporting under the present provisions applicable to nonresidents or as a resident taxpayer. This would produce a rather complicated procedure which, as far as can be determined, would not produce substantially greater benefits to nonresidents than a system which permitted nonresidents to get the advantage of all exemptions and deductions on an allocated basis. The estimated revenue loss runs from $2 million to $2,500,000 annually.

(d) Perhaps the most appealing and feasible alternative is the proposal to allocate both exemptions and deductions in the proportion that income taxable in New York State bears to total income from all sources. As has already been pointed out, this would cause each type of income to bear its proportionate share of the tax benefits. There are obvious administrative problems in such a proposal. It will be difficult in many cases for the New York authorities to determine how much nontaxable income a nonresident taxpayer really has. Unless such information is readily made available, there will be no way of knowing whether such income has been required to bear its share of exemptions and deductions. On the other hand, New York has the device of withholding to protect itself against dishonest taxpayers. If the withholding is continued on a rate applicable to gross income earned from sources within New York, nonresidents will, in most cases, have to prove their right to a refund in order to get the benefit of any such change in the law. Nor will this be an undue burden on the nonresident. Usually, requiring him to furnish a copy of his Federal income tax return will provide the necessary information. In some situations, such as income from securities of municipalities of other States, which are subject to New York tax in the hands of a resident but exempt from Federal tax, the Federal return will be incomplete. But the number of these instances should be small. The estimated revenue loss from this proposal is $1,500,000 annually.

It should be noted that this proposal will not mean less New York income tax for all nonresidents. In fact, some nonresidents will receive no benefit—for example, a nonresident who is already getting the full benefit of the $500 standard deduction and does not wish to, or has insufficient expenses to itemize his deductions. Indeed, in some cases, the outside income will offset part of the exemptions which the nonresident is now getting in full and produce a higher tax. However, the principal beneficiaries will be those nonresidents whose income is almost entirely from earnings in New York and who will, by this procedure, be placed on a basis of equality with New York residents similarly situated.

ADMINISTRATION

One final word is in order on the subject of administration. One of the major complaints of nonresidents has been the long delay involved in their obtaining refunds of excess withholding of New York income tax. In many cases, due to expenses or the fact that time spent working outside New York was underestimated, nonresidents are entitled to a refund. Information that has come to my attention indicates that 2 to 3 years can elapse before these refunds are made. It would seem to me that it behooves the New York tax authorities so to organize its administrative procedures that the period required in processing refunds is kept to the minimum. If this were done, an important irritant would be removed and the opposition of nonresidents to the New York income tax might be considerably less.

CONCLUSION

The various component elements of the problem seem clear. A tax on the income derived by nonresidents from sources within the State is clearly constitutional. In the particular case of the New York tax, the basic reason for difficulty stems from the fact that neither New Jersey nor Connecticut impose an income tax. If they did and if the rates approximated the New York rates, New Jersey and Connecticut residents would pay no or very little New York tax. If my analysis were to stop here, I would necessarily have to conclude that no change should be made in the present law.

I believe, however, that the problem cannot be approached from a purely logical, historical, and legal point of view. The New Jerseyite whose only income is his $6,000 salary earned in New York is not impressed by arguments about subsidization of systems of taxation. All he knows is that he has to pay a tax to New York and that he doesn't get the same benefits as the fellow who works at the next desk, has the same income, and lives in New York. He has a feeling of injustice which no amount of theorizing can dispel.

We have moved into a period when good working relations and good feeling among residents of the New York metropolitan area are becoming increasingly important. Common problems of transportation, taxation, health, water, etc., are swiftly making an anachronism of State lines. We need to work closely together with our New Jersey and Connecticut residents. We need to do everything within our power to remove irritants in our relationships and conserve our energies for problems of transcedant importance.

It is not for me to say that, in the face of a possible need to raise taxes, New York should forgo $1,500,000 in revenue, even though it is less than 1 percent of the State budget. On the other hand, it may well be that the future benefits to be derived from financial support by New Jersey and Connecticut for projects essential to the proper development of the New York metropolitan area are sufficiently substantial to justify the removal of an important irritant, even though New York will suffer a small loss in revenue.

Assuming that the loss of $1,500,000 in revenue is appropriate, in light of these considerations, I recommend that nonresidents be given the right to allocate both deductions and exemptions in the proportion that taxable income from New York sources bears to total income from all sources. If this is not feasible, I recommend that nonresidents be given the right to deduct charitable contributions both within and without the State and their own medical expenses within the present overall limits applicable to all taxpayers.

Sincerely,

THEODORE TANNENWALD, Jr.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I conclude my remarks upon the following note. I deeply believe that this is a problem which ought to be adjusted among the States. I deeply believe that nonresidents should be treated fairly in terms of deductions, but that they should pay an income tax and thereby bear a part of the cost of government. I believe also that we should not have duplicating taxes, that is, taxes on the same income in different States.

Finally, I believe that a drastic constitutional amendment cutting off the right of a State to tax earned income within the State would lead to an appreciable diminution of State income, which would be unfair and discriminatory against the residents of the individual States which levy the income tax.

I express the hope that by exercise of reasonableness as between the States, even to the extent of State compacts, which could then be reviewed by Congress, the need for any Federal intervention beyond that may not occur.

I point out that if the States themselves are reasonable, the problem will be considered as susceptible of a reasonable solution and will not, therefore, arouse that kind of public emotion which would call for some national remedy which might turn out to be unfair to the particular States concerned or, on the other hand, to the individuals concerned.

THE ROLE OF CONGRESS IN THE FIELD OF FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] has discussed the role of Congress in the field of foreign policy in the current issue of the magazine Frontier. His comments are thoughtful and discerning as he develops his thesis that the Congress has a duty to participate in the formulation of foreign policies. He truly observes that in our democratic society public opinion is eventually the controlling factor in foreign policy. I agree with his statement that Congress can contribute to our foreign policy by mobilizing "American public opinion in support of serious negotiations looking toward a practical solution to the nuclear stalemate and absence of international law and order which today holds all rational minds in the grip of fear."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article written by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS AND THE WORLD CRISIS

(By Hon. JOSEPH S. CLARK, U.S. Senator from Pennsylvania)

WASHINGTON.—To understand the contribution that Congress can and should make to foreign policy in the next 2 years, it is useful to review briefly the relationship in this field between the President and the Congress.

The powers accorded to the President under the Constitution used to be viewed as giving him almost exclusive control over foreign affairs. In recent years, however, quite apart from considerations of personalities or politics, it has been increasingly evident that the President does not have sufficient authority to control foreign policy without regard to the wishes of the legislative branch. Today, American foreign policy, to a very large extent, depends on military and economic aid, technical assistance, and loans, resources control and trade negotiation, immigration regulations, passport control, propaganda, cultural exchange, and the Military Establishment itself. These require enabling legislation and appropriations. The Congress is now as deeply involved in foreign policy as it is in domestic policy.

Although the Congress has great authority in the field of foreign policy, it is obviously not endowed with sufficient authority to conduct foreign affairs by itself. Moreover, as a practical matter, that would be impossible. The need for cooperation between the executive and legislative branches of the Government, then, is obviously required in foreign policy matters; and a condition of mutual confidence is essential to success.

There has been, throughout our history, an ebb and flow of power into and out of Congress in the field of foreign affairs, depending largely on whether the President is strong or weak. During the incumbency of a weak President, the Congress, and particularly the Senate, tends to reach out for more power in foreign policy matters.

The character and reputation of the Secretary of State are also an important factor in the relationship of the President and Congress to foreign policy. In the early days of the Republic, Secretaries of State tended to be politicians. Most of them had held elective office; many of them went on to become President; Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, John Quincy Adams, Van Buren, and Buchanan. Since the Civil War, no Secretary of State has achieved the Presidency. Yet politicians occasionally still fill that office; recent ones were Charles Evans Hughes, Cordell Hull, and James Byrnes, and their ability to get along with Congress is noteworthy.

The ability to work well with Congress, in fact, is essential to the success of a Secretary of State today. When a Secretary of State has lost the confidence of the Congress, and lost the confidence of many of our allies as well, a very serious condition exists. When, as at present, one party controls the Presidency and another the Congress, the need for bipartisan cooperation, for constant consultation, and a Secretary of State who knows how to work with Congress is especially important. A realistic assessment of existing personal and political factors is, therefore, necessary to an understanding of this subject.

It is no secret that, prior to his unfortunate illness, our present Secretary of State had lost the confidence of many of our allies and many of us in Congress, despite our admiration for his personal courage and tenacity. The President has been satisfied to let Secretary Dulles assume most, if not all of the responsibility for the direction of our foreign affairs. It was obvious that the Congress, and particularly the Democratic majority in Congress, was not content with this state of affairs before the Secretary's illness, and the situation has deteriorated since. As a result, Congress is displaying greater initiative in foreign affairs.

In the past year, a number of things has happened which are indicative of the Senate's impatience with the conduct and state of our foreign relations.

Last July the Senate passed a resolution authorizing the Committee on Foreign Relations to make a complete study of foreign policy.

A special study of the U.S. relations with the other American Republics was similarly authorized following the debacle of the Vice President's visit to Latin America last spring.

THE RELUCTANT ADMINISTRATION

A resolution was passed expressing the sense of the Senate that prompt study should be given to the establishment of an International Development Association as an affiliate of the World Bank to make loans to underdeveloped countries at more liberal terms than are now available, and to permit payment in local revenues. This resolution was the brainchild of Senator A. S. MIKE MONRONEY who managed to get a reluctant administration to accept the validity of the idea.

Eight members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee sent the President a letter at the conclusion of the last session of Congress urging him to reexamine the mutual security program with a view to redressing the military and economic imbalance of the present program, putting more emphasis on nonmilitary aid. The response to this letter was the recent appointment by the President of a nine-man panel to study our foreign aid program. It is hoped that the 3 military men and the 4 civilians with past Defense Department experience on this panel will be able to give a fair and equitable assessment of the economic as well as the military aspects of foreign aid. But one may be permitted to doubt it.

More recently, Senators ALBERT GORE, Democrat, of Tennessee, FRANK CHURCH, Democrat, of Idaho, and HUBERT HUMPHREY, Democrat, of Minnesota, have suggested methods of making progress in the field of nuclear weapons testing which the administration had apparently failed to consider seriously, and Senators MANSFIELD, Democrat, of Montana, and DODD, Democrat, of Connecticut, have taken the initiative in suggesting approaches to the Berlin crisis.

Public opinion is eventually the controlling factor in the foreign policy of a democratic society. If, as Vice President NIXON said on more than one occasion during the last election campaign, foreign policy was an issue—and I agree with him that it was—the people of this country are not satisfied with the status quo in our foreign policy either. They want a change, but it is going to be difficult inded to put our policies on a new course with the present leadership of the State Department.

KEY ISOLATIONISTS ARE OUT

Let us consider the effect of last November's election on the role of Congress in foreign affairs. Changes in the composition of the Senate, have in my view, vastly improved that body's potential to contribute to foreign policy. The 86th Congress does not number among its Members Senators Barrett, Bricker, Hoblitzell, Jenner, Knowland, Malone, Martin, Potter, Revercomb, Thye, and Watkins. Eight of these men supported the successful amendment by Senator Knowland to remove the provision included in the mutual security bill, by agreement with the administration, which would have altered the Battle Act so as to authorized the President to permit trade with those Communist satellite countries which show signs of independence from Moscow. Eight of these men opposed Senator KENNEDY's amendment to the mutual security program expressing support for aid to India's 5-year plan. Five of them voted against the 4-year extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act on final passage. Their successors, in almost all instances, favor a more constructive foreign policy.

In the 86th Congress, by reason of the Democratic sweep, there are three additional Democrats and two fewer Republicans on the Foreign Relations Committee.

Let's look briefly at three of the most sensitive international problem areas—Berlin, the Far East and the Middle East—and attempt to assess what contribution Congress has made and can be considered to make to affect our policies toward these areas.

BERLIN

The impending Berlin crisis, which threatens to be as grave as any faced by the Nation since the end of the Korean War, calls to mind Lincoln's words of 100 years ago:

"The dogmas of the quiet past are inadequate for the stormy present. We must think anew, we must act anew, we must disenthrall ourselves."

It has long been clear that the arrangements governing the city of Berlin since the lifting of the blockade in 1948 are unstable and provisional. Western insistence on reunification by free elections and full Soviet compliance with legal obligations has not changed that essential fact.

The position of this Government to stand firm on Berlin and to maintain all access routes is supported today by all responsible Members of Congress, and by our NATO allies. About this there should be no doubt, because the West has not forgotten that, to borrow a phrase of Carl Sandburg, "Wherever there is freedom there are those who must toil, fight, and sacrifice for it."

But standing fast in Berlin must raise the related question of with what? As the President has recently stated, to fight a ground war in Germany is out of the question. We just don't have adequate converted forces. Moreover, we must never forget that our sole purpose in Germany is to get out eventually under conditions which give the forces of freedom the chance to survive and prosper.

MORE FLEXIBILITY IS NOTED

Recent events indicate that the administration is taking a somewhat less frozen attitude toward the coming talks on the German situation. Indeed, prior to the Secretary's hospitalization, it was announced that we are now willing to meet with representatives of East Germany, Poland and Czechoslovakia as well as the Soviets to discuss a wide range of proposals for a German settlement, including the revised Rapacki plan that calls for linking creation of an atom-free zone with a reduction in conventional arms in the two Germanies, Poland and Czechoslovakia.

Any one who recalls the administration's wounded reaction to Mr. Kenman's "disengagement" proposal in December of 1957 will recognize how far Mr. Dulles has moved.

There is no question in my mind that Congress is partially responsible for this new and more receptive attitude. Persistent voices have been heard in the Senate during the last year or more, prodding the administration to take the initiative in advancing long-range solutions for the Berlin problem. Searching questions have been asked about the necessity of giving nuclear arms to the West Germans, the effects on our security of a "controlled thinning out" of big power forces in both Germanies or more extensive forms of disengagement, and the desirability of countering the flood of Soviet proposals with new and realistic proposals of our own, but at the same time taking steps to bolster our defensive strength.

These questions and many more will be repeated in both Chambers of Congress until satisfactory responses are articulated and carried out by the administration. Members of Congress should be ready to support the President when imminent danger threatens, but we would be derelict in our duties if we failed to participate in the formulation of foreign policies which have a vital bearing on our future and follow closely the implementation of those policies by the Executive.

FAR EAST

One does not have to be a prophet to foretell the likelihood of renewed trouble in the Formosa Strait during the incipiency of the Berlin crisis. Well-known Communist strategy virtually dictates such an occurrence. The Chief of Staff of the Nationalist Chinese has stated that the forces on the mainland opposite Quemoy have increased by 50 percent since the siege last fall.

It is painfully clear that the status quo in the offshore islands must give soon and that present conditions are unsatisfactory. In the weird peace on Monday, war on Tuesday situation that has prevailed in the Quemoy since November, it is the Nationalists who must await the Communists' pleasure as to whether the offshore islands receive 400 to 40,000 shells a day, and it is we who are committed by the administration to take action if the Communists decide at any time to continue their offensive long enough to threaten to overwhelm the defenders.

It is difficult to believe that even the hardiest optimist at Mr. Robertson's Far Eastern desk in the State Department genuinely feels that the smaller islands in the Quemoy island group or the much less defensible nine-island group of the Matsu's can be held against intensive long-sustained bombardment.

In my estimation the current Congress is increasingly aware of the essential untenability of our position in regard to the offshore islands and discontent with Mr. Dulles' handling of the matter.

Last September the President said that "If the bilateral talks between Ambassadors (in Warsaw) do not fully succeed, there is still the hope that the United Nations could exert a peaceful influence on the situation." The Warsaw talks remain deadlocked and peace has not come to the Quemoys, but U.N. assistance has never been sought.

It is not inconceivable that Congress might pass a resolution which, while reiterating the determination to defend Formosa and the Pescadores, expressed the sense of the Senate and the House that the offshore islands dispute should be submitted to the United Nations. The Red Chinese have indicated clearly their distate for U.N. intervention, and the Nationalists probably feel the same way. But is it in the U.S. interest that we should continue to support Chiang alone and without active Allied backing in so untenable a position?

Re-examination and possible repeal of the ambiguous language in the Formosa resolution of January 29, 1955, authorizing the President to use Armed Forces for the "securing and protection of such related positions and territories * * * required or appropriate in assuring the defense of Formosa and the Pescadores" is another possible course of legislative action. This cannot be ruled out in view of Mr. Dulles' continued insistence that our actions in regard to the offshore islands have been taken under the authority of the resolution which he has based on the obvious fiction that the Red attack on these islands is part of and preliminary to an attack on Formosa. It is to be remembered that seven Senators, who are now on the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, voted against inclusion of the quoted language at the time the resolution was being debated in 1955.

Our policies of nonrecognition of Red China and opposition to its seating in the United Nations are matters within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Executive, but the days when these policies were considered to be beyond criticism by Congress have ended. "We cannot forever ignore 600 million people on the mainland of China," Senator FULBRIGHT, now chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, stated last August, "but what are we doing to make it possible to deal with them on the best terms possible?" More such questions will be asked.

WHAT MR. DULLES SAID IN 1950

Mr Dulles may even find that the words which he wrote in his book entitled "War or Peace" in 1950 have made some congressional converts:

"I have now come to believe that the United Nations will best serve the cause of peace if its Assembly is representative of what the world actually is, and not merely representative of the parts which we like. Therefore, we ought to be willing that all nations should be members without attempting to appraise closely those which are good and those which are bad. Already that distinction is obliterated by the present membership of the United Nations."

MIDDLE EAST

History's briefest and least eventful military occupation in the Middle East ended last October with withdrawal of our troops from Lebanon and British troops from Jordan, and the basic tensions have only increased.

In Lebanon our summer intervention had the net effect of substituting a pro-Nasser regime for a pro-Western one. Rashib Karami, a rebel when our forces landed in July, is now Prime Minister, and he has publicly stated that he considers Nasser a superman. Camille Chamoun, at whose behest we intervened, has folded his tent * * * and silently stolen away.

In Jordan, plucky King Hussein's life expectancy is briefer than ever, and one wonders whether it is even proper to recall President Eisenhower's proud proclamation in the spring of 1956 that Jordan was vital to American interests. If one assassin's bullet found its target, there would be no Jordan, and neither we nor the British will be there to do anything about it.

As for Iraq, the administration has never quite been able to decide whether Kassem is friend or foe, or whether we should lend a helping hand to the Baghdad regime or its many foes. Consequently during a crucial 9 month period in that country's history, we have had no Iraq policy and offered no alternatives to Communist proffers and blandishments.

Elsewhere in the Middle East, rampant Arab nationalism, as typified by Cairo's leader is still the dominant factor; Arab-Israeli hostility is again resulting in border occurrences; the future of oil companies' concessions is more clouded than ever, and corrupt and unrepresentative regimes still make revolution a likelihood in many states.

Clearly, these complex problems defy solution by any unilateral action on the part of the U.S. Government, much less by congressional action. Long-range U.S. policy in the Middle East will not be on a firm foundation until the Executive succeeds in making a clear statement of Western aims, which is based on correct assessment of the true relation between Communist efforts to promote conflict and the social, political, and economic revolutions under way in the underdeveloped areas. We should give frank recognition to the fact that the oil buyer-seller relationship is as essential to the Arabs as to ourselves.

While the initiative in this area rests primarily with the Executive, action might be considered along the following lines by Congress:

1. Increased appropriations to raise the living standards of the Palestinian Arab refugees beyond the mere subsistence level and to promote their resettlement.

2. Reexamination of our present low immigration quotas for Jews and Palestinian Arabs.

3. Exploration of the feasibility of an arms embargo for the entire area to be enforced by the United Nations.

4. Channeling economic aid to specific projects rather than political regimes.

5. Investigation of the adequacy of our area intelligence which seemed so deficient at the time of both Iraq revolutions.

6. Financial backing to establish a pro-Western Arab radio station in the Middle East to counter the "Voice of the Arabs" from Cairo.

7. Consideration of repeal of the so-called Eisenhower doctrine, a hideous mistake for which Senators, including the author, must bear a share of the responsibility. This policy has embarrassed our friends and totally missed the main nationalistic trend of thought in the area. It is not now subscribed to by any State and has not been invoked at any time, even in the Lebanese affair. It has been a cloud to clear thinking.

In these areas and many others Congress can make a substantial contribution to sanity and sound policy. It cannot push water uphill. It cannot fill the vacuum caused by a failure of Executive leadership and, in particular, it cannot prevent those inevitable further disasters which stare us in the face so long as a preoccupied President continues to rely on advisors whose only answer to any new thought is "No."

I would be less than candid if I did not express my own misgivings about the position of the United States during the next 2 years. Our Federal framework of government has put us in an unfortunate position. We must continue until new Executive leadership is forthcoming, to bump along as best we can, developing and advocating new ideas and new policies, voting legislation and appropriations, probably inadequate in amount, for purposes dimly understood, if at all; hoping againsts hope that disaster will not strike until conditions beyond the immediate control of either the Congress or the people of the United States are remedied.

Meanwhile, we will hope to curtail our brinkmanship abroad while, at the same time, offering a friendly hand to the uncommitted countries in the world and a less belligerent, but nonetheless firm, opposition to the expansionist aims of the Communist bloc.

AND WHAT ABOUT DISARMAMENT?

Finally a word about the two most important objectives of our foreign policy, concerning which so much is said and so little done:

First. Nuclear and conventional disarmament;

Second. A revision of the Charter of the United Nations in an effort to achieve world peace through world law.

We agitate ourselves and the rest of the world over the fate of a rocky little island in the mouth of Amoy Harbor, but how much of our real brain power, and how much of our national heart and soul are we putting into a serious effort to win a workable agreement with the Communists at the Geneva talks on the discontinuance of nuclear weapons and the prevention of surprise attacks? How many hours in the last 12 months have the President, the Secretary of State and his principal advisers put into an earnest search for ways and means of achieving reliable disarmament agreements with communism in related areas? How much attention has the State Department given to the hearings of Senator HUMPHREY's Subcommittee on Disarmament? Is anybody in the State Department or the White House thinking hard on the steps which must be taken in the foreseeable future to revitalize the United Nations and bring about world peace through world law if we are not all to be blown to smithereens?

Or are all these matters considered merely the foolish dreams of impractical idealists?

The present Congress, I hope, will explore all these questions.

The Senate majority leader, LYNDON JOHNSON, of Texas, has called for "bold, new, imaginative programs" in the field of foreign affairs. Such programs are, in my judgment, quite literally essential to survival. I hope they will receive the serious attention they deserve at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue.

The greatest contribution the Congress could make to our foreign policy in the next 2 years would be to mobilize American public opinion in support of serious negotiations looking toward a practical solution to the nuclear stalemate and absence of international law and order which today holds all rational minds in the grip of fear.

SAND DUNES NATIONAL PARK, OREG.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an informative article from the Oregon Daily Journal, of Portland, of April 13, 1959, written by Roy J. Beadle, editor of the Journal's editorial page. Mr. Beadle's article describes a community meeting held at Reedsport, Oreg., on April 12 to discuss my bill for creation of a national seashore recreation area in the Oregon Dunes, under the U.S. National Park Service.

Mr. Beadle is a responsible journalist, so I call particular attention to his comments concerning the favorable impression made upon the audience by representatives of the National Park Service, when they explained and described the purpose and intention of my bill.

I am grateful to the citizens and to the leaders who participated in this meeting, and for the information of my colleagues, who eventually will consider S. 1526, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Beadle's article be printed in the body of the RECORD.

Many residents of the area affected by the park proposal have questioned various aspects of the national seashore project, and public meetings which have been held in Reedsport and Florence, Oreg., have served to answer and clarify these questions. I am grateful that the National Park Service has sent to these meetings outstanding staff experts, so that local citizens would have the best possible source of information about plans and policies. Some of the questions and the answers of National Park Service personnel are reviewed in stories written by Mr. Don Tacheron of the Eugene Register-Guard for April 13, 1959. I ask consent that this able reportage be included in the RECORD with my remarks, along with another story from the Coos Bay World, describing other comments at the meeting.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OPPOSITION DEVELOPS ON PLAN FOR SAND DUNES NATIONAL PARK

(By Roy J. Beadle)

REEDSPORT.—The proposed national seashore recreation area along the Oregon dunes between Florence and Reedsport is not to be crammed down the throats of the local residents, some 150 people from coastal and Willamette Valley points were told at a show me meeting here Sunday afternoon.

Ben H. Thompson, Washington, D.C., Chief of the Recreation Resources Planning section of the National Park Service, headed a group of Park Service officials who sought to answer the questions in the minds of Reedsport people.

Whatever the opposition among those present, it was orderly and polite. It expressed itself principally in the form of applause for George Harrington, resident forester for the Crown-Zellerback Tahkenitch Lake Tree Farm, who opposed the plan partly on the basis that recreational needs can be met on a State and local basis. The proposed national area would remove 3,000 acres from the tree farm, which is a source of employment and of timber products which the local economy needs, Harrington said.

However, the audience also applauded Martha Ann Platt, of Portland, representing the Oregon Audubon Society and the Mazamas, and Virlis Fisher of Portland and Las Vegas, representing the Mazamas and the Sierra Club, both of whom spoke strongly for the plan. Mrs. Platt said the Park Service can "unlock a whole treasure for you here on the coast." Fisher said the proposal, which is now in the form of a bill introduced by Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, can become "the finest centennial present" Oregon could have.

Park Service representatives were applauded when their entire presentation was completed. They will make a similar presentation tonight at Florence, where opposition is stronger than in Reedsport. Florence residents were at the Reedsport meeting but withheld their questions. Private opinion is that most Reedsport people are favorable to the plan but want many more facts.

Written questions were put by Orin Collier, attorney, representing the Reedsport Chamber of Commerce. They had to do with the effect on the local tax base, the impact on industry, the boundary question, the time needed for development of the area, etc.

Thompson said the Government rarely pays money in lieu of taxes, but the experience in nearly all national park developments is that they stimulate allied business activity so that new taxes more than make up tax losses from property removed from local rolls.

The boundaries will be determined only after negotiation with local interests and other agencies involved, Thompson said. The development itself will come slowly, giving time for local adjustment. Money will not be available to buy all the property at once.

Thompson emphasized that extensive hearings will give ample opportunity for local people to express their views. Although the Park Service survey includes Jessie M. Honeyman State Park in the proposed area, Thompson said the final boundaries need not necessarily include the park. This was in response to a question from William Tugman, publisher of the Port Umpqua Courier and chairman of the advisory committee for the State park department. A State park department official earlier told the Journal his department would not necessarily oppose giving up Honeyman Park if it were thought to be in the public interest.

George Collins, west coast chief of recreational resources planning for the Park Service, cautioned the people not to think so much in terms of immediate results but to remember that the dunes area is a rare combination of life and earth sciences which ought to be preserved for all time.

Herbert Mayer, San Francisco, assistant regional director of the Park Service, spoke of the tremendous pressure from recreationists and asked the people to think big.

William E. Walsh, Coos Bay attorney, who presided, read a telegram from Senator NEUBERGER which said this plan would result in national advertising and publicity which would bring more tourists to the finest seashore in the Nation.

DISCUSSION SESSION HELD AT REEDSPORT ON ISSUES STEMMING FROM PARK PROPOSAL

REEDSPORT.—Local economic considerations dominated a discussion meeting here Sunday when a panel of National Park Service officials answered questions about creation of an Oregon Dunes national seashore.

William Walsh, Coos Bay, moderator, said the meeting was organized by the Reedsport and Florence Chambers of Commerce to get an orderly statement of facts about the seashore proposal.

Attending an afternoon session were about 200 persons. Included were representatives of the Oregon press, the State park dept., the U.S. Forest Service, local timber firms, other State and public agencies and private citizens.

Ben H. Thompson, Chief of Recreation Resources Planning, National Park Service, Washington, D.C., answered the bulk of the questions.

Most of the questions were posed by attorney Orin Collier, spokesman for the Reedsport Chamber of Commerce. They were prepared from lists submitted by the Reedsport and Florence Chambers.

Few questions were asked from the floor. There was no debate on the merits of the park proposal itself. Answers made by members of the Park Service panel, which included a number of technicians from the regional office at San Francisco, stressed these points:

A Park Service recommendation for preservation of the Oregon Dunes area is based on preliminary surveys. No definitive studies have been made of the area, therefore, no definitive answers to local problems can be formulated at this time.

Development of an Oregon Dunes national seashore would be a long-range proposition that would not be crammed down the throats of the people most affected.

Seashore creation would not necessarily hamper industrial developments in communities located nearby.

QUESTIONS ANSWERED

The substance of some of the questions raised and the answers of Park Service officials follow:

Question. If property is removed from the tax roles, what tax offset will be provided for the various tax districts involved?

Answer. There is only one park in the national system for which legislation provided payments in lieu of taxes. Whether Congress would authorize this procedure here cannot be determined at thic time.

Question. What would be the effect on long-term bonded indebtedness already incurred by special tax districts?

Answer. The land does not cease to be productive and in the long run no special tax district should suffer.

BUDGET ISSUE

Question. Would the Park Service help make up for any budget deficit caused by tax loss of property valuation?

Answer. The Park Service has no power to do so.

Question. What is the procedure for land?

Answer. The Park Service would negotiate purchase in the same way as any private individual, on the basis of appraisals by local firms. The service policy is to resort to condemnation only where necessary.

Question. What is the formula for the use of property by life tenants?

Answer. Those who desire, would sell their property subject to a lifetime lease. They would pay no rent but the purchase price would be somewhat lower than in cases of outright sales. They would not be able to transfer the lease but they would be allowed to manage and improve the property as they see fit.

Question. What is the criteria for deciding what businesses would remain inside the national seashore?

Answer. There has been no detailed analysis here. However, general policy is that service businesses would not be permitted inside. Service businesses include such things as service stations and overnight accommodations. Boat rental services and beach buggy operations might be allowed to remain.

DUNE CONTROL

Question. Would the grass-planting program on the dunes be continued?

Answer. The dunes-control program would be continued, perhaps accelerated.

Question. Could water from the dunes be tapped for industrial use outside the preserve boundaries? How close to the boundaries could industry locate?

Answer. Access to water would be no problem. The Park Service does not have anything to say about industry outside its areas.

Question. Would existing roads be acquired? Would free access be maintained?

HIGHWAY QUESTION

Answer. The State would continue to maintain its highways while county roads would be taken over by the Federal Government. There is no charge at Cape Hatteras National Seashore.

Question. What about fishing and hunting?

Answer. The Park Service prefers that there be no deer hunting in a narrow corridor such as this would be. Migratory waterfowl hunting would be managed in accordance with State regulations.

Question. How many persons would the Park Service employ?

Answer. Probably a permanent staff of 5 and seasonal staff of 15 over and above park facilities development personnel.

Question. Would local construction firms be used to build park facilities?

Answer. Contracts would be awarded on a bid basis.

OPINIONS CONSIDERED

Question. To what extent do the desires and opinions of local residents affect a decision on boundaries and creation of the seashore area itself?

Answer. Local opinion is not brushed aside. Congress will not push through a bill over objections of Congressmen from the area involved.

Question. What about funds required?

Answer. A small amount, probably about $20,000, would be required to complete the study. Somewhere around $3 million has been estimated for purchase of privately owned land. Development costs would depend upon the type of facilities.

AREA PROCUREMENT

Question. Would the total seashore area be taken over at one time?

Answer. No. Land would be acquired over a long period of time.

Question. Has a study been made of the local economic problems involved in seashore creation?

Answer. Park Service studies are under way and are expected to be completed some time this year.

Question. Would it be necessary to surrender Honeyman State Park?

Answer. It would not be necessary to transfer the park from State jurisdiction.

A similar discussion meeting is scheduled to be held at Florence at 8 p.m. Monday.

PARK SERVICE OFFICIALS GIVE VIEWS ON CREATING OREGON DUNES NATIONAL SEASHORE

(By Don Tacheron)

REEDSPORT.—Inclusion of an upland area around three fresh water lakes is a fundamental requirement of an Oregon Dunes national seashore.

Creation of such a seashore would probably put more into the economies of nearby cities than it would take out, even if lands now privately owned were removed from the tax rolls.

POSITION OUTLINED

These are the views of National Park Service officials who discussed details of the seashore proposal at a meeting here Sunday.

The Park Service position on the reserve boundary question and its economic implications emerged in a series of answers to questions prepared by the Florence and Reedsport Chambers of Commerce.

"A mere strip of beach is not enough," Herbert Maier, a regional director at the Park Service's San Francisco office, told about 200 persons who attended the meeting.

Noting a phenomenal increase in seashore recreational use since World War II, Maier said that upland area is needed for camping and that a strip of land is needed as a buffer area. He did not expand on these points.

Considerable opposition to the Neuberger-Morse seashore proposal centers on inclusion of land east of Highway 101. Florence area residents are especially concerned about the privately owned and highly developed land around Woahink and Siltcoos Lakes.

LAND SAID RARE

George Collins, regional chief of the Park Service's Division of Recreation Resources Planning, San Francisco, said that the land area within suggested reserve boundaries represents a rare combination of land forms.

After the meeting Collins told the Register-Guard that there are at least three technical reasons why the Park Service feels inclusion of the lake areas is fundamental in seashore creation and operation.

Of primary importance, he said, is a combination of land forms making preservation of the area important to earth and life sciences. This combination includes three stages of land development ranging from the formative stage along the beach to the relatively young but stable forms of the upland area just east of the lakes. In turn, each stage of land development supports its own distinctive flora and fauna, Collins said.

Secondly, Collins pointed out that the narrow dunes section alone would not lend itself to use by tourists on a year around basis. Prevailing winds would limit the use of the dunes for picnicking. The dunes would not be a desirable location for overnight facilities. Upland areas east of the highway are required for development into campsites, Collins said.

Thirdly, the land immediately east of the highway would undoubtedly be developed commercially if it were not included, Collins said. Such development would not be desirable along the entire length of the seashore boundaries, he added, pointing up the need for what was termed earlier a buffer area.

Economic implications of seashore creation were discussed by Ben H. Thompson, Chief of Recreation Resources Planning, National Park Service, Washington, D.C.

Creation of parks requires some readjustment of local economy, but lands included do not cease to be productive, Thompson suggested.

Thompson stressed that privately owned lands for park developments elsewhere have been acquired over long periods of time. Thus, he implied, removal of property from the tax rolls would be a gradual process depending upon the rate at which funds are made available.

Meanwhile, increased tourist expenditures in the area, would ultimately produce revenues that would offset tax losses, Thompson explained.

Some of those people who sell their property inside the reserve presumably would stay in the area, Thompson said, and new service businesses would be required outside the reserve boundaries, he added.

SPENDING INCREASES

Citing the Great Smoky Mountains National Park, Thompson said that all service facilities are located outside the park. A 1956 survey indicated that 2½ million people spent $28 million for service during the year.

"That unquestionably produced more in local taxes than was ever produced by the land * * * and the same thing is happening again * * *on Hatteras," Thompson said.

The only national seashore created thus far under administration of the Park Service is at Cape Hatteras, N.C. It was authorized by Congress in 1934 and was created by the Secretary of Interior.

Land does not cease to be productive under park development, Thompson said, adding "the park is not a whole in the economy" of the surrounding region.

PAPER FIRMS OPPOSE PARK

REEDSPORT.—Spokesmen for the International Paper Co., Gardiner branch, and the Crown-Zellerbach Corp. said here Sunday that their firms oppose the current proposal for creation of an Oregon Dune national seashore.

The IPC spokesman said that his firm has not yet found out in detail how the proposed seashore would affect its holdings. However, he added, the firm wants to go on record as objecting to the proposal.

As was reported earlier by the Register-Guard, the Crown-Zellerbach Corp. opposes inclusion of any land east of Highway No. 101. About one-third of the firm's Lake Tahwenitch Tree Farm lies within suggested reserve boundaries, the company spokesman said.

Two members of the Oregon Audubon Society, who said they were speaking as individuals, favored the proposal. They were Martha Anne Platte, of Portland, and Virlis Fischer, of Las Vegas, Nev.

Fischer said that in his opinion, passage of this measure would be the finest centennial present the State of Oregon could receive.

Howard Campbell, of Florence, said the Soil Conservation Service of the Department of Agriculture has already developed a plan for preservation of the Oregon Dunes area. He did not amplify this statement.

REEDSPORT INDUSTRIES OPPOSE NATIONAL COAST PARK PLAN—FORESTRY FIRM OFFICIALS HIT GOVERNMENT RAIDS

(By Dawn Peseau)

REEDSPORT.—Senator RICHARD NEUBERGER's bill calling for establishment of a national park between the Umpqua and Siuslaw Rivers, including the seashore, dunes, and Sea Lion Caves, was opposed by industrial and other interests here at a mass meeting yesterday.

The meeting in the Reedsport High School cafeteria, attended by several hundred, was orderly; but the conflicts of interest over the park proposal were obvious.

The Lower Umpqua and Florence Chambers of Commerce called the meeting. A battery of National Park Service officials addressed the crowd and answered searching questions afterward.

A. J. Myers, general manager of the Long-Bell division at Gardiner of International Paper Co., submitted a prepared statement of objections from his firm.

George Harrington, resident forester from Crown Zellerbach Corp., read a prepared statement of protest. He cited his company's policy of tree farming in part of the affected area and its practice of making its land available to public recreation.

RAIDS CRITICIZED

The company spokesman criticized raids of Government agencies, urged that the State should decide when land is withdrawn from industry and local taxing units.

The Federal officials were asked about the possibilities of industrial use of the dunes when and if they are included in a park. Pacific Power & Light Co. has been experimenting in the dunes for several years for a possible source of industrial water.

"No," replied the Federal spokesmen. "It should be clearly understood that the United States is not in the business of acquiring national park land for industrial uses. There are ample dunes areas outside the proposed park region."

Deskin Bergey, of Pacific Power & Light Co., attended the meeting.

Other questions voiced through the Lower Umpqua Chamber of Commerce probed the potential effects on schools, port, fire, and other taxing districts. The panel was asked if the Government compensates areas for tax losses.

LOSS OFFSET

Ben H. Thompson, of Washington, D.C., National Chairman of the Recreation Resources Board, replied that loss of tax revenue would be more than offset by increased revenue to the community resulting from the park. But in one instance, he said—Grand Teton National Park—payment in lieu of taxes was made over 20 years to local districts.

Regarding bonded indebtedness of local tax bodies, Thompson said the land would not cease to be productive, that it would be acquired gradually to facilitate adjustments, and that of the proposed area 13.7 percent lies in school districts.

"The national park does not become a hole or a void in the local community," declared Thompson. Structures in the area would be taxable, he added.

William E. Walsh, Coos Bay attorney, moderated the meeting. He read a letter from NEUBERGER commending the public for its interest and assuring that no boundaries would be defined or other action taken without full public hearings. His bill sets a limit of 35,000 acres.

On methods of acquisition, the park experts stated that the Government resorts to condemnation only in extreme cases: to clear title, prevent destructive values, or provide necessary public facilities like roads.

PROCEDURE TOLD

The procedure begins with appraisal by three local appraisers. This is followed by efforts to negotiate with the owner at a fair market price. Acquisition subject to life occupancy of the owner is common practice, said the Government.

But acquisition precludes the right of leaving the property to successors, they stated. Also, business established within the boundaries of the park would find it more profitable to move outside, they said. National park policy is buying out private business.

The panelists said they could not estimate when the park, if approved, might be developed since it depends on appropriation of funds by Congress. They estimated the cost at $3 million.

The park officials were asked why the Federal Government supplements other Federal and State and county park promotion. They replied that these other agencies were doing good work, but an area like a seashore region requires a single-unit overall program rather than piecemeal efforts.

Replying to questions, the panel stated:

The Park Service would take over county roads within the park, but the State would retain its roads. Highway 101 would not become a toll road inside the park.

Park policy permits fishing, but hunting is carefully controlled.

Land ownership in the proposed park is divided thus: Federal, 13,115 acres; State, 522; county, 320; private, 14,963; lakes, 4,250; total, 33,170.

The Park Service representatives, in their preliminary address, described the Neuberger bill as part of Mission 66, a national recreation expansion program now in its third year of study. It was prompted partly by depletion of recreation areas on the east coast.

Among Government officials present were Herbert Maier, assistant regional director of the National Park Service; Thompson; George L. Collins, regional chairman of recreational resources and planning from San Francisco; and State agents.

William Morse represented Senator NEUBERGER.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN].

The Chair recognizes the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, in the coming days, much will be said, just as much has been said, relative to the disclosures before the McClellan select committee. Much has been written, much is being written, and much will be written about the atrocities and arrogant abuses of power which have been revealed before this committee during the last 2 years. The revelations, the words—written and spoken—go round and round in a repetitious pattern like drops of water in a whirlpool, slowly at first, but faster and faster as they race toward their vortex, the vortex of final conclusion. This conclusion is summed up on one word: power. All of the abuses which have been disclosed both on the side of labor and the side of management have been caused by the excessive and arrogant and even illegitimate use of power. Dr. Sylvester Petro, professor of law at New York University, is one who has studied the entire transcripts of the McClellan hearings and who has written intelligently and revealingly on this subject in his new book "Power Unlimited—Corruption Unlimited."

I shall be referring to Dr. Petro's words throughout this initial speech of mine on the subject, so let me borrow a shocking statement taken from the pages of the McClellan committee and appearing in his book to illustrate at the outset my point that the root—yes, the disease—is power:

Mr. TURNER (a reporter for the Portland Oregonian and a witness before the McClellan labor committee). I mean the members of the [Western Conference of Teamsters] union are scared to death to get out of line.

Chairman MCCLELLAN. They are afraid to tell the truth and to reveal what they know?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Their fear is what?

Mr. TURNER. That their union cards at least will be taken up and they will be out of employment. * * *

Senator MUNDT. To be deprived of their jobs, and they could not support their families?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator MUNDT. There are other types of retaliation which they fear?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir; that union has a history in our State of physical violence to people who disagreed with them.

This, Mr. President, is an example—just one example among hundreds—of the sheer use of power by union bosses which has produced the shocking revelations of the last 2 years.

As I stated at the outset of this discussion, much has been said and certainly much more will be said on the floor of the Senate relative to this situation, but I doubt that we shall hear many references to the real source of trouble. In fact, if one studies S. 1555 one cannot recognize in its language any apprehension of the source of the evils which S. 1555 purportedly attacks. What we are doing with S. 1555, if we give it serious consideration in its present form, is to recognize the symptoms and refuse to deal with the disease. It is exactly as if a doctor told a patient who was suffering from cancer to go home and not worry about it; it is only a tummy ache. What we are saying to the American people as we proceed to consider this bill, reported by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, is that there is really no sickness in the union movement; there are only symptoms of sickness. It is in this general attitude that I suggest the Kennedy-Ervin bill approaches the subject.

I submit that the bill introduced does not begin to correct the evils to which it is directed. Because the majority of Americans are alarmed by developments in the labor movement and can see the inevitable results if we in Congress fail to meet the problem squarely and solve it, the matter should be thoroughly discussed and debated.

For a moment, let us look at the problem as a whole. What has caused the shocking situations revealed? Why do we have brutality? Coercion? And violence? With every sign that more is to come? I will tell you, Mr. President, in one word. As we examine the history of our present situation, we find time and again the reflection of power: Unrestrained, irresponsible, unrelenting power sanctioned by law. There is an alarming pattern here. A relatively novel one to the history of this country, because it is exactly the same monster from which our forefathers fled.

Because they knew the meaning of power and its inevitable corollary, corruption, the framers of the Constitution had every intention that the Constitution should be directed against the channeling of power into the hands of any single group or privileged few. Those men fresh from the scene of domination and oppression saw the immediate danger of privileged monopoly.

But what is the trend today? The trend is following a pattern certain to produce monopoly and bigness.

There are three areas in which this is taking place: First, there is Government. Government has become so large today that nearly every move we make is met with Federal regulation. Government after government in the history of this world has fallen because of the concentration of power in a centralized government; and, today, we are witnessing this growth in our own Nation's Capital. It can be successfully argued, Mr. President, in my own opinion, that big government spawns both big business and big labor, and that the three together will constitute a constant danger to our freedoms.

The second area of bigness is business. I may say that the usual explanation of the size of today's corporations is that, through a competitive struggle for survival, they have merged, for technological reasons, into massive combines.

But can the immense size be explained alone in this way? Not at all. There are two factors causing it, but the underlying reason for both is governmental policy. Fiscally, it is explained by two leading economists, Louis O. Kelso and Mortimer J. Adler, who state that in the operation of our great corporations today, the wealth produced by capital is divided by reference to considerations of expediency. Some goes to supplement wages; some, to pay the double tax on wealth produced by capital; some, to provide a major portion of new capital formation.

Corporations are subject to an income tax that is levied only upon the wealth produced by capital. The Federal Government and most States levy such taxes on corporations doing business within their respective borders. Under these tax regulations, however, corporations are not merely permitted indefinitely to plough back the wealth produced by their capital. They are constrained to do so by the effect of the steeply graduated personal income tax on the dividends received by their larger stockholders.

Thus, the structure of our tax system promotes bigness in the size of today's corporations.

As the size of the corporations grows, so grows the size of the unions with which management must deal in the determination of wage rates and benefits to be received by employees. As the unions grow, the trend snowballs for industry-wide bargaining, and this is followed by a greater body of Federal regulations proscribing such bargaining between employers and union representatives.

Government regulations on employee relations impose compliance burdens on today's businessman, such that only the largest can afford the staffs of accountants, lawyers and researchers required to keep abreast of procedures imposed upon them by bureaucratic proclamation. Mr. President, if the businessman attempts to follow the normal course of free enterprise, ignoring government channels, criminal sanctions are soon imposed upon him, and his business is terminated. Thus, Government practice in the employee-relations field encourages large corporations to grow larger.

Now for the third area, the one in which we are now intimately concerned. In contrast to business regulation, through a system of sanctions, our Government has created in the trade-union movement the power and privilege to compel union membership and to regiment employees by economic measures which are irresistible. This power today has the most far-reaching effect. Oddly enough, in this age of vast government and the prolification of laws, we have in labor relations little government and less law. We have, instead, what Professor Petro calls a series of special privileges for abusive and destructive trade union conduct.

He states that:

The superstate has enmeshed honest and productive citizens in a debilitating tangle of contradictory rules and regulations while nourishing the lust of the vicious and the unscrupulous and tolerating their abuses with complacency until they now threaten not only the source which produces them, but also the governmental officials who have been feeding them.

Out of the wilderness of conflicting rules and the jungle of special privilege, the looters and destroyers who figure so largely in the McClellan hearings, have emerged with unlimited economic power and fearful political power. They have made the most of an environment cut to their qualifications.

Thus, in labor relations, freedom has become a fugitive trapped, held by a superstate, while giant unions "slug it out." They are "slugging it out" with big business in the most fearful struggle of our century. Even Jimmy Hoffa has recognized this situation; and I quote from an interview with him, as published in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch:

The future of labor-management relations is big labor and big business, for there is no room for the small business or the small union. That is unfortunate, but true. We have reached the saturation point. Now we have to organize what don't belong to us to stay in business. We are in business to make money—not for profit, we are a nonprofit organization, but to expand. We are out for every quarter we can get.

Mr. President, what will come of this struggle is in our hands here in the Congress now. This conflict of raw power, if left unchecked in its present direction, can only result in having government alone emerge as the sole survivor.

America is in danger. Not alone from the material or military threat of our enemies in Russia, but from one that exists within the boundaries of our country, within the hearts and minds of our people, a weakness reflected in the acceptance of the abuses of power, and a weakness further demonstrated by our inability to face up to the real danger. The Soviet threat is one which need not panic us, so long as we avoid abandonment of our fundamental strength—the principle of freedom under law.

The danger lies in the excessive power and special privileges. All big unions, as they wield the club of economic pressures, exploiting to the limit their privileges, have formed industry-wide monopolies fraught with abuses and corruption so rampant that they portend certain destruction of the trade-union movement, with the attendant handmaiden of disaster for our country.

What has brought this about? The answer lies in the failure of government to control power and corruption. Let me give some examples:

In Nebraska, a small trucking concern owned by a man named Tom Coffee, who refused to deliver his truckers to the Teamsters Union when a form contract was thrown at him by Teamsters agents, was put out of business by secondary boycott. In his testimony before the McClellan committee, Mr. Coffee said:

They were going to organize the men from the top down and they didn't have time to fool with the little companies, such as mine, and I suggested then that we ask the NLRB for an election. They said that they weren't interested in an election and I said that I would insist on an election. They informed me that if I would, that they would stall any election that I might insist on until I was bankrupt anyhow.

True to its word, the Teamsters drove Mr. Coffee out of business. By means of a secondary boycott, supplemented by the use of violence and election-delaying tactics, Mr. Coffee's business was closed out. Mr. Coffee won every step of the way through the NLRB and his case was legally affirmed; but as he put it, "I never lost before a Federal court or before the NLRB, but I lost my business."

The committee agreed that the NLRB's dilatory, slow election processes were fundamentally responsible for Mr. Coffee's ruination. We thus called NLRB Chairman Leedom before the committee, to have him try to explain this. His statement was that the Board's election procedures, like all legal procedures, can always be abused by one who has the intention of delaying decisions, and that although irreparable injury may be incurred, due process does not permit the waiving of rules. He stated:

It looks like redtape to a union or employer who feels frustrated by the delays, but what is one man's redtape is sometimes the other man's due process.

Mr. President, it seems shocking that when our equity courts throughout the Nation stand ready with temporary restraining orders designed precisely to guard against the type of disaster Mr. Coffee suggested, the NLRB, which specializes in such matters, has no such relief to offer. Permitting employers direct access to courts would achieve two worthwhile results: It would prevent the ruination and destruction of threatened businesses, and it would tend to speed up the Board's election processes.

The Teamsters are also active in civic affairs. Let me read to you, Mr. President, an Associated Press dispatch taken from my own Phoenix, Ariz., newspaper, the Republic:

UNION RAPS GIRL SCOUTS

SAN FRANCISCO.—A spokesman for the Teamsters' Bakery Drivers Union says $4,000 in union contributions to the United Crusade will be withheld until the Girl Scouts promise not to sell nonunion cookies.

The United Crusade is a combination of areawide public welfare groups. Union Secretary Wendell Phillips said the union learned that several Girl Scout units in the San Francisco Bay area had ordered cookies from nonunion bakeries in the Midwest. "What we want is a promise that the girls will buy local union-baked cookies in the future," he said.

They are charity minded, Mr. President, as long as they can dictate the terms upon which the charity is to operate.

Mr. President, the 5-year-old Kohler strike furnishes a record of mass picketing, nationwide secondary boycotts, and probably more instances of violence than does any other strike in American history. What was the purpose? The purpose was to force unionism on unwilling employees. In short, here is the picture:

Early in 1954, the United Automobile Workers held a strike election upon a company refusal to accept a compulsory union membership contract. At the time, the Kohler Co. had 3,300 employees; but the vote tally shows that only one-third of them participated in the election. The vote was 1,105 to 104, and the Kohler employees decided to strike. Immediately after the strike was called, the United Automobile Workers set up a mass picket line, forming a human barricade of over 2,000 persons, a great many of whom were United Automobile Workers members who came long distances to participate as part of the United Auto Workers "flying squadron." Entrance into the plant was made impossible, although any worker who wished to do so had a legal right to enter. Many did, in fact, attempt to do so, since nearly two-thirds of the Kohler employees had not participated in the strike vote and were not unwilling captives of the union. Even with the intervention of the police, they were kept out. Nonstrikers were harassed, assaulted, and humiliated. Away from the plant, their home lives were made miserable by threatening phone calls, demonstrations, and vandalism. There were over 800 instances involving beatings, paint bombings, thrown acid, tire slashing, dynamited cars, and other violence.

In describing the union action in the Kohler strike, Donald Rand, an out-of-town international representative, had this to say:

It seems to me that it is almost sinful to have any labor dispute degenerate to the point this one has—where we actually have to wreck the company. That's what we're doing, wrecking the company.

Mr. William Bersch, a nonstriker, testified that John Gunaca, an out-of-town member of the UAW flying squadron of goons, assaulted and beat Bersch's father so badly that he was sent to the hospital, where he stayed for 18 days. Seven times after that he was returned to the hospital, and never fully recovered his health to the day of his death a year later. Mr. Gunaca fled to Michigan, where until recently he avoided extradition and prosecution for his vicious attack.

In another outrageous incident, Mr. Willard Van Ouwerkerk was accosted one night in a tavern during the strike and viciously assaulted, after he had indicated that he did not wish to join the union. Mr. Van Ouwerkerk stands 5 feet 6 inches and weighs 125 pounds. His antagonist, William Vinson, was 27 when he assaulted Van Ouwerkerk, weighed 230 pounds, and was 6 feet 3½ inches tall. Van Ouwerkerk had been hit from behind in the back of the head, knocked down, and kicked. The results were three or four broken ribs and a punctured lung, from which he contracted pneumonia. William Vinson was arrested, tried, and convicted. Subsequently, Mr. Emil Mazey, UAW international secretary-treasurer, made a speech at a union meeting, later broadcast to the Sheboygan radio audience, in which he stated that the judge in the case, Judge Schlicting, was unqualified to serve on the bench in that community. The provocation for this and other attacks upon Judge Schlicting was a comparatively mild 1-to-2-year sentence the judge had imposed upon Vinson for his assault, in spite of the fact that the maximum sentence possible in such a case was 3 years. Vinson actually served only 13 months. In defiance of the court order, Mazey issued a vicious attack upon the integrity of Judge Schlicting, and imposed a UAW boycott upon the grocery store in which the judge's family had an interest. Unable to withhold comment any longer, several Catholic clergymen in Sheboygan issued a statement in which they pointed out that the attorneys for the convicted man had openly complimented the judge for his fairness during the trial and went on to say:

> The State supreme court denied the convicted man a stay of execution of the sentence. In the face of all these facts, the secretary-treasurer of the UAW–CIO, Emil Mazey, closing his eyes to the fact that the injured man was in danger of dying, accused the judge of bias against organized labor.
> He even presumed to question whether the judge is qualified to serve as a judge in this community. He has attacked the integrity of a major court of this country and deserves to be called decisively to task for this insolence.
> Lawlessness is the result in any society or community when law and order are disregarded and flouted. It is the beginning of anarchy. Is the secretary-treasurer advocating either one?

Mazey promptly issued a statement in which he declared that these clergymen were not men of integrity themselves. Mr. Mazey, in a later statement before the McClellan committee reiterated his accusation that the clergymen of Sheboygan were not men of integrity. This would indicate that Mr. Mazey now not only is above the law, but he and his union have no respect for the church and the clergy either.

This strike has now gone on over 5 years. It has cost the United Automobile Workers over $13 million. It is the admitted attempt of a gigantic union to break a company, regardless of what it costs in money, men, production, and American honor and prestige. While this has no direct bearing on the subject being discussed, I could not help wondering, when the unemployed march on Washington occurred last week, how much good this 13-plus million dollars would have done those unemployed people had it been applied there, instead of in an attempt to destroy a company and jobs.

The upshot of the violence and intimidation at the Kohler Co. was a complete breakdown of law and order.

Similar occurrences occurred at the Perfect Circle strike in 1955. Between July and October of that year more than 200 instances of violence occurred in the area of struck Perfect Circle plants in Indiana. The climax came on October 5, when a mob, only part of which were strikers, invaded the New Castle plant. The scene was described to the McClellan committee as follows:

Early in the morning, unusual activity was observed to the south and to the west of the plant. As time went on traffic in the area increased out of all proportion to normal conditions, and by 9:30 a.m. the streets were congested for blocks by parked and slowly moving vehicles. Women employees were sent to the cafeteria in the basement of the building. The men gathered in groups and silently watched the activity on the outside. Every person in the plant was extremely apprehensive and in fear of what was to come. As guns were fired as a signal, two groups of the mob, each numbering hundreds, converged on the plant, charged forward, crashing through the gate. While 40 or 50 men started toward the entrances, a mob of 2,000 was gathered outside. A car parked outside the plant area was overturned, just as an employee stepped out on a platform in the northeast corner of the building and fired a 20-gage shotgun, low and in front of the men who were overturning the car, and continued to fire in front of the people who were approaching the plant entrances. At this point firing from the outside began. A woman standing in the window of the shipping room was shot in the upper left leg, the bullet lodging in the bone just below the hip joint. At about the same time one of the supervisors from the Hagerstown plant, standing in the payroll office, was hit in the abdomen by a bullet from the outside that came through the window. While shotgun blasts and rifle fire continued, the demonstrators barraged the plant with stones and other objects for an hour and a half. Nearly all the windows in the office buildings were broken and many cars inside the fence were damaged. A house across the street was demolished.

The mob included a great many people who were not strikers and who were not even New Castle residents. Many were UAW members from more than 20 miles away. The UAW disclaimed all responsibility in connection with these outsiders, as well as any responsibility for the violence. Confronted with this intolerable situation, officials of the UAW said that the union would be willing to go back to peaceful picketing if the management and city and State police would cooperate and stop protecting nonunion workers. They refused to agree to assist in stopping the violence, but said that if management only was allowed to enter the plant the union would agree to peaceful picketing with but five men on the line. This, of course, would mean the closing of the plant. When the Lieutenant Governor stated that declaring martial law would not involve closing the plant, one representative then warned that if the plant operated there could be more violence of the same kind that occurred earlier in the day. Further, he stated that plants at Hagerstown and Richmond could become targets of the same sort of violent demonstration, but disavowed any UAW desire for such violence.

In the Kohler and Perfect Circle strikes and similar cases, there seemed to be a surprising lack of law enforcement and a reluctance on the part of law-enforcement officials to prosecute those responsible for the violence. Often our commitee traced this to the fact that witnesses are often reluctant to testify before courts and juries against the union for fear of reprisal, and that convicting evidence may be nearly impossible to obtain. We on the McClellan committee have noted this to be true in many instances when witnesses willingly gave information in private sessions with investigators, but when called before the commitee took the fifth amendment and refused to give evidence involving unions or union officials.

Another abuse of power is that of forcing employers to organize employees for the union in what is known as organization from the top. A recalcitrant employer can be forced to sign his employees into the organizing union regardless of whether or not they wish to be represented by the union. The stranger picket line is used to bring this result about.

Donald Skaff demonstrated to the McClellan committee how stranger picketing works. The Skaff Co., employing 45 workers, was approached by Teamsters Local Union No. 332 in Flint, Mich. The union presented a collective agreement for the company's signature. In Mr. Skaff's words:

> The overriding theme in the entire incident is that we were prepared to have a vote of the employees involved from the very first day that we were approached by the Teamsters. They were unwilling to have a vote. They wanted to organize from the top and have us sign and not have a vote of the employees.

The union, however, resisted an election because it was evident the Skaff employees did not wish it to represent them. Mr. Skaff was faced with a dilemma. The National Labor Relations Board would not take the case and order an election: The business was too small. On the other hand, the Michigan State Mediation Board could be of assistance in ordering an election only if the union agreed to it. Finally, Mr. Skaff said:

> The Mediation Board recommended that we join the union, since it was simply a case of who was the strongest.

Mr. Skaff decided to fight, and continued to fight even after the union set up its stranger picket line and beset him and his company with violence. He was ultimately forced to give in, however, so strong was the union's power. Three months after Mr. Skaff had refused to sign the coercive agreement he agreed that they were too small, signed the recognition papers, and allowed the company to be organized from the top.

Mr. President, this goes on and on and on. Thousands and thousands of unwilling American employees are signed into union membership against their desires by this tactic of an organization from the top. I suggest that in S. 1555 there is no remedy for this shocking condition.

One case follows another, and the experience of James J. Sporney, manager of the equipment division of Quaker City Motors Parts Co., Philadelphia, is typical. He testified that Bernard J. Marcas, organizing director for the Teamsters Joint Council 1953, had told him that if they did not sign up—

> You will get nothing in. We will close you up first, if you don't sign up. We don't want a vote, we want a contract. I control Philadelphia. The union controls the country.

In another power play, the unions have moved into politics. What this portends for the Nation, if allowed to continue, can easily be seen from the following statement made by James L.

McDevitt, codirector of the Committee on Political Education at a regional meeting of local union officials of New England in Hartford, Conn., on July 19, 1956:

> We are driving to see that every so-called labor leader speaks for what is best for the movement and not what is best for him. We are going to get the labor leaders who differ publicly with the position on candidates and issues already established by the labor movement. Such differings (hurt) the cause. These so-called labor leaders that differ with the movement will be uncovered. We plan to, and we will, publicly and among the rank-and-file, brand them as traitors. That's what they are—traitors—and that's what they will be called—traitors.
> We are warning you now, and we are warning all in the future: Do not differ with the movement with respect to issues or candidates. We will not stand for it.

Believe me, Mr. President, this is no idle threat. The means may differ, but they always follow through. Here is an example:

Having been defeated in their election attempts in Arizona last fall, on April 5, the Committee on Political Education held a convention in my State and came up with some interesting plans. They have concluded that our newspapers are biased and prejudiced in their news coverage.

Mr. President, they came to that conclusion because our local newspapers uncovered the fact that the COPE organizer in the southwestern section of the United States had a very interesting jail record. He worked throughout the southwestern area of the United States. When our local newspapers disclosed the fact of the jail record, the Committee on Political Organization decided the newspapers were biased and prejudiced for merely printing the fact that their organizer had spent some time in jail.

Last week, with the Committee on Political Education-supported candidate who ran last fall against our new Republican Governor acting as attorney, corporation papers were quietly filed for a $10.5 million newspaper enterprise. Big plans are underway in Arizona, with compulsory dues money as the propellant.

They approach us in Congress with similar big plans in the form of demands. Just recently AFL–CIO President Meany told us what kind of a labor bill we could pass in a statement before the Building Trades Council. Mr. Meany said that much as labor welcomes a cleanup of corruption, unless the provisions of title VI of the Kennedy-Ervin bill containing the so-called sweeteners were allowed to remain in, this bill would become unpalatable to labor and every effort would be made to assure its defeat.

Mr. President, there is nothing in title VI of the Kennedy-Ervin bill which by the remotest stretch of the imagination relates to anything that has been revealed by the McClellan committee. If Mr. Meany is honest and sincere in his statement about wanting to clean up corruption, he cannot be against the Kennedy bill, against the administration bill, or against the McClellan bill. If he is honest, as I feel he is, I think he will retract that threat to the Congress of the United States.

Such threats to a Congress which is disposed not to incur the displeasure of big labor would carry great weight. I ask my colleagues to ponder for just one moment what the hue and cry would be if either the chamber of commerce or the National Association of Manufacturers attempted to tell the Congress of the United States in such an arrogant fashion what it would stand for or not stand for in the way of legislation.

The Taft-Hartley Act prohibits political activity at the Federal level on the part of unions and corporations alike; yet labor organizations are openly engaged in politics at all levels under the guise of education. Operating under the name of COPE—Committee on Political Education—they move into campaigns, name candidates, dictate platforms, provide political manpower, radio and TV and printed advertising, and trained political directors. In short, they are more concerned today with political activity than they are with the bargaining table. When one considers that the income of labor organizations approaches $700 million this year one can begin to understand the power potential of this group in the area of politics. The power to control the Congress and State houses and legislative bodies—the power to destroy our political philosophies.

Who is responsible for the abuses which the McClellan committee has revealed? It is my firm belief that the responsibility lies in all three branches of our Government, and in their separate ways all three have been equally culpable. The source of the abuses lies in the special privileges which trade unions enjoy and which were granted starting in the early 1930's and which have continued through today.

First, Congress took away the right of every man who is endangered by unlawful conduct to immediate relief in the courts when irreparable injury is threatened. Congress has taken this right away from employers and employees and even the most unlawful conduct, when such conduct involves a union, cannot be enjoined. The Congress has also insured the weakening of employer resistance to even the most corrupt of trade union demands. Congress has denied access to the courts for immediate injunctive relief in two ways. First, for all practical purposes the Norris-La Guardia Act prohibits Federal courts from enjoining any activity in any labor case except violence amounting to civil insurrection. Thus, no employer can go into Federal court and get an immediate injunction against the most damaging picketing or secondary boycott even if it violates the Taft-Hartley Act. He cannot secure injunctive relief against violent union action unless he can prove that the local authorities are unwilling or unable to control the violence. The only injunctive relief available, thus, is usually obtainable only after the damage is done. This usually allows a business to be destroyed before relief is afforded. In the second instance, the Taft-Hartley Act enforcement is assigned exclusively to the National Labor Relations Board. If the National Labor Relations Board and its general counsel refuse to prosecute the case, the employer is simply out of luck. He must take it on the chin. In practice it has been the small employers who have suffered because seldom has National Labor Relations Board action come quickly enough to them to avoid irreparable injury. The Taft-Hartley Act itself has been responsible for some of the abridgements of employee freedom, in spite of the fundamental principle of the Taft-Hartley Act being that of free employee choice. Employees are expressly declared to have the right to join or not to join unions, free of economic or physical coercion by either employers or unions, but Congress explicity permitted unions to impose union-shop contracts upon employers and employees in States where such contracts are not prohibited. Unfortunately, this last act, coupled with the dilatory processes of the National Labor Relations Board and the Supreme Court's preemption doctrine, have blotted out the good intentions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Thus, in brief, Congress set the stage and rang up the curtain, and handed the executive department its weapons of destruction. Through a series of strained interpretations, the NLRB has sufficiently emasculated the Taft-Hartley Act so that unions today have the very powers of compulsion which Congress had hoped to eliminate by the passage of the act. Here is one good example. In the New York Waldorf-Astoria barber case, the Waldorf-Astoria barbers were compelled to join a union to which they were opposed because the pressure exerted against the management and the immediate employer, the Terminal Barber Shops, was too great. The Teamsters stopped all deliveries, and garbage collections ceased. The hotel management refused to allow the hotel to be shut down merely because of a dispute in the barber's union and informed the barbers that they would have to join. At the hearings it was shown that the NLRB was without any power to afford relief to either the Waldorf Hotel or the small barbers' union, since this was one of the difficult common situs cases.

Professor Petro has offered a workable explanation of how relief might be obtained were we not saddled with the vagaries of NLRB rulings. He states that the difficulty exists only in the minds of the NLRB and its staff, and that the case is not a difficult one at all. The journeymen barbers' picketing was unlawful as addressed to the Waldorf barbers, and it was doubly unlawful inasmuch as it harmed the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel itself, a secondary employer. Furthermore, the Teamsters' refusal to cross the picket line to deliver supplies and pick up garbage, a refusal directed by Teamster officials, was an independent violation of the act. It amounted to inducement of work stoppage by a union in an attempt to make one employer, the trucking company employing the Teamsters, cease dealing with another, the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. Professor Petro states that it could be demonstrated that a number of other Taft-Hartley violations occurred in the journeyman barbers' picketing, the accompanying boycott, and the ultimate result. In this instance the violations were ignored, however, and the Board which had been set up to enforce the law with respect to these very types of violations would do nothing about them.

In the third act of this three-ring circus we see the Supreme Court carefully insuring that the constitutional rights taken away by the other branches are laid forever to rest beneath a headstone of a judicial case law. They began by broadening the base upon which the Federal Government could act. Every type of business and every conceivable type of activity became such that it affected interstate commerce. When it came to labor relations, the Court merely expanded this broad doctrine, pronouncing that the States should have no part in deciding the fate of labor cases within their borders.

Once having declared unions and their activities as affecting interstate commerce, they promptly released unions from the restraint of the antitrust law. It gave them the free use of a powerful tool, picketing, under the constitutional free-speech doctrine.

Next, it denied employers and nonunion employees access to State courts by means of the Garner—Garner v. Teamsters Union (346 U.S. 485 (1953))—and Guss—Guss v. Utah Labor Relations Board (353 U.S. 1 (1957))—cases conferring exclusive jurisdiction on the Federal board and courts by means of the preemption doctrine.

In this tripartite fashion the trade union movement has been encouraged to amass power, to abuse its privileges, and to dominate the American scene. No wonder we find abuse. Power is abuse. Congress has a job to do. When we Senators assume our positions, we place our hand on the Bible and solemnly swear to uphold and protect the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic. This oath is not taken capriciously; it is not taken lightly; it is a solemn oath that thousands of people have taken upon entering Congress to protect the basic concepts of their Republic. It is an oath which binds them to the job of seeing to it that the freedoms enunciated by the Bill of Rights and insured by the Constitution will remain forever inviolate. The job of Congress is to defend, preserve and protect our people, not to cower before self-interest. The alternative if we delay longer is degradation and failure. But in spite of this imperative mandate, let us look at what Congress is actually doing. The Senate has just had reported to it in a new version, S. 1555, a slightly amended version of the old Kennedy-Ervin bill. Therefore, I have said before on the floor of this Senate, and I have said in innumerable meetings around the United States, that the Kennedy-Ervin bill does not face up to the fundamental problem, which is a problem of power. If I were to be kind to the proponents of this bill, I would recognize that it has the procedures of a fairly good reporting bill, but I suggest at the same time that reporting will not cure the evils produced by the blatant misuse of power by union leaders as has been disclosed before the McClellan committee. The Kennedy bill naively assumes that by reporting alone, the Secretary of Labor can detect the tyrants in labor and can then subdue them. It assumes that by mere words it can guarantee democratic processes to the union members without giving the union members at the same time any recourse to decisive action should those rights be ignored. It says, in effect by omission, that while clergymen, or the president or vice president of a chamber of commerce, or similar officers of the Red Cross or the YMCA and the YWCA are charged with fiduciary responsibilities, the union leader remains a sancrosanct person above these responsibilities. The McClellan committee in its interim report of last year specifically requested legislation to take care of the no man's land, fiduciary responsibility, and democratic processes. Yet, the Kennedy bill ignores two of those recommendations even though its author signed a report which made those recommendations. The second interim report of the McClellan committee has not yet been published but it is inconceivable to me that this can be released without specific recommendations that secondary boycotts and blackmail picketing be banned. Yet, the Kennedy bill completely avoids these two areas, both of which would be very objectionable to the union bosses.

What we in Congress must awaken to is the fact that freedom is the target of concentrated power. There is no question that trade unions have been scoring bull's-eyes for 30 years and taking away freedom which belongs to all of us and our children. How much more is there available for sacrificial offering? I submit that it may be too late. There is no question, however, that if we have any hope of retaining what little is left, we must deny the special privileges which allow the violence and monopolistic compulsion against union members.

We have reached a point again in our history where we once stood, when the question was asked of men, "Where do you stand, sir?" Do we want a republic whose constitution recognizes that freedom is ours because we are individuals and that freedom comes from God? Do we want a government unfettered by power? Do we want an economic system unfettered by abusive power? Do we want a labor movement with special privileges denied to the rest of our society, the use of which has produced the raw power disclosed before the McClellan committee? The answer, I say to my colleagues, rests in the question, "Where do you stand, sir?" If we remain true to our oath of office, if we believe in the proclamations of freedom and liberty which we make from rostrums across the land, if we believe that power invested in any segment of our population is bad, then I suggest to my colleagues who hear my voice or who read my words that we can demonstrate this by recognizing that in the approach to labor reform, suggested by the Kennedy bill, we find weakness in that it does not approach the disease but only the symptoms. We can recognize that by adding amendments to be proposed by the administration and by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN], who probably understands this field better than any of our colleagues, so that this bill can become a stronger bill, a bill which will bring a better sense of security to our American workers, be they members of unions or not, to the American public, and to management.

Many persons, including some of my colleagues, are fearful of the statement "a stronger labor bill." They do not like the expression. I wish to say that in my 7 years as a member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare I have never seen one amendment suggested by a Member of the Senate which in any way could hurt an honest labor union. The expression "stronger labor bill" has been given a bad connotation, in effect, by the bosses of labor, who do not wish their present status quo disturbed at all. In addition to that, let me say that nothing which has been suggested in the administration bill, in the McClellan bill, in the Curtis bill, in the Mundt bill, or in the Kennedy bill could in any way be construed by responsible people as being harmful to the labor movement.

Mr. President, if we fail at this crucial point in our history to measure up to our responsibilities as U.S. Senators, then history will judge us for what history will surely record us, as men who were timid when strength and courage were needed.

If, on the other hand, we want our freedom, we must work and sacrifice for it. There can be no compromise. Our Constitution is quite clear, and we either stick by our basic principles or we do not have them. There can be no compromise with those who would destroy us, because time is on their side. There can be no compromise with courage, the courage to stand for principle with strength.

Mr. President, I have a short statement which I intended to make during the morning hour and which, with the permission of the Chair, I should like to make at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona has the floor.

CONTROLLING CORRUPTION IN THE UNIONS

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, a recent study was conducted by McFadden Publications, Inc., which was published in a printed periodical called "The Wage Earner Forum."

The study, which was completed April 6 and which I have just received, contains the results of interrogation of some 3,000 individuals in occupations which include skilled labor, semiskilled labor, unskilled labor and similar types of workers. The questions asked were directed to the problem, "What the workers want from Congress." The answers elicited in response to questions on labor legislation indicate an overwhelming desire on the part of both union members and nonunion working people for legislation which will protect them from the type of abuses disclosed by the McClellan committee. Interestingly enough, a great many of these people recognize compulsory unionism as the course of these evils, and hence favor the enactment of right-to-work laws.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this study be inserted in the body of the RECORD following these remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONTROLLING CORRUPTION IN THE UNIONS

American wage earners overwhelmingly favor legislation which will control union corruption.

Question. Do you think Congress should pass laws to control corruption and crooked dealings in the unions?

[In percent]

	All wage earners	Union members	Nonunion
Should	94	93	95
Should not	4	5	3
No opinion	2	2	2
Total	100	100	100

Reasons why workers favor this sort of legislation revolve around the fact that unions need outside help if they are going to clean house and that corruption, communism, and undemocratic ideals do exist in unions and must be weeded out.

"Our unions have too many communistic ideas and rulings." (Union metalworker, Ohio.)

"In unions such as Teamsters, the rank and file need Government help and protection in order to clean house. 'Let George do it,' has brought about the present situation." (Electrical worker, Indiana.)

"It would protect the members' invest- their demands." (Union member, Pennsylvania.)

"I think the undemocratic unions should have guidance." (Member, Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers, Utah.)

"It would protect the members' investments in their trade unions and avoid all the ill feeling toward labor unions." (Member, I.A.M., Colorado.)

REVEALING UNION FINANCIAL RECORDS

A large majority of workers, regardless of union affiliation, feel that the union books should be available for Government inspection. A smaller majority believe that the union financial records should be open even for public inspection.

Question. Do you think unions should be forced to make their financial information available for Government inspection?—for public inspection?

[In percent]

	All wage earners	Union members	Nonunion
For Government inspection:

No	4	5	2
No opinion	7	7	8
For public inspection:
Yes	70	66	75
No	15	18	11
No Opinion	15	16	14

Those who favor opening the financial records to everyone feel that such action would stop corruption in the handling of funds which are, after all, public funds.

"Because they are handling public money." (Nonunion worker, Wisconsin.)

"It would help stop racketeering and make 'em be more honest." (Nonunion worker, Utah.)

"We have a right to know where our money goes—I think." (Auto Mechanic, Alabama.)

"It would help stop corruption." (Nonunion laborer, Indiana.)

Others who favor Government inspection of the records but not public inspection, point out that unions are entitled to as much privacy as businesses.

"It seems a union should have the same protection as business." (Union painter, Illinois.)

"An inspection should be allowed only if there is suspicion of unlawfulness; otherwise it is as private as any business." (Plumber's union member, Georgia.)

RIGHT-TO-WORK LAWS

Only a little more than a third of all wage earners feel that right-to-work laws help the working man while more than two in five think that these laws hurt him. There is a sharp difference in union and nonunion workers' opinions on this subject. More than half of the union workers do not favor right-to-work laws, while more than half of the nonunion workers do favor these laws.

It is interesting that while only 38 percent of all wage earners favor right-to-work laws, 55 percent favor the idea behind these laws—that a company should be permitted to employ a man even though he does not join a union.

Question. Do you think right-to-work laws help or hurt the working man?

[In percent]

	All wage earners	Union members	Nonunion	East	Midwest	South	Far West
Help	38	26	57	46	35	47	24

Total	100	100	100	100	100	100	100

Those who favor right-to-work laws express opinions similar to these:

"Any man should have the right to work at any job if qualified." (Member Teamsters Union, Illinois.)

"It gives a nonunion worker a chance to jobs that are now closed to him." (Nonunion worker, South Carolina.)

Those who feel right-to-work laws hurt the workingman are more inclined to repeat statements made by union leaders.

"Right to work conditions existed before labor was organized. Sweatshops and poor pay are a few of the things that these laws will bring back." (Plumbers and Steamfitters Union member, Indiana.)

"Because it would kill the unions in a short time." (Carpenter Union member, California.)

The paradoxical position of the wage earner is dramatized by the fact that almost 3 in 10 of the workers who say that right-to-work laws will hurt the workingman also say that companies should be permitted to employ nonunion workers.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. James V. Constantine, Solicitor of the National Labor Relations Board, be permitted to sit on the floor of the Senate during the debate on the labor bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have no objection. It is customary procedure for Members to desire to have technical assistants available, and I assume that that is what the Senator has in mind.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yesterday, I understand, unanimous consent was granted to permit Professor Cox of Harvard University to assist the Democrat side. I merely wished to have the help of Mr. Constantine, who has sat through all the committee hearings and who is an expert in the field under discussion. He can aid Members on both sides of the aisle who desire to consult him.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator is quite within his rights. I heartily concur in his request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NOMINATION OF CLARE BOOTHE LUCE TO BE AMBASSADOR TO BRAZIL

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I understand that in the morning hour, while I was off the floor and unnotified of their intentions to pay their respects to me, the minority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] rose to the defense of a fair lady who has been nominated for the position of Ambassador to Brazil.

Apparently they seem to think that we should have a policy of exempting from cross-examination such a fair lady when called before the Foreign Relations Committee. Let me make clear that my cross-examination of her sought to lay a foundation for an evaluation of her diplomatic judgment. At the hearing on the nomination of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce, I did a little cross-examining which I thought pointed out very clearly her lack of diplomacy and her exceptionally poor judgment. It is my view that if one is to fill a post so vital to the welfare of the Nation as that of Ambassador to Brazil she should possess better qualifications for diplomacy than Mrs. Luce demonstrated in her answer to my questions.

Apparently these two distinguished Republican colleagues of mine, Mr. GOLDWATER and Mr. DIRKSEN, do not believe that speeches which one makes are subject to review when the issue before a committee is whether the nominee has the judgment which one should have in order to fill a diplomatic post. Apparently—to judge from the remarks which have been made on the floor today by Mr. GOLDWATER and Mr. DIRKSEN and I have scanned them—they seem to think that if, in a political campaign, one makes an untruthful statement, it should be excused and no one should comment on it subsequently. They seem to think that if one should ask for documentation in support of statements such as those Mrs. Luce made in the past about President Roosevelt and Truman and Acheson that he is taking advantage of such a fair lady. To the contrary I think we were very fair to give her an opportunity to offer proof if she could in support of her shocking charges.

So when the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the chairman of the committee, and I quoted to Mrs. Luce past statements of hers, and asked her whether she wished to stand by them, not only did we feel that we were raising matters quite relevant to the issue of the kind of judgment she possesses, but we also performed a service to her, by giving her an opportunity—if she wished to take advantage of it—to document her charges. And when I quoted to her her past statement that President Roosevelt was the only American President who ever "lied us into war," and when I asked her for a documentation of that charge, we were raising a point which, in my judgment, pertained to her judgment and to her qualifications of judgment to fill a post such as the Ambassadorship to Brazil.

Let me say to my good friends, the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Arizona, that I stand on that examination; and I am satisfied, so far as my vote is concerned; that Mrs. Luce's responses to that examination disqualify her for the post to which she has been nominated. The record shows I told her so; and I told her that I considered her statements—in the absence of any proof—to be subversive. I repeat the charge on the floor of the Senate today. With such a record of false statements on her part I consider her unqualified for any diplomatic post. She would not be the Ambassador to Brazil of just partisan Republicans may I point out to Mr. GOLDWATER and to Mr. DIRKSEN, she would be the Ambassador of all Americans.

Mr. President, I think that when one who was a Member of Congress which she was at the time—has made a statement that a President of our country "lied us into war," and then did not come forward on yesterday with any documentation in support of her statement, the comments I made in regard to her are more than justified.

Then I cited some other statements she made, involving President Truman and Dean Acheson, which in my judgment show a lack of diplomacy and good judgment on her part.

I am not little amused because my friends, the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Arizona, seem to think that because I have made statements critical of Presidents, statements which I have always backed up with documentation, therefore I should exempt Mrs. Luce from being held responsible for her statements.

I am always willing to assume responsibility for my statements; but, of course, I have never offered myself as a diplomat. I am not a candidate for any diplomatic post. Mrs. Luce is. And, of course, there is also the great difference that when I "take them on," I am ready to offer my proof.

My good friend, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], seems to think that there is no criticism among responsible people of Mrs. Luce's record as Ambassador to Italy. To the contrary, there is much criticism of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce's record as Ambassador to Italy. I brought out that criticism on yesterday, in long cross-examination; and I stand on it. I am satisfied that the record is perfectly clear that she misused the post of Ambassador of the United States to Italy, by intervening in the Italian elections. I do not think there is any doubt about it, and I brought that out in my questioning of her. I sought to find out whether that was going to be her course of action in Brazil, because she is being asked to serve as Ambassador to a nation where the memory of Franklin Roosevelt, the architect of the good neighbor policy, is revered. The good neighbor policy has deteriorated under this administration; but it is a policy which created great and needed good will between the United States and Latin America.

Mr. President, I wish to say—to use a colloquialism—that I believe it is a diplomatic "boner" on the part of the President to send to Brazil, as our Ambassador, a woman who has said that Franklin Roosevelt "lied" the United States into a war, even though she may be the wife of Henry Luce. I think it is a great mistake.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. MORSE. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. KEATING. The qualifications of Mrs. Luce as prospective Ambassador can be judged, it seems to me, in large part by the service she rendered in the ambassadorial post she held, a respect in which she does differ from the senior Senator from Oregon, who is not now a diplomat, and never has been a diplomat—and I use the official designation.

Mr. MORSE. Or never will pretend to be.

Mr. KEATING. Does not the Senator from Oregon feel that whether or not she in any way had any hand in Italian elections, the result of the Italian elections benefited the free world?

Mr. MORSE. I wish to say to the Senator from New York that for a period of time, as a result of her blunders in Italy, the free world suffered in Italy. The record is perfectly clear that her attempt to bring the Monarchists into power, by supporting the Monarchist wing in Italy, was a disservice to the United States when she was our Ambassador to Italy. I also wish to say to my friend, the Senator from New York, that a "cover-up" job has been done on Clare Boothe Luce in regard to her record as our Ambassador to Italy. I started, on yesterday, to bring that out; and before the vote is taken on the question of confirmation of her nomination, I shall bring more out with regard to the great mistakes she made as our Ambassador to Italy. Now I turn to the next indictment I wish to make in regard to the policy which she and her husband followed in Italy. It relates to their interference with the oil policies of Italy.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield further?

Mr. MORSE. In my judgment, there can be no doubt that both Henry Luce and Clare Boothe Luce did what they could to interfere with the Government oil policies of Italy. In view of her record in Italy with regard to intervention in the Italian oil policies, I think it is a great mistake to send such an Ambassador to Brazil, where there is another Government monopoly, and where the oil industry is run by the Government.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Oregon yield further?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. The Senator from Oregon is very adroit and agile and able.

But at the moment I am trying to pinpoint the Italian situation and I confine my questions to the Senator from Oregon to Mrs. Luce's service in Italy.

Does not the Senator from Oregon realize that, no matter what Mrs. Luce may have tried to do, or no matter what anyone else may have tried to do, the Monarchist Party in Italy was so small that it could not, under any possible set of facts, ever have gotten into power in Italy?

Mr. MORSE. I brought out at the hearing on yesterday, let me say to my friend, the Senator from New York, that her intervention caused bitter criticism of the United States in Italy, at the time, and resulted in the election of Scelba who was not of the party she was supporting, and that was clear proof of her intervention. What I sought to bring out in the hearings was that she should have kept her hands off of the politics of Italy. I sought to make clear that if she does become our Ambassador to Brazil, it should be with a pledge that she will keep her hands off of politics in Brazil.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. KEATING. Does not the Senator realize that if those elections, in which the Senator alleges she had some participation, had not gone the way they did, Italy might well have gone Communist?

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from New York misses my point. Italy went the way it did in spite of Mrs. Luce, not because of her. My criticism of her has nothing to do with how the Italian elections went, but that she sought to intervene in the Italian elections, and no American Ambassador should do such a thing.

Mr. KEATING. Does not the Senator realize that the result of those elections was in conformity with the desires of the administration and of the leaders of both political parties in this country?

Mr. MORSE. That has nothing to do with the issue I am raising as to her disqualifications to serve as ambassador because of the fact that she did not maintain a position of neutrality in connection with those elections.

Mr. KEATING. Does not the Senator feel that if she contributed in some manner—in a legitimate manner—to the result of the Italian elections, she was serving our interests and the interests of the free world?

Mr. MORSE. No, not at all. She did not contribute to the winning side. The Monarchists did not win, thank God; and the Communists did not win, thank God.

Mr. KEATING. But the free world won, and the anti-Communists in Italy won.

Mr. MORSE. But she was not supporting the party that won.

Mr. KEATING. If Mrs. Luce contributed to that result, I think she served the interests of the free world.

Mr. MORSE. That is a very interesting commentary by the Senator from New York, if what he means to imply by his remark is that Ambassadors we send abroad should embroil themselves in the elections of the countries to which they are accredited. I simply want to say I reject that idea. I am criticizing Mrs. Luce because she let herself become involved, when she should not have done so.

Mr. KEATING. I have made no such intimation.

Mr. MORSE. I have made my interpretation of the remarks of the Senator from New York. I will let the RECORD speak for itself as to whether reasonable men will come to the conclusion that the Senator is trying to support an Ambassador who did involve herself in an election. I draw the conclusion from the Senator's statement that he thinks it was all right for her to have done so.

Mr. KEATING. In the present state of the world, I would support any Ambassador who, in a legitimate manner, helped to prevent our allies and friends in the free world from going communistic.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator begs the whole question when he says, "in a legitimate manner." I simply say that, if we are going to follow what the Senator from New York has suggested, we ought to announce to the world "We want you to understand that when we send Ambassadors to you we are sending advance campaign managers for the side in your country's political campaigns we want elected." Just make that American policy and then see how many vacant Embassies there will be when we make such an announcement and foreign governments proceed to send our Ambassadors home. It is an untenable suggestion that our Ambassadors have any justification in meddling into the domestic political campaigns of a foreign country.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I have listened to the Senator from Oregon with some interest. I had not heard the comments of my colleagues from Arizona and Illinois. Mrs. Luce is close to being a constituent of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] and myself.

Mr. MORSE. I want to say I admire the chivalry of the Senators from New York [laughter]——

Mr. JAVITS. Some fine things have been done in the name of chivalry——

Mr. MORSE. But we simply have to have a policy in the Senate of passing judgment on the record of nominees.

Mr. JAVITS. I am going to point out the record. That is why I rose. I happened to be in Italy on a number of occasions when Clare Boothe Luce served there, and on a number of occasions since. If we are to evaluate this issue fairly, and throw into the balance what the Senator from Oregon has said about Mrs. Luce—and I think it is fair to mention that—there should also be thrown into the balance these facts: It seems to me that through the ambassadorships of Mrs. Luce and Mr. Zellerbach, two persons whom I happen to know better than one knows most Ambassadors, we have developed a relationship with Italy in which Italy is probably as dependable a member of the NATO alliance as we have in all Western Europe.

If we are going to pass judgment on the question, I think it also is fair to give a very heavy value to the result. Whatever may be the dynamics of the situation, and the Senator from Oregon is at liberty to speak to them, and argue them, and contend for the particular opinion which he espouses, the fact is that during the two tenureships, a relationship has been built up which has made Italy, insofar as the United States is concerned, one of the most dependable allies we have in all of Europe. I think it is only fair to tote up the whole score.

Mr. MORSE. The only difficulty I have with the statement of the Senator from New York is the break in the chain of cause to effect involved in his argument. I do not know what his comments have to do with Mrs. Luce's testimony yesterday. What I am seeking to point out at this point in the debate is I am satisfied that what has developed in Italy has developed in spite of her. In view of the mistakes she made as Ambassador, I think we are very fortunate that the situation has not deteriorated in Italy.

Mr. JAVITS. What I am seeking to point out—and I think it is only fair that we tote up the whole score—is that when a person has a job to do and the end result in respect to that job is good, I think that person is entitled to credit as well as criticism for anything she has done in the job of which the Senator from Oregon disapproves. That is the only point I make.

Mr. MORSE. I merely wish to point out that merely because two facts exist at the same time, it does not necessarily follow that one fact is the cause of the other.

Mr. JAVITS. They should be discussed.

Mr. MORSE. When I am discussing her record as Ambassador to Italy, I am discussing the whole record. I only wish to point out that I think it is a mistake to send to Brazil, where there is a Government oil monopoly, an ambassador whose past record shows the position she takes in regard to such a domestic oil policy as exists in Brazil.

The next point, and the last point, I desire to raise today is that when we come to judge the diplomatic qualifications of a person, we should take his or her total testimony and the responses which are made to questions. We then have to ask ourselves, "Does this person demonstrate sufficient stability, emotionally, and mentally, and does this person demonstrate such a position on issues vital to the welfare of America in any foreign embassy abroad as to justify voting for confirmation of his or her nomination?"

I listened to Mrs. Luce yesterday, and I came to the conclusion that she does not have the mental and emotional stability which I think a good diplomat should have. I only wish to say that the Senator from Arizona, the Senator from Illinois, and now my two good friends, the Senators from New York, have, in my judgment, offered nothing in this record by way of evidence which would justify my changing the point of view I expressed in the hearing yesterday When this administration nominates a woman for the ambassadorship of Brazil, who has stated, "Franklin Roosevelt is the only President in our history who lied us into war," then I must conclude that in the absence of documentation of proof of that charge, I cannot, in good conscience, vote to confirm the nomination of such a person, and I shall not do so.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.

RAILROAD RETIREMENT BILL

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement which I made today as chairman of the Subcommittee on Railroad Retirement of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, which is a press release summarizing the bill and announcing that the bill was reported by the full committee this morning by a vote of 14 to 0 with 1 member recorded as "present."

I attach to the release a summary of the committee amendments.

There being no objection, the statement and summary were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MORSE ANNOUNCES LABOR COMMITTEE APPROVAL OF HIS RAILROAD RETIREMENT BILL

Senator WAYNE MORSE, Democrat, of Oregon, today announced that the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare had voted 14 to 0, with one member recorded as present, to report his railroad retirement bill, S. 226, favorably for consideration by the Senate. Senator MORSE is chairman of the subcommittee which considered the bill.

The bill, so reported, conforms closely to S. 1313 passed by the Senate last year, but which died in the House of Representatives.

In announcing the committee action, the senior Oregon Senator expressed real pleasure for the unanimity which prevailed among the committee members.

"It is my sincere hope that there will be early action and full approval of this bill in the Senate because it will strengthen the hands of those in the House of Representatives who are working with us to bring to the retired and unemployed railroad workers of America benefits that are urgently needed in coping with higher living costs," said MORSE.

The principal provisions of the bill are as follows:

1. Retired railway employees and all others receiving retirement benefits will receive approximately a 10-percent increase.

2. This increase, together with the increases approved by the Congress in 1956, necessitates increases in the taxes which finance the Railroad Retirement Fund. The bill, as reported to the Senate, provides for such increases in taxes on a graduated scale to become effective in the calendar month immediately following passage of the bill. The rates would become 6¾ percent immediately and 7¼ percent after December 31, 1961. The tax will be applicable on the first $400 of the monthly earnings.

3. The bill, as reported, calls for increases in unemployment insurance benefits. An employee with between 10 and 15 years of service who has exhausted his rights to unemployment benefits would have his benefit year extended by 13 weeks during which he could receive unemployment benefits. An employee with 15 years of service would have his benefit year extended by 26 weeks. The provision in the bill for the payment of temporary unemployment compensation to employees with less than 10 years of service up to a maximum of 65 days, but not later than April 1, 1959, would be extended to July 1, 1959, in order to conform, as nearly as possible, to the provisions in Public Law 86–7 which was approved March 31, 1959, extending the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958 to July 1, 1959.

4. Because of the existing high unemployment rate in the industry and the fact that an extraordinary drain has existed for some months on the unemployment insurance fund, the committee voted authority to the Railroad Retirement Board to borrow from its retirement fund with interest for temporary financing in the event it should become necessary. It also voted an increase in the unemployment tax rate levied upon the carriers to 4 percent, at least until such time as the fund accumulates a sufficient reserve.

SUMMARY OF THE COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS

The bill, S. 226, 86th Congress, is in general the same as the bill, S. 1313, 85th Congress, that was passed by the Senate last August. The committee, after consideration of the bill S. 226, approved the same with the following changes:

(1)(a) The 10-percent increase in retirement and survivor annuities is made effective with respect to annuities accruing for months after the month of enactment of this act. The effective date for the 10-percent increase in pensions is changed accordingly.

(b) The increase in tax rates for Retirement Act purposes, as well as the increase in the taxable and creditable monthly compensation base, is made effective with respect to compensation paid in months after the month of enactment of this act for services rendered after such month.

(c) The increase in lump sum payments is made effective with respect to deaths occurring after the month of enactment of this act.

The effective date with regard to the work restrictions on disability annuitants, and survivor beneficiaries working outside the United States, and the inclusion of social security wages for the purpose of computing survivor benefits, are not changed (effective for calendar years beginning with the calendar year 1959) because they all require computation on an annual basis.

(2) In view of the testimony before this subcommittee that the maximum contribution rate provided in S. 226 of 3½ percent would be inadequate to retain the railroad unemployment insurance account on a sound financial basis, the maximum contribution rate in the newly proposed table for unemployment insurance contributions is changed from 3½ to 4 percent, but this table, as well as the increase in the monthly taxable base from $350 to $400 a month, is made effective with respect to compensation paid in months after the month of enactment of this act for services rendered after such month.

The provisions for increasing and extending benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act and the effective dates of such increases and extensions are not changed.

(3) In view of the low balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account, a new amendment is added to the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act which confers upon the Railroad Retirement Board the authority to borrow from the railroad retirement account for the payment of benefits and refunds under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, on a reimbursable, and 3 percent interest, basis.

(4) The provision in the bill for the payment of temporary unemployment compensation to employees with less than 10 years of service up to a maximum of 65 days, but not later than April 1, 1959, is extended to July 1, 1959 in order to conform, as nearly as possible, to the provisions in Public Law 86–7 which was approved March 31, 1959, extending the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958 to July 1, 1959.

(5) A technical amendment is added to section 1(k) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. Under present law, if an individual's base year's earnings are insufficient to make him a qualified employee but for the inclusion of subsidiary remuneration, no day on which he earns such subsidiary remuneration is a day of unemployment although otherwise it may be. In view of the proposed increase in the qualifying earnings from $400 to $500 in the base year, section 1(k) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out "$400" and inserting in lieu thereof "$500".

(6) An amendment is added incorporating S. 280. This amendment would provide that pensions and annuities under this act would not be considered as income for purposes of the income limitations prescribed by section 422 of the Veterans' Benefits Act of 1957, under which non-service-connected disability pensions are not paid to any "unmarried veteran whose annual income exceeds $1,400, or to any married veteran or any veteran with children whose annual income exceeds $2,700."

NONRESIDENT TAXATION

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the testimony which I gave this morning before the Senate committee dealing with constitutional amendments, with relation to the proposal for a constitutional amendment to prevent any State from imposing an income tax on the residents of other States, including the State represented by the distinguished occupant of the chair, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WILLIAMS].

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR KENNETH B. KEATING OF NEW YORK BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY ON S.J. RES. 29 AND S.J. RES. 67 RELATING TO THE TAXATION BY STATES OF NONRESIDENTS, THURSDAY, APRIL 16, 1959

Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the committee for this opportunity to appear before you today.

Any proposal to limit the power of the States to tax the personal incomes of nonresidents earned within the State, is of great interest to New York. It is well known that New York derives over $30 million annually in revenue from such taxes, primarily from New Jersey and Connecticut residents who work in New York City and other metropolitan areas. Overall, it is estimated that more than 190,000 persons are in this situation.

Moreover, while the number is small by comparison, thousands of New York residents who live in such border areas as Buffalo and Chatham, as well as in New York City, are in exactly the reverse situation. Their plight, however, while it should not be overlooked, is not as serious. Neither New Jersey or Connecticut have any income tax. And while double withholdings are possible in the case of New York residents who work in Massachusetts and Canada, a full credit is given by New York for the amount of such taxes paid in other States.

The situation in New York I am sure is typical of the situation in many other areas of the country. Rapid means of transportation have made even the interstate commuter a common national figure. Expansion to the suburbs frequently ignores State lines. The result is a steady flow of people daily spilling over State boundaries.

These conditions are symptomatic of 20th century America. There is no doubt in my mind that the general condition is good and that no State would ever benefit from sealing off its borders to neighboring citizens. At the same time, a certain amount of self-interest is bound to pervade the operations of any governmental unit. What we must guard against is the perversion of self-interest into selfishness. The States must look after their own, but they must not do so in a way which unfairly discriminates against friendly sojourners in their midst.

I recognize the reasonableness of some of the complaints about New York's present tax provisions with respect to nonresidents who work in the State. A nonresident, for example, may not itemize such deductions as medical expenses and out-of-State charitable contributions, which are allowed to New York residents. He cannot deduct the interest on his mortgage and the real estate taxes on his house, as can a New York resident. But these are specific, practical problems which can be dealt with without disregard of the fundamental considerations involved. They are irritants which should be cured, but the cure should not be allowed to destroy the whole system.

The basis for taxation of the income earned within a State by nonresidents has long been recognized.

The first cases sustaining such taxes were Travis v. Yale & Towne Mfg. Co., 252 U.S. 60, and Shaffer v. Carte, 252 U.S. 37, both decided in 1920, which upheld respectively the New York and Oklahoma nonresident income taxes law. The Court pointed out in those cases that the States assume and perform the duty of preserving all persons, property, and business, within their borders and in consequence, must enjoy the power to resort to reasonable forms of taxation to require all such persons and interests to contribute to the expenses of government.

I assure the committee that a New York firehouse will respond to a fire alarm within the State without any preliminary inquiry as to whether the structure on fire is owned by a resident or nonresident. The New York City subways accommodate New Jersey and Bronx commuters on an equal basis. New York's highways, policemen, museums, and other services are available alike to the resident and nonresident within the State. There are no separate seats on the Staten Island ferry for workers who come to New York from out of State and for those who come from its own environs.

The Constitution entitles a nonresident to the privileges and immunities of a citizen, but to no more; not to an entire immunity from taxation, nor to any preferential treatment as compared with resident citizens. The nonresident taxpayer is entitled to protection against discriminatory taxation, but he has no right to be favored by an equally discriminatory exemption.

The Supreme Court said in the Travis and Shaffer cases that any contention that a State is debarred from exacting a share from the production and gainful occupations which borrow on its facilities for the protection and security of property and persons is so wholly inconsistent with fundamental principles as to be self-refuting. I agree fully with that statement.

The Supreme Court has also upheld the provisions of the New York law, which grant to nonresidents deductions less favorable than those extended to residents.[1]

The reasoning of the courts in that case was that the factor of residence had a legitimate connection with the allowance of more liberal deductions and justified classification of deductions founded upon residence. On that basis the Court upheld a denial to nonresidents of deductions for taxes and interest paid on real property located outside the State and such other personal expenses as life insurance premiums and medical costs.

It is not my contention that the existence of the power to tax nonresidents on this basis necessarily requires or justifies its exercise. Abstract legal considerations are not always the best guide to sound intercommunity relationships. The States involved in this problem should do all within their power as sovereign States to rectify any actual abuses which exist.

Governor Rockefeller has only recently announced that he was making the nonresident tax one of his main areas of study this year. He has called upon State officials in New Jersey and Connecticut to comment officially on recommendations which have been made to deal with various alleged inequities. Such local consideration is the proper approach to the matter and should not be handicapped by Federal intervention.

The proposed constitutional amendments would completely overturn a principle of taxation that has been judicially approved for over 40 years. They would, in effect, confer on nonresidents most of the privileges of residents, but exempt them from obligations imposed on the citizens of the State. The inequity of such a result is apparent. Nonresidents who enjoy the advantages of employment and the receipt of income within a State—and who share in the use and enjoyment of the facilities provided by the State—are morally obligated to pay a quid pro quo in the form of a tax on income earned in such State. The denial of this obligation in the case of income taxation would apply with equal force to the refusal of out-of-State residents to pay out-of-State gasoline taxes and tolls—a preposterous proposition.

It is no concern to New York that New Jersey and Connecticut do not choose to tax the income earned within those States by its citizens. But any attempt to give this practice extraterritorial application is of grave concern. The sovereign States must treat all within their midst fairly—but they need not yield their individual rights to desires which run counter to their reasonable interests.

The 31 States which levy income taxes all extend the tax to nonresidents who earn income within the State. Under these circumstances, the only beneficiaries of the proposed amendments will be nonresident workers who live in the minority of States which levy no taxes on personal income. No benefit at all will accrue to residents of income tax States who work and earn their living in States levying no income tax; for in all 31 income taxing States, taxation is levied on the basis of domicile regardless of where the income is earned.

The proposed constitutional amendments would serve the interest of only a minority of the States, would unfairly burden the citizens of the respective States with the cost of services provided to out of staters, would interfere with the sovereign rights of the States, and would repudiate long-established legal principles. Certainly this is too drastic a measure for dealing with whatever specific defects now exist in the respective tax laws. I respectfully urge the committee, therefore, to report the amendments unfavorably.

AMERICAN DEMOCRACY VERSUS COMMUNISM

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, in order to protect this Nation and help other countries fight against the Godless hordes of communism in the battle for the minds of men, we, as a people, must practice the democracy we preach.

The United States of America is today the hope of the free world. It is the one vehicle with the vigor and the vision to minister to the needs of mankind.

The Old Testament prophet, Micah, said that without vision the people will perish. His message stands before us today—and we must heed it.

We must have the vision to recognize that the world in which we live is in a state of great social, economic and political revolution. We must see that over one-third of the people of the world are hungry and that countless millions live without decent shelter or medical care.

That great American architect of ideas, Thomas Jefferson, noted that all men have the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. More than a third of the human beings in this world at this very moment are vitally concerned with maintaining just what is encompassed in the first word of that list, life.

In our democracy, we are dedicated to just one thing—the people and their pursuit of happiness. Our interest and concern for people does not stop at our national borders, but it goes wherever the idea of human liberty beats in the hearts of men.

We can whip communism over most of the world simply by practicing the democracy we preach—simply by taking a genuine concern in helping unfortunate people of the world to help themselves.

If as a people we really care, if we go to the bother and expense of furnishing less fortunate peoples the guidance, the technical assistance, the food, the medicine, the support to help them have a decent life, communism cannot win.

Democracy must first give the people of the world the greatest freedoms of all—freedom from hunger, disease, poverty, and ignorance. These are vital milestones on the road to the goal of the democratic nation—permanent peace and prosperity for all people.

Mr. President, Dr. Frank Laubach, a missionary and scholar, has been a leader in the fight against illiteracy, and, through his work to provide the world's peoples with more knowledge on how to help themselves, he has greatly furthered the fight against the evils which plague mankind. Dr. Laubach discussed this fight recently in a very eloquent speech at Waco, Tex. I request unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Texas Observer of April 11, 1959, which gives excerpts from Dr. Laubach's speech under the heading: "We Can Save The World, If We Try."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WE CAN SAVE THE WORLD, IF WE TRY

(The Observer herewith excerpts the remarkable extemporaneous address delivered by Dr. Frank Laubach as a climax of the first annual Texas Conference on Illiteracy, held on the Baylor University campus in Waco April 3–4. Delivered with ringing passion by a man who, after 30 years as a Protestant missionary, author, and educator ranks as the world's greatest authority on literacy, the speech evoked from Baylor President Dr. W. R. White the response, "I have not been stimulated so in 25 years * * * it has made me ashamed of my colleagues, my country and my life * * * we need to get this before all the students * * * they are the most idealistic * * * the possibilities are staggering."—Editor.)

Those who have seen * * * illiterates change from defeat to a new attitude for themselves and a new vision for their children * * * know why we need a roundup of illiterates in Texas. But it has a wider significance than Texas itself. Dedicating its vast wealth, courage, and vigor, Texas can become a springboard for a drive on illiteracy down through Latin America * * * for the fight against illiteracy, want and poverty which is the very core of the trouble we're in in the world today.

In the free world today, only the people who don't know the facts are free from worry. Under communism is a deep underlying evil. Just as pneumonia is preceded by a common cold, the evil of communism is preceded by something and that something is hunger. There are millions of people in the world today who are obsessed with one question, where can I get something to eat today. There is frustration and hatred of those who are the haves * * * these cause communism. Wherever you find communism breeding today, study the situation and you'll find the evil there, underlying it—hunger, despair, desperation.

And hunger is the result of illiteracy. Hunger befalls people who can't cope with disease which ruins their crops and kills their animals. They don't know scientific farming, they can't plow, they use wretched seeds, they wreck the land and don't know how to use fertilizer. In many of these countries, a small 10 percent of the population mints the money and they keep it. They make the laws to suit themselves. Underneath, the have-nots—they don't have anything. These 9 out of every 10 are illiterates, these 9 out of 10 are desperately hungry.

Another reason for the increasing hunger in the world is the success of preventive medicine, carried abroad by missionary doctors in the last 50 years. Few people realize that one of every five of our missionaries was a doctor or nurse. They have done a wonderful job, stopped one of the greatest scourges the world has ever known, cholera. Why was Africa sparsely settled? Because everybody, animals and men, died of sleeping sickness. But we did not keep the food supply up with the rising population. We didn't teach people how to farm. In the days before we lost China, only 1 out of 1,000 in China was an agricultural missionary. But again before you can end hunger, before you can teach him how to farm, you first must make him literate.

THIS HUGE GAP

Those gospels that we take around the world are full of dynamite. Missionaries are conservative as a rule, but those gospels are not conservative. "I came that you might have a more abundant life." Everything in the New Testament is hope. * * * But the trouble with the world today is we're getting richer while they're getting hungrier. They're seen us, our cars, clothes, the way we live in the hotels in their country—they're just second-rate hotels to us but they're palaces to them—and now they want to be more like us, to have the things we have. And they have a grim determination.

This huge gap * * * broke out in Russia and in China and it turned out to be communism. It broke out because people are hungry. In case nobody's heard of it, I'll tell you what communism is to these people, how it's sold to them. People who have are stealing from those who don't * * * we liquidated them in Russia. When you're hungry, that is a powerful message. China went Communist because she was hungry.

These people know it better than you and I do—the reason they're hungry is because they can't read. They know that and they're crazy to read. In many of these countries, our State Department must go through endless red tape just to get one emissary cleared for entry. But if we write * * * India or Castro or the others involved in illiteracy and ask if they want help in literacy, they always write back, "Yes, we really want your help." The doors are wide open to us, the Government is open to us, the masses are open to us.

The President now has his Food for Peace program. It is all right, it is a stopgap, it gets rid of our surpluses, it will help them, yet I can see the danger of it. It might make paupers out of these people. They don't want to be paupers. They have pride. It might make me feel good to patronize you, but it'd make you feel awful to be humiliated. So are they. The one thing these people, these little people, have is their pride and when they have to accept charity, they just plain don't like it. They have to do it, or starve, but they don't like it.

WHAT THEY WANT

What they want is to know how. What they want is to be able to do it for themselves. What they want is not charity but a chance. What they want is not a coin in the hand but a tool in the hand.

So let's help them, if that's what they want, and the place to begin is literacy. And this is the first literacy conference held in the United States. I wish I could say there had been more but there hasn't, this is the first one, and small though it relatively is to the size of Texas, it is enormously important.

There is a much greater crowd here than we see, there are a billion and a half people, there are three out of every five of the human race. They are determined to no longer be hungry, destitute, down there where they are. They are reaching up their hands, their two hands, one over to us and one over to the Communists.

You say to them "Be careful, those Communists will make slaves of you." They laugh at you. They say, "We're at the bottom now. We never were free. What is this stuff you talk about in America, this freedom? What does it mean? We're hungry. We know what that means."

If we don't help them we lose them * * * a billion and a half people. That vast army that is now determined not to stay down, you can't tell them the Communists are lying. You can't tell them to lie still, because they won't, they will hate you for it.

They are coming up as our friends, if we help them up. If we don't help them up, they are going to come up as Communists and destroy us. If they are your friends, they'll lift this world, along with you, to a new high, and if they are your enemies they may drag the world on their heads, like Samson did, like Hitler did. They'll help destroy us in the process.

That's way this is an important night tonight, far more important than even this great State of Texas. It is an important evening for all mankind. The trouble is our country does not know what I've been telling you. It is very easy to save the world if we undertake it. I was hoping point four would do it, I was glad for what it has done, but I now know it's not enough. And the people in Washington know it perfectly well too. In addition to what the Government has done—so often for selfish reasons, driving shrewd Yankee bargains—we've got to do a deed of compassion, not because we want to help ourselves, but because it's the Christian thing to do, because we ought to have done it long ago, because this thing the Communists want to do, threaten to do, to the world has touched our consciences * * * We were lopsided in our philanthropies * * * well meaning though we were, and we have neglected these poor people.

They've got to have first literacy; then the books that tell them how to help themselves up out of their misery. It's a huge problem. Just this week, I talked to the Ford Foundation about money. You know what they answered? "We've studied that problem, it's too big, we don't have the money to do it and so we're not going to touch it unless we can succeed."

I went to the Rockefeller Foundation, and they said the same thing, "too big for us." I talked to Stanley Kresge, head of the Kresge Foundation, they have about $75 million, and he said, "It's far too big for us." It's too big for government, too big for business, too big for the philanthropies, so nobody is doing it. We are losing the world on the front of literacy and education.

We are holding our own, maybe, on the economic front, but we're losing on the educational front because we haven't yet seen that we have to do that. I for one don't want to spend my money, pour it down a rathole, $40 billion for the military, $3 billion for technical and economic aid, and then lose the world. That's what we are doing.

IS CHRIST PLEASED

So I want to propose tonight one more thing that we've got to do. We've got to mobilize. If in each church, 100 people would form an army of compassion, $1 a week—that would be $5,200 a year and then I'll tell our mission board secretary we want you to send a literacy expert or a journalist who will write the things those people need to help themselves, and an agricultural expert, those are the three main things.

I believe our country is overripe * * * for such an effort. Our people are in a state of frustration and disgust; we don't like to be hated * * * but we don't know what to do. We are ready for the greatest deed of compassion the world ever saw. We reach out there, help those hungry, desperate people up and then Christ will smile. You think your Christ is very pleased with America when America places $21 in church overhead, for her own church expenses, then sends $1 abroad to help save the world? If we asked Christ first do you think he would say put $21 in stained glass windows and in a tower and then send a dollar abroad? The Christ who said, "I am hungry and thirsty and naked and sick and a stranger and you help me when you help them." That's Christianity. The 250,000 churches in America * * * could send an average of one person each abroad * * * and the secular institutions, the PTA, women's clubs, colleges, Rotary * * * could send 250,000 more.

History is going over the Niagara rapidly. I also know America is going to change it. We want a change and we know now we have to do it ourselves Government doing all it will, business doing all it will, philanthropies doing all it will and then the church can send the army that has the love to Christ to teach them to help themselves.

Some of them are good, some of them are bad, but all are frightened. That is why this meeting tonight is not just a nice little thing we are doing. It is a part—true not a very big part yet—but big in potential.

I am telling you the vision that has got me burning up * * * and then this could be one of the most important meetings ever held in Texas because of what happened afterward.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, we have some very expensive programs of military aid. In addition, we have a category with which the American public is not very familiar, called economic aid in support of military aid. We have the military aid to the foreign countries, economic aid to the foreign countries, the point 4 aid, and in addition the catch-all economic aid in support of military aid. It seems to me the Senate might well look into the waste of American money.

The project to which I have referred is a project sponsored by Dr. Frank Laubach of Baylor University. The purpose is to raise the literacy level of the American people and of people around the world, and it is one which is not a waste of money.

A survey has been conducted in my State, the results of which show that when we consider the real literacy—not merely the ability of a man to sign his name, but rather the ability to read an article and comprehend what is in the article—there are some 800,000 illiterate people in the State, and we are not below the American average in Texas.

Around the world many people are discontented because of their fear of the vague unknown. They do not know how to read or how to understand. This is a great project to teach people how to read and write. It is the most inexpensive of all forms of foreign aid. Its purpose is to give people the use of the written word. The program will have as great an impact upon hundreds of millions of people around the world as did the invention of printing centuries ago in Europe. It is like the invention of movable type. Our people have had the benefit of movable type. Very few people have utilized it.

Prussia was the first country to begin to practice mass education of its people when, under the leadership of an enlightened despot, Frederick the Great, education was made a project of the state. We are the second nation to make an effort to mass educate its people.

The movement started first in the Massachusetts Bay Colony, at the town level. Until the time of the Revolution it was not considered a problem of the entire colony. But in the South individual plantations operated an educational system. In the mid-Atlantic States there was in operation a system of church education, township education, and individual effort. It is sometimes called "no" system, but is really a combination system, using the three different means then known for support of the education of the youth.

Under the leadership of Thomas Jefferson and other Revolutionary leaders, the problem of education began to be recognized as a governmental problem about the time of the Revolution. Even before 1800, North Carolina and one or two other States had established State-supported institutions of higher learning. Massachusetts again led the way with some State support for public schools.

I remember as a boy that when the States began to devote State money to the support of public schools, it was said that that was socialism. It was said, "The States will take away our schools from the towns and cities if we vote State money for the support of schools."

Over the United States it is recognized that we could not have a strong public school system without State support by individual States, and the stimulus of the growth of movements for mass education of all the people.

We are met with terrific competition from abroad. For a long time we led the way in mass education. Our aim was the education of every American boy and girl. Now other countries are proceeding on the basis of the method first devised by Frederick the Great, making mass education a State project.

In Russia it is decreed how long a person shall go to school. The type of work he shall do is based upon mandatory selection, once he is graduated. There are weaknesses in that system, which cannot approach the democratic system, provided we put sinews in our school system and show that we really mean to have a first-class school system, which we do not have in many States. We should put money enough into the system to make it a first-class school system.

The purpose of the program of teaching adults how to read is to make up for deficiencies in the school system in the past generation. A simple method of teaching people to read can be operated at small cost around the world. In my opinion, that is the most important form of foreign aid in which we could engage. We should teach those people to read.

I am very proud that this movement began in my home State. The survey was made there. Techniques are being developed. There are three or four centers. I shall not take the time of the Senate to narrate in detail the educational methods, but they are new, although the ideal is as old as the Old Testament. The prophet Micah said that without vision the people perish. We must have vision. Merely voting to appropriate $4 billion will not win the uncommitted world for democracy. There must be leadership in spirit and in deed. We must give the peoples of the world the benefit of the printed word. We must give them the benefit of the things our ancestors had handed to them four centuries ago in Europe. We must inspire those people with confidence in us, and convince them that we want them to better their way of life. We should be willing to give them books and newspapers to read while we are sending other forms of aid. This form of aid is the inexpensive type.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EMPLOYMENT OF ADDITIONAL INTERNAL REVENUE AGENTS

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, during the course of the year I have had occasion many times to call the attention of the Senate to the possibility of balancing the budget through the closing of tax loopholes. One of the greatest tax loopholes exists because income tax returns are not adequately and properly audited. That is because of the fact, in turn, that there are at the moment approximately 3,000 fewer Internal Revenue agents auditing income tax returns than were engaged in that work at the end of 1952.

Tax chiseling is a problem which I believe Congress must face and solve. If we do so, we will provide one of the best ways of bringing into the Treasury the additional revenue necessary to balance the budget at a higher figure than that recommended by the President of the United States. A very interesting article entitled "The Gentle Art of Tax Avoidance" was published in the April 16 issue of the Reporter magazine. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GENTLE ART OF TAX AVOIDANCE

(By John L. Hess)

"I don't feel as though the Government is entitled to anything," said the $25,000-a-year call girl on the Ed Murrow broadcast, "because these men are all legitimate businessmen. They deduct you at the end of the year."

The young lady was of course in error about her tax liability. The Government has no scruples against getting its share of any earned income, including the wages of sin. To be sure, the Supreme Court has ruled that an embezzler is not required to pay a tax on his take because the money isn't really his after all. But an extortionist, it held later, may not make the same defense, nor may a taker of bribes. They've got to pay because, in a manner of speaking, they earned the money. The payer of a bribe, on the other hand, may not deduct it lawfully as a business expense. But the Wall Street Journal has advised in its tax column that corporations can get around that in foreign operations by setting up subsidiaries to handle the payoffs. Recently, moreover, the deduction of kickbacks has been allowed in certain fields where they are regarded as normal business practice. For the distinction between normal and abnormal practices, see your tax lawyer.

The quirks of tax morality would be more amusing but for the fact that taxes of all sorts now take roughly a quarter of the gross national product and are a palpable burden to every citizen. Even so, many State and local governments, not to mention the Federal Government itself, are floundering in budgetary crises. The taxpayer can afford to pay more, one may argue; indeed he must if the Nation is to meet its pressing needs. And yet last November he rejected one-third of the borrowings proposed for local school construction and other projects, and much of the remainder barely squeezed through. The breadwinner-taxpayer-voter is obviously dragging his feet. Of course people have been trying to get out of paying taxes ever since there were any, but something more than a simple reluctance to part with cash is involved in the present difficulties. Resentment at the inequities of the tax burden and contempt for the hypocrisy of the tax laws have become a serious national issue.

EVASION AND AVOIDANCE

That call girl who was unwilling to report her income has at least one thing in common with millions of other citizens who are rewarded for their services on an individual basis rather than by salary: the Government cannot tax her earnings at the source. The National Bureau of Economic Research has estimated conservatively that 30 percent of the income of private entrepreneurs—doctors, gamblers, lawyers, call girls, butchers, con men, farmers, and freelance writers—is not reported to Uncle Sam. The same applies to 61 percent of interest paid on savings and 13 percent of dividends. But not more than 5 percent of salaries go unreported. Over the years, there have been proposals that income taxes be deducted from interest and dividends at the source, as they are on wages. But the suggestions have never gotten anywhere.

A certified public accountant helping a newspaperman friend prepare his tax return not long ago shook his head pityingly and said, "You chumps on salaries pay all the taxes." He did not mean to imply that the very rich lie in reporting their incomes, their returns are scrutinized too closely for that. But while, in the curious semantics of the tax specialist, the rich do not often evade taxes, they are able to avoid them to a degree only dimly realized by the general public. (Tax evasion, according to the latest practitioners' guide, is doing something that, if you get caught, will mean a fine or jail. Tax avoidance at worst comes to an honest disagreement with the Revenue Commissioner; if you lose, you just pay up what you owe, plus interest.)

In 1929, taxpayers with reported incomes above $100,000 paid two-thirds of total Federal income-tax revenues; in 1956, they paid roughly one-twentieth. For persons earning less than $10,000 the change has been just the reverse; in 1929, they paid less than one-twentieth of the income-tax revenues; in 1956 they paid two-thirds. Nearly five-sixths of the income tax now is levied upon the lowest, or 20 percent, bracket.

It should be emphasized that this extraordinary shift in the tax burden reflects the enormous rise in Government spending and in the numbers and prosperity of people within the below-$10,000 group. But in some measure it also reflects the increasing ability of the upper brackets to avoid taxes, coupled with the inability of the salary earners to evade them since the enactment in 1943 of the law establishing the withholding of 18 percent of taxable income from wages.

Much has been said about confiscatory taxes, and indeed the 91 percent bite listed at the bottom of the tax table is confiscatory. But nobody actually pays 91 percent of income. Fortune magazine has noted that in 1956 the Treasury took only about 37 percent of full incomes above $200,000, where they theoretically enter the 91 percent bracket. "The high-bracket tax situation," Fortune goes on, "has been likened to 'dipping deeply into great incomes with a sieve.' One sophisticated finance officer of a large corporation says he is amazed to hear that anyone pays more than 60 percent of his total income; that anyone who does must do so 'just out of forgetfulness.'"

Of course, a few corporations pay high executives salaries that reach far up into the 91 percent bracket—notably Bethlehem Steel and, in palmier days, the movie industry. But these must be considered harmless status symbols. The real compensation for executives these days lies in such tax-favored income as the expense account, deferred payment plans, pensions, and options to buy company stock at less than the market price.

This last practice has developed a mythology that is accepted chiefly by financial writers and stock-exchange pamphleteers. Stock options are desirable, it is held, to nourish the loyalty of executives. Unfortunately, the reports required by the Securities and Exchange Commission on stock dealings of insiders give the impression that many beneficiaries lose no time in selling the shares thus acquired. A naive RCA stockholder once asked why Chairman David Sarnoff and President Frank Folsom had sold stock granted them under option, at a profit of more than half a million dollars, after holding the shares only the 6 months required to qualify for a long-term capital gain. Sarnoff explained that they had borrowed the money to buy the stock, and had to sell the stock to repay the loan.

Actually, in seeking income other than salary the executive is merely following the curious moral precepts of our tax system, which hold the earnings of work to be inferior to all other sources of income. A married man who makes $10,000 a year on a salaried job has to pay a higher tax than one who stays at home and collects an equal income in dividends and just as much as one who dabbles in real estate or other speculation and clears $20,000 of long-term capital gains. (In fact, the investor and the speculator have many more opportunities to claim business expenses and other legitimate deductions, and almost certainly would pay considerably less.) Furthermore, there is a premium for the man who speculates with other people's money, for he can deduct the interest paid on debt.

THE SWINDLE SHEET

Probably no aspect of our tax mores has received more attention in recent years than the expense account. In the Yale Law Journal last July, V. Henry Rothschild and Rudolf Sobernheim wrote that expense-account spending might be conservatively estimated at $5 billion a year, resulting to a tax loss to the Treasury of from $1 to $2 billion. Regarding the loose use of this money, they commented: "The Treasury is keenly aware of the problem, but its efforts at regulation have met with stubborn resistance, both from the luxury services sustained by the expense account and from the individuals who find the account essential to their accustomed standard of living." Last year the Treasury went so far as to order taxpayers to account for expenses in detail, but it beat an ignominious retreat under a storm of protest.

While the expense account gives many a salesman and junior executive a taste of the high life, it should not be concluded that it has an equalitarian effect. "A physician undoubtedly would be questioned if he chartered a plane for his trip to the A.M.A. convention and used a $300-a-day executive suite at a luxury hotel," U.S. News & World Report has observed. "But the tax agents usually don't bat an eye when a big executive spends on that scale."

Speaking of conventions, it is a poor trade group these days that does not charter a cruise ship to the Caribbean for its annual business meeting. The J. I. Case Co. last winter flew all of its dealers and their wives to the Bahamas to look at its tractors, made in Milwaukee. A doctor with any ingenuity now arranges his European vacation to coincide with a medical meeting.

Many companies award mass vacation trips to their dealers as prizes (cash rebates would be taxable), although more than one dealer has said he would rather take the cash and pay the tax. One, quoted in the Wall Street Journal, grumbled, "Who wants to spend his vacation with a lot of appliance dealers?"

Given the choice between a $10 lunch and a $10 bill, many salesmen would take the money and eat at the Automat—indeed, there is some suspicion that some do just that. But, legally, the expense account does not permit such freedom. It has been observed that it gives the beneficiary a split-level existence: filet mignon on business and hamburger at home. Like other elements of the tax structure, it distorts the way of life of even those who get away with the most.

In one respect, at least, the expense account appears to have elevated our moral standards: a British observer has noted that a businessman used to take his secretary on a trip and say she was his wife; now, he takes his wife and says she is his secretary.

To its defenders, the expense account is a useful way of giving executives a standard of living they otherwise could not achieve under our tax structure. The difficulty here is that the tax benefits are limited rather capriciously to top executives, salesmen, entrepreneurs, and staff members of the advertising, TV, and public-relations fields. The great majority of citizens, who never see the inside of a posh club or sit down front at a hit musical, may feel that they are being discriminated against.

In any case, the thing is clearly getting out of hand when a court will rule, as in one case celebrated among tax practitioners, that the head of a dairy company and his wife might deduct the $17,000 cost of a safari to Africa because of the publicity value to the business. The Yale Law Journal article cited above recommended that misuse of the business-expense deduction be made subject to a cash penalty. But this would hardly stem the tide without a redefinition of misuse.

A straightforward, drastic attack on the disease would be to bar all deductions for entertainment. It also would rule out club dues, town apartments, yachts, hunting lodges, executive dining rooms, and the private use of company cars, with or without chauffeurs. It would limit expenses on the road to a fixed per diem scale, such as some old-fashioned companies still impose on their lower employees. Any luxuries whatever would be considered compensation, and taxable. The increase in revenues would then be applied to reducing tax rates.

The suggestion is offered here without optimism. For one thing, its enactment into law would hit all Congressmen in the pocketbook. For another, it would get the hotel, resort, and entertainment industries up in arms, as did even the Treasury's feeble effort at a checkup last year. (Is it really necessary for the U.S. Treasury to subsidize the Stork Club?) Further, it would seem to threaten the standard of living of hundreds of thousands of businessmen, executives, and salesmen. Doubtless if they had to spend their own money they would not make quite the same splash. But they might drink less and actually live better with lower tax rates and more control over their own money. And outlawing swindle sheets might do wonders for their immortal souls.

BREAD UPON THE WATERS

The erosion of public morality by the tax system is perhaps nowhere more apparent than in the area of charity. Jesus said, "It is more blessed to give than to receive"; nowadays hardly any appeal for a worthy cause fails to add, "and it is tax-deductible, too." More and more, wealthy people are learning that it often actually pays to give.

Let us take a gentleman in the 60 percent tax bracket, who 5 years ago picked up a nice little painting in Paris for $10,000. Today it is worth $20,000. If he were to die owning it, his estate would have to pay an inheritance tax. So he gives the painting to a museum, and deducts the full $20,000 value from his current income. Or he can give the picture in annual installments, according to his tax needs. (A Solomon must have thought that one up.) Or he may deduct one-third of a painting's value by arranging to let a museum have it for 4 months of the year, thus perhaps saving storage and insurance costs while he is away during the summer, and keep it right up on his own wall the rest of the year. Who said you can't eat your cake and have it too?

Similarly, one may give stocks or bonds to a charitable organization or school, deducting a substantial amount from present income but retaining the interest or dividends on the securities for life—and for the lifetime of an heir as well. The Research Institute of America, commending this device to upper-bracket clients, remarks that in this way they may not only increase their after-tax income but also obtain the immediate personal satisfaction and community respect that comes with a present rather than a post-mortem gift.

A number of colleges and church groups have banded together to promote a give-us-the-securities-you-keep-the-income campaign. There is a kind of admirable farsightedness and selflessness about this business of raiding the Treasury today for benefits that only future generations will be able to enjoy. It compensates a little for the national debt that we are leaving to those generations.

Whatever it signifies about human nature, the tax code clearly has been a windfall for philanthropy. According to a study published last month, donations to colleges alone soared from $50 million in the 1943–44 school year to $111 million in 1957–58. Foundations have proliferated like rabbits, and for many of them the chief preoccupation has been how to get rid of money. Organizations have sprung up to combat various diseases (and in at least one case, two organizations are bitterly contesting the same disease and each other). Museums large and small, all over the country, have been enjoying a stream of gifts of works they could never before even dream of owning.

In donating contemporary art, the philanthropist may easily contrive to clear more money than the artist. Recently, the revenue men have been ungraciously demanding evidence of a market value for the gift, but appraisals are still bound to be on the generous side. A whisper is heard of one big taxpayer who made a package deal in a casual conversation over a dinner table. He bought $30,000 worth of art, which was donated to a string of small museums at a valuation upward of $70,000, which he deducted from income at a substantial profit. He never saw the pictures, but he may drop in on one or another museum sometime with a friend to admire his gift and the plaque acknowledging it. No museum has ever listed the Treasury as a codonor.

On the contrary, many institutions have lost all inhibitions about raiding the Government till. A number of charities, for example, employ a direct tax appeal to collect used clothing, cars, furniture, and junk of all kinds, which they sell, well aware that the deduction for tax purposes is far greater than the money they actually receive. One New York clothing chain, noted for its sincere-type advertising, invites taxpayers to turn in their old dinner jackets. The store provides, without charge, a signed appraisal for tax purposes, gives the clothing to charity, and stands quietly available if the taxpayer wants to buy new evening clothes.

The director of a great missionary organization, which ships a great deal of used clothing overseas (though presumably not dinner jackets), was asked the other day how tax avoidance squared with religion. "We are quite sensitive to the problem," he replied. "We live with it every day. And at the end of the year, we get that flood of contributions with carefully worded letters," the accountants having told their clients how much to give to the Lord. He had no proposal for a solution.

A national spokesman for a leading Protestant denomination defended the deduction as a perfectly legitimate decision of society to divert up to 30 percent of income to charity, education, and religion, thus preserving privately directed social activities in the era of the welfare state. (To be sure, those who do not choose to give must assume part of the tax burden of those who do give.) But he was concerned about quite another aspect—the exemption of churches themselves from income, property, and business taxes on nonreligious ventures. A worldly member of his board of trustees, being apprised of this exemption recently, said, "Why, if I had known that a few years ago, we would own the oil industry now." But the churchmen did not want to own the oil industry. Rich men die and leave much of their wealth to churches, he pointed out, "but churches never die—ultimately, they could own everything." Before that happened, he could foresee state intervention.

EVERYBODY'S DOING IT

The social acceptability of raiding the Treasury is demonstrated by a common gimmick in the field of so-called municipal bonds. The billions of interest paid each year by State and local governments are exempt from income tax for the bondholder. This generous (not to say incomprehensible) treatment is accorded by the Federal Government to make it easier and cheaper for the localities to borrow. In gratitude, they frequently conspire with the bond marketers to do the Treasury out of even more tax income.

Thus, a part of the bond issue will carry an abnormally high interest rate, which is offset by a price above the face value of the bond. Now the bond house, or a favored customer who buys such a bond, will report a deductible loss when it comes due, since the face value is less than the price paid for it. Actually, the holder will have received an exorbitant interest payment, entirely exempt from the Federal income tax. The loss is quite fictitious but entirely legal.

The Treasury tried to narrow this loophole by denying the "loss" to dealers who held the bonds themselves for more than a month. But how could it stop a dealer from selling a packet of bonds to another dealer, who might sell him a similar packet?

It would obviously be cheaper as well as more honest for Congress to subsidize directly any activity it wants to help, but it has always found it easier to grant tax exemptions. Exemptions are noticed chiefly by those who take advantage of them; subsidies show up in appropriations. The budget debate rages about deficit spending, never about deficit taxation. Has anybody asked why income tax revenues have failed to grow as fast as income?

The answer is that every time Congress is persuaded to block one unintended loophole, it opens three or four more in order to eliminate inequities—or give someone a tax break. Last year, for example, Congress spurned all efforts to lower taxes as an antirecession measure. Yet Congress also voted a special and rapid depreciation provision for small business that removed huge amounts of income from the tax rolls, eased the deduction of present losses from past years' profits, increased the tax-exempt reserves that corporations may set aside from earnings, made easier the formation of collapsible corporations—a form of alchemy that turns income into capital gains—and approved the formation of new private investment companies that will get both Government subsidies and tax exemptions. And that was a relatively inactive year in the matter of exemptions.

One might suppose that tax practitioners would be the last to object to a system of such wild complexity that the courts themselves are perpetually engaged in wrangles over what it means and a deduction is frequently legal in one judicial district and outlawed in others. But J. S. Seidman, delivering a committee report of the American Institute of CPA's back in 1956, denounced all 1,000 pages of the Federal Tax Code as a crazy quilt of exceptions, exemptions, deductions, and special provisions, many so abstruse that the legislators who adopt them seldom know what they're about.

If 100 special provisions in the code were eliminated, Seidman figured, tax rates could be cut by one-third. The brackets then would run from 13 to 61 percent, instead of from 20 to 91 percent.

One thing virtually all the special provisions have in common is that however reasonable or meritorious they may seem, they help the upper-bracket taxpayer most and do little or nothing for the low-income group. Take the case of the joint return: a man earning a net taxable income of $4,000 saves $40, while one earning $200,000 saves $22,180. And then there is the exemption for interest paid on debt. Here the tax code appears to be saying that only fools pay cash. It favors the mortgagee as against the tenant or the man so old-fashioned as to own his home outright. And people in the upper brackets have found it profitable to borrow money to buy insurance and annuities, the tax deductions on the interest paying much of the cost of the premiums. In effect, Uncle Sam pays their insurance bills.

PITY THE POOR WILDCATTER

The most notorious of the loopholes deliberately created by Congress is the oil-depletion allowance. All business is, of course, permitted to deduct from income the depreciation, or using up, of its assets; in the mineral field this is called depletion. The allowance varies among minerals (even oyster shells are now eligible), but an oil producer may subtract 27.5 percent of his gross income. A well may easily repay its investment within a couple of years, but the allowance goes on as long as it yields oil, which may be for a generation or two. An indication of the sums involved was contained in the report by the Venezuelan Government that its oil industry, largely U.S.-owned, cleared a net income after taxes of $829,500,000 in 1957, a return of 32.5 percent on its investment in a single year.

Practically nobody, even in the financial journals, defends the 27.5 percent depletion rate—except, of course, the oil men themselves. Like so many other advocates of more or less noble causes, they raise the banner of national defense. Only a generous incentive, they argue, will keep the thousands of independent little wildcatters drilling and thus maintain the Nation's oil industry in a posture of readiness. Yet of the $2 billion of depletion claimed in 1953, J. S. Seidman reported, companies with more than $100 million of assets accounted for 63 percent. Companies with less than $100,000 accounted for 4 percent.

Over the years, many a Congressman seeking to strengthen the Government revenues has wistfully eyed the depletion loss. But with both Houses firmly guided by Texans, the fund raisers have been obliged to look elsewhere. On this rock have foundered all proposals for tax relief for lower incomes. The Wall Street Journal once reported that Speaker SAM RAYBURN had been asked how he reconciled his opposition to a tax cut with the Democratic Party platform, which had promised to raise the personal exemption from $600 to $800. Mr. RAYBURN frowned, then chuckled and replied: "I didn't write all that platform myself."

Congress has given to all business a little of the same treatment it has accorded the oil industry by speeding up the period of depreciation. Here as in so many cases, the taxpayer and tax collector play a game of let's pretend. They pretend that a plant, machine, or apartment house wears out in, say 5 or 8 or 20 years, when actually it has a useful life of 15, 20, or 50 years. Each year the owner deducts the fictitious rate of depreciation from income. In theory this merely postpones taxes, since when the item is fully depreciated the deductions halt. But meanwhile the Government loses the use of the tax money, and must borrow it elsewhere. During and after the Korean war, the privilege of unusually rapid write-offs was extended to roughly $35 billion of investments, some of them connected with defense only by the exercise of a supple imagination. It is estimated that the Treasury lost $3 to $5 billion on this program just in the interest it paid on the money it had to borrow.

But that is by no means the whole story. Once an investment is fully depreciated, it may be sold—frequently, in these inflationary times, at a higher price than was originally paid for it. The original owner then pays, at maximum, a 25 percent capital-gains tax on the profit. The second owner begins to depreciate his purchase all over again—at a higher cost basis. The miracle of the loaves and fishes has been brought up to date.

Years ago some clever chap figured out another amiable fiction that has bled the Treasury out of billions. His client, let us assume, sold turpentine from a large storage tank, which he replenished from time to time. Prices had been rising for years and seemed destined to rise indefinitely. The tax adviser thought it would be helpful, taxwise, if every time his client sold turpentine the very last batch he had bought—and therefore the costliest—happened to come out of the spigot. The profit on the sale thus would be smaller.

This, said a professor later in the Journal of Accountancy, is "an assault on common sense." Physically, it couldn't be done. But in tax accounting, it was done. "My client has some of the oldest turpentine in Georgia," an accountant once told me.

This method of inventory accounting is called LIFO (last in, first out), to distinguish it from FIFO (first in, first out). One oil company told its stockholders that it saved $12 million the year it switched from FIFO to LIFO.

It was a great day in retailing when department stores won the right to apply LIFO to their inventories—preposterous as it may be to assume that stores are keeping goods for years when actually they try to turn over their stocks a dozen times a year. R. H. Macy & Co. even tried to apply LIFO retroactively, and persuaded one court to go along, but lost on an appeal by the Government. Had it won, it is estimated that the department-store industry would have collected a billion dollars in tax refunds.

There is a theoretical drawback to LIFO. If a decline in prices were to set in, LIFO would increase taxable profits rather than decrease them. But in that event, there might not be any profits to pay taxes on anyway, and furthermore, there is little doubt that the Treasury or Congress would permit the taxpayer to switch back to FIFO.

NOW YOU SEE IT

Where taxes are concerned, said Judge Learned Hand in a famous opinion, if it is legal it is not immoral. In fact, the aim of most avoidance devices and tax-relief measures is to conceal the honest origin of funds—that is, to pretend that the taxpayer did not get the money for services rendered. Thus the film star forms a corporation and pretends to be a speculator rather than an actor. An honest profit, like an honest wage, is penalized under the law; hence it must be postponed, renamed, turned into a capital gain, or made to vanish entirely. These goals may be achieved in a number of ways, of which the following are no more than a small sampling:

1. A company or individual may set up a corporation in a tax-free haven abroad, which may keep its profits from exports and other foreign operations intact until the firm is liquidated and the profits brought home as capital gains. A Wall Street Journal reporter recently encountered subsidiaries of many such taxpayers as U.S. Steel and Bethlehem in the sunny Bahamas. Most of them were close-mouthed about what they were doing there.

Within certain limits, one can also organize a separate corporation for each aspect of a business operation, each corporation paying the reduced rate on the first $25,000 of income. Some of the profits may be carried over as reserves until liquidation, when they become capital gains.

2. One may give stock to members of one's family and set up multiple trusts to get out of the high brackets, both in this life and in the hereafter. Through various means, a business may be made to support one's poor relations without the money ever passing through the donor's hands and thus being taxed.

3. As Sylvia Porter advised recently in the New York Post: "Make sure to investigate the possibility of organizing a corporation which elects not to be taxed as a corporation—the so-called pseudo-corporation." Among the many incentives, she points out, is that an owner can become his own employee and set up various fringe benefits, such as pension plans, tax free.

One penalty of doing business under a tax system based on legal fictions is that it becomes difficult to tell what is truth. One company may be reporting a loss and actually be thriving. Another may be reporting a profit but wasting away its assets. Only the expert knows. Keeping two sets of books is no longer evidence of fraud. Some railroads legally keep at least three: one for the ICC and rate proceedings, one for the tax collector, and one for the board of directors to know what's really going on.

What this does to statistics may be imagined. How can one tell whether to buy or sell a stock, whether the money supply should be tightened or eased, whether prices and wages are too low or too high, what the outlook is for sales and for plant investment—in short, what our private and public economic policies should be—if we keep changing the rules to permit the concealment of income from the tax collector? Economic data have far too wide a margin of error to begin with; using them now is like piloting a ship into port at night while somebody keeps shifting the beacons.

In sum, a tax system based on hypocrisy listing unconscionably high levies on upper incomes but actually leaning more and more heavily upon the consumer and salary earner, presents a number of strictly economic problems—as well as the obvious moral ones.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a few days ago 10 other Members of the Senate and I called the attention of the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations which is dealing with appropriations for the Treasury Department to the desirability of providing a greater number of internal revenue agents to audit Federal income tax returns. Our letter to the chairman, which was made public, resulted in an editorial in the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, entitled "Myopic Economy." I ask unanimous consent that the editorial may appear in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MYOPIC ECONOMY

When it's a sure thing that $1 will get you $9, it's folly not to invest the $1.

That is the sense of a letter made public by JOSEPH S. CLARK and 10 other U.S. Senators assailing the action of the House in cutting $2.5 million from the appropriation requested by the President for the Internal Revenue Service. The effect of the cut is almost to eliminate plans for expanding the enforcement staff. The 100 new revenue agents wanted could not be hired; other personnel increases would be curtailed.

In this case it doesn't make much sense to applaud the holding down of Federal bureaucracy, for the IRS is the big "money-maker" in the U.S. Government. The Senators point out that during his first year, a new revenue enforcement official is figured to collect $9 that wouldn't otherwise be turned in for every $1 spent to employ him. The ratio has been estimated as high as $20 to $1.

This is a lot more of a "sure thing" than most. On other tax-collecting levels the experience has been corroborated again and again. California hires new auditors for thousands of dollars and rakes in extra millions in its sales tax. Pennsylvania is comparatively stingy in hiring sales tax enforcers, and Pennsylvania's sales tax leakage keeps it running behind estimates.

The Senators' appeal to have the cut restored is well taken and rates support of all honest taxpayers. It is only the chislers who benefit when IRS enforcement is hampered. Cutting off $2.5 million and thereby losing $22.5 million and up isn't economy. It's myopia.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the end result of the two insertions in the RECORD which I have caused to be made is that if the Senate will face the desirability of stopping tax chiseling and stopping tax avoidance, and will provide an adequate number of internal revenue agents for the fiscal year 1960, enormous sums of money will be obtained for the Treasury, which will be of the greatest possible importance in cutting down, if not eliminating, the prospective deficit, and which might, indeed, result in enabling us to make a payment on the national debt.

JOHN FOSTER DULLES

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, yesterday the people of our country were saddened by the announcement of the President of the United States that the Honorable John Foster Dulles had submitted his resignation as Secretary of State. All of us in the Congress, and peoples throughout this country and the world, hope and fervently pray that his health may be restored.

Mr. Dulles' decision to resign calls to mind his great service to the Nation, and to the cause of freedom. His policies and his decisions were at times the subject of controversy in some quarters of opinion in this and other countries, but that fact does not derogate their soundness and validity. Men of strong convictions and purpose find their views challenged by fleeting and superficial opinion. Mr. Dulles did not create the situations or the difficulty and danger with which he had to deal. Most of the difficult problems, in Europe and in the Pacific area, of which the United States is seized are the unsolved problems of World War II. He did not create the intransigent policies of the Soviet Union but he understood their purpose. It was his firmness in dealing with them, his determination that our country and other free countries should not submit to aggression, and that freedom must survive in the world, which marked in the minds of millions of people in the United States and throughout the world the conviction and principle of his policies.

I had the high privilege of serving with him as a member of the U.S. delegation to the General Assembly of the United Nations in 1950 and 1951. I shall never forget his leadership of the American delegation and, in fact, of the Assembly in 1951, on the fateful issue of the aggression against South Korea by North Korea and Communist China.

After that session he was designated by President Truman to negotiate the peace treaty with Japan, a treaty which has been marked as a model of justice and generosity between victor and vanquished in war.

Again I had the honor to serve under him as Ambassador of the United States to India.

In that position I learned his infinite concern and willingness to hear every point that might be made in the development of association between our country and India.

It has been said, and sometimes critically, that his policies were based upon moral postulates. We should be thankful that this is true. I shall always remember the stand of John Foster Dulles in 1956, at the time of the Suez crisis. He and President Eisenhower took the moral, not difficult position, that the United States could not support the settlement of dispute by force—even of our closest friends. It is one of the magnificent decisions in the history of this country. It was attacked in the Congress. Some of the great leaders of the press were not clear about its meaning at that time. Despite the serious implications of that decision, which was a difficult one for him and for our country, considering our friendship for Britain, France and Israel it was a proper decision, in the light of the moral position of the United States.

The qualities and services of Mr. John Foster Dulles are known to us and to the world. I simply end by saying that his indomitable courage, his selflessness and his intense love and defense of freedom have marked him as a man apart in this generation and, indeed, in the history of our country.

Our country and the free people of the world owe much to Mr. Dulles. We are sad that illness has caused him to lay down his duties, to which he gave full devotion.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, the tragic news of the worsening illness and the consequent resignation of Secretary Dulles has caused a saddening pause in the Nation and throughout the free world, a pause in which free men ponder his greatness, calculate the cost of his absence, and ask ourselves where we go from here.

For several years Secretary Dulles has been made the principal target for whatever dissatisfaction our free world allies had with the United States. Here at home he has generally been made the butt of any disappointment over world conditions. I recall my own expressions of criticism on particular occasions. But at this hour I am comforted in the knowledge that my criticism never reached—because it was never directed at—his tremendous intellect or his noble heart.

Mr. President, the news of the illness and the resignation of Secretary of State Dulles has brought a realization of his greatness to even his severest critics.

The chief architect of the free world policy of resistance to Communist aggression has stepped down. From the capitals of the world, from the press, from spokesmen of both our political parties, have come a stream of statements that carry the conviction and the sincerity that are so lacking in the ordinary platitudes and perfunctory condolences which are usual at such times.

From London to Ankara, from Stockholm to Bandung, there is solemn recognition that the free world has lost a source of moral strength, of political sagacity, of diplomatic acumen, and of limitless dedication to freedom, that may prove impossible to replace.

For more than 6 years Mr. Dulles has shouldered a burden greater than that which any other American Secretary of State has ever carried. Throughout that period he has been the principal formulator of American policy, as well as the chief negotiator and administrator of that policy.

In an era when other leaders have evaded responsibility, Mr. Dulles has assumed full responsibility, without dodging or flinching.

In an era when, after brief sojourns, other Government officials have seen fit to abandon their posts, to return to the pleasure and profit of private life, Mr. Dulles has enlisted for the duration of his life and his strength.

In an era when public figures have shrunk from criticism and have complained of mistreatment, Mr. Dulles has asked for no immunity, has issued no complaints, has made no apologies.

In an era of petty politics and partisan recriminations, Mr. Dulles has been magnanimous and selfless.

Mr. Dulles' policies were characterized by an insistence upon principle above expediency, by a refusal to barter away freedom anywhere in the world, by a determination to uphold the rights of the United States and of free nations everywhere, by a willingness to face up to the consequences of firmness, and by a confidence in the basic strength of this Nation and in the ultimate triumph of freedom and of the moral law.

In recent months the dawning recognition throughout the free world of his personal stature and of the moral and political soundness of his policies has been a heartening indication that his example will continue to serve us long after his active career has ended.

The genius of our political system is now challenged. To say that the American Government has suffered a staggering loss is merely to say the obvious. What Thomas Jefferson said of Benjamin Franklin can now be said of John Foster Dulles: "He cannot be replaced; he can only be succeeded."

Mr. President, we cannot repair this loss in a week or a month. But we of this Congress and this administration can try to repair the loss by exercising a degree of statesmanship, cooperation, and unity that will assist Mr. Dulles' successor—whoever he may be—to proceed with a boldness, a vigor, and an objectivity born of confidence in the full backing of a united America.

INTERNATIONAL FOOD FOR PEACE ACT OF 1959

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. MCGEE], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WILLIAMS], and myself, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill entitled "Food for Peace Act." It is a bill to promote the foreign policy of the United States and help to build essential world conditions of peace, by the more effective use of United States agricultural commodities for the relief of human hunger, and for promoting economic and social development in less developed countries.

The purpose of the Food for Peace Act is to so amend and revise Public Law 480 as to make it a more effective instrument for using U.S. abundance of food and fiber to help build essential world conditions of peace and freedom and thereby strengthen and promote the foreign policies of the United States. It is intended to enable the United States to promote more effectively the economic and social development of friendly nations and to lead the way in cooperation with other nations toward the abolition of human hunger.

A Peace Food Administration would be established—title VII—in the Executive Office of the President, headed by a Peace Food Administrator, to aid the President in carrying out the purposes of the act and also the purpose of section 402 of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended. There would also be created an Interdepartmental Peace Food Policy Committee to advise and consult with the Peace Food Administrator, and also a Peace Food Advisory Committee consisting of representatives of private U.S. groups and organizations.

The act would authorize:

Title I: A 5-year program of local currency sales of U.S. surplus agricultural commodities at a rate of $2 billion a year—as compared with $1½ billion a year under the present Public Law 480;

Title II: Continuation of title II of Public Law 480 to provide emergency assistance, through grants of surplus agricultural commodities, over a period of 5 years at a rate not exceeding $250 million a year, to friendly peoples in meeting famine or other emergency relief requirements; and grants of such commodities to assist friendly nations in establishing, expanding, or carrying out programs for the relief of chronic hunger and malnutrition;

Title III: Continuation of title III of Public Law 480, with minor changes, which provides for, first, use by Federal agencies in making payment for commodities not produced in the United States; second, barter of surplus agricultural commodities for strategic or other materials; third, grants to public and private agencies for use in the United States in nonprofit school lunch programs, nonprofit summer camps for children, charitable institutions (including hospitals), and assistance to needy persons; and, fourth, grants to nonprofit voluntary agencies for use in the assistance of needy persons outside the United States;

Title IV: A 10-year program of long-term supply contracts for U.S. surplus agricultural commodities with interest not to exceed 2½ percent per year, payment—in dollars, services, strategic or other materials—to be made over a period of 40 years from the date of the last delivery of commodities under the contracts and interest computed from the date of such last delivery;

Title V: Grants of surplus agricultural commodities over a period of 5 years to help food-deficit countries, under agreements, build up and maintain minimum national food reserves—in accordance with the U.S.-sponsored resolution adopted by the United Nations on February 20, 1957;

Title VI: Negotiation of agreements with friendly countries to establish in such countries binational, nonprofit foundations to foster and promote research, education, health and public welfare, and to grant to such foundations unexpended local currencies which accrue to the United States as repayments of principal or payment of interest on local currency loans heretofore made by the United States under Public Law 480 or made hereafter under the Food for Peace Act.

In addition to the foregoing, the Food for Peace Act would authorize a number of additions to the authorized uses, in addition to those in Public Law 480, for local currencies accruing from sales of surplus agricultural commodities under title I. Of these, five would permit the use of such currencies to buttress and extend social and economic development projects and activities of the United Nations Special Fund, the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization, the World Health Organization, the International Finance Corporation, and an International Development Loan Association if and when such may be established. Others would permit more effective use of such currencies in promoting international educational exchanges; research, educational development, and health and education; and technical assistance. On loans of local currencies for economic development, the act would specify a maximum interest rate of 2½ percent.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks, and that the press release issued by my office be also printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and press release will be printed in the RECORD, as requested.

The bill (S. 1711) to promote the foreign policy of the United States and help to build essential world conditions of peace, by the more effective use of U.S. agricultural commodities for the relief of human hunger, and for promoting economic and social development in less developed countries, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY for himself and other Senators, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Public Law 480 of the Eighty-third Congress, as amended, is further amended as follows:

(1) The first section (which provides the short title) is amended to read as follows:

"That this Act may be cited as 'The International Food for Peace Act of 1959'."

(2) Section 2 (which consists of a statement of policy) is amended to read as follows:

"CONGRESSIONAL FINDINGS AND POLICY

"SEC. 2. (a) Because of the increased productivity made possible by science and technology, there is now, for the first time in history, no reason in physical scarcity for the continued existence of hunger—anywhere on this earth. It is now possible and practical for mankind to take cooperative steps to abolish human hunger.

"This being so, massive hunger and suffering from want of clothing, existing in the world in the shadow of unused present and potential surpluses of food and fiber, are no longer tolerable, either morally, politically, or economically.

"The Congress, while recognizing the difficult international, political and economic problems that lie between hunger and want of clothing in many parts of the world and food and fiber surpluses in others, declares it to be the policy of the United States to move as rapidly as possible in cooperation with other friendly nations, toward putting its abundance of food and fiber more effectively in the service of human need.

"(b) Peoples who comprise one-third of the human race have in our generation achieved national independence (or are in the process of doing so) and are in revolt against the poverty, ignorance, disease, inferior status, and lack of opportunity which have always been their lot. They are determined to achieve that economic and social development necessary to national dignity and individual well-being. To mobilize their resources with reasonable speed and develop their economies to a point where they are self-propelled and self-sustaining they require substantial outside aid over a considerable period of years. If that aid is adequately forthcoming from the free world, they have a good chance to accomplish their purposes in freedom, remaining a part of the free world and contributing to its strength and well-being. If it is not forthcoming, their alternative is to seek it in the Communist world, and in the process to surrender both personal and national freedom. Deeply aware of and sympathetic with the aspirations of the world's peoples who seek in freedom greater national dignity and individual well-being, the Congress declares it to be the policy of the United States to help them achieve those aspirations. The Congress recognizes that for this purpose a number of different kinds of aid are required, but that among them food and fiber aid is a highly important form and one whose effectiveness can be greatly increased. The Congress declares that the agricultural abundance of the United States is not an embarrassment but a blessing to be used in the service of mankind, that it should be so used to the maximum extent possible, and that if it is so used it can help build essential conditions of world peace and freedom.

"(c) To achieve those larger purposes, the Congress directs that this Act shall be administered (1) so as to help other countries carry forward their own national or regional plans for development in freedom and independence; (2) so as to support the efforts and programs of the United Nations, its specialized agencies and affiliated organizations, and regional organizations of friendly countries, directed toward the same ends; (3) so as to leave wide latitude in working out details of national agreements and projects to United States Chiefs of Missions in negotiations with the governments concerned; and (4) so as to enlist the cooperation of other countries in putting agricultural surpluses more effectively in the service of human need and the economic and social development of less developed countries.

"(d) It is also declared to be the policy of Congress to expand international trade among the United States and friendly nations, to facilitate the convertibility of currency, to promote the economic stability of American agriculture, and the national welfare, to make maximum efficient use of surplus agricultural commodities in furtherance of the foreign policy of the United States, and to stimulate and facilitate the expansion of foreign trade in agricultural commodities produced in the United States by providing a means whereby surplus agricultural commodities in excess of the usual marketings of such commodities may be sold through private trade channels, and foreign currencies accepted in payment thereof. It is further the policy to use foreign currencies which accrue to the United States under this Act to expand international trade, to encourage economic development, to purchase strategic materials, to pay United States obligations abroad, to promote collective strength, and to foster in other ways the foreign policy of the United States."

(3) Section 101 (which relates to the negotiation of agreements) is amended by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (d), by changing the period at the end of paragraph (e) to a semicolon, and by adding at the end of such section the following new paragraphs:

"(f) seek, insofar as possible, to enter into such agreements for periods in excess of one year; and

"(g) give maximum attention to utilizing the authority and funds provided by this Act to further the economic and social development plans of underdeveloped countries."

(4) Section 103(b) (prescribing limit on appropriations) is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Agreements shall not be entered into under this title during the period beginning July 1, 1959, and ending June 30, 1964, which will call for appropriations to reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation, pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, in amounts in excess of $2,000,000,000 annually, plus any amount by which agreements entered into in prior years have called or will call for appropriations to reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation in amounts less than authorized for such prior fiscal years by this Act as in effect during such fiscal years."

(5) Section 103 is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) In carrying out programs and activities under this title, the President shall, insofar as possible, coordinate such programs and activities with other United States and international programs and activities directed toward the same end."

(6) Section 104(e) (relating to loans for trade expansion) is amended by striking out "Export-Import Bank for loans mutually agreeable to said bank" and inserting in lieu thereof "United States Development Loan Fund created by title II of chapter II of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended, for loans mutually agreeable to said Fund", and by inserting before the semicolon at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided further, That funds which have accrued under this section and which are uncommitted may at the discretion of the President, be placed under the administration of the Development Loan Fund".

(7) Section 104(g) (relating to the promotion of trade and economic development) is amended to read as follows:

"(g) For loans and grants to promote multilateral trade and economic development, made through established banking facilities of the friendly nation from which the foreign currency was obtained or in any other manner which the President may deem to be appropriate. Interest on loans made under this subsection shall be at such rate, not to exceed 2½ per centum per annum, as the President shall determine. Strategic materials, services, or foreign currencies may be accepted in payment of such loans;".

(8) Section 104(h) (relating to international educational exchange activities) is amended by striking out the words "in such amounts as may be specified from time to time in appropriation acts" and by striking out the semicolon at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a period and the following: "Such currencies may also be used for making grants to United States nonprofit organizations and institutions for carrying out such exchange of persons projects under this paragraph between the United States and other countries as may be agreed upon between such organizations and institutions and the Secretary of State, but not such grants shall be made to any organization or institution which does not agree to provide the dollar funds which the Secretary of State deems necessary to carry forward agreed projects to a successful conclusion;".

(9) Section 104(k) (relating to scientific activities) is amended by striking out "but no foreign currencies shall be used for the purposes of this subsection (k) unless specific appropriations be made therefor" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "and to promote and support programs of medical and scientific research, cultural and educational development, health, nutrition, and sanitation".

(10) Section 104(o) (relating to assistance to educational facilities sponsored by United States citizens) is amended by striking out so much thereof as follows the semicolon.

(11) Section 104 (relating to uses of foreign currencies) is amended by inserting after paragraph (o) the following new paragraphs:

"(p) For supporting workshops in American studies or American educational techniques, and supporting chairs in American studies.

"(q) For financing technicians and other personnel of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization and World Health Organization (including necessary equipment and supplies) engaged in (i) consulting and advising on, conducting, or administering Government programs designed to relieve chronic hunger and malnutrition, (ii) consulting and advising on programs for the storage, management, and operation of national food reserves, or (iii) training local technical, administrative, and other personnel needed to carry out such programs;

"(r) For financing research, surveys, conferences, publicity, and other activities which the President shall find to be helpful in support of the projected 'Free the World from Hunger' campaign of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization; and for such purposes and the purposes of paragraph (q) any currencies of any country available under this Act may be transferred to and used in any other country;

"(s) For financing local currency cost components of projects undertaken by the United Nations Special Fund for which such Fund pays foreign exchange costs;

"(t) For contributions, in addition to United States dollar contributions, to the capital fund of any international development association or organization of which the United States is a member which may be established as an affiliate of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development for the purpose of making long-term loans for economic development;

"(u) For financing the preparation, distribution, and exhibiting of audio-visual informational and educational materials, including Government materials, abroad;

"(v) For transfer to the International Finance Corporation for the purpose of promoting private investment abroad under such arrangement as may be agreed upon between the President, said Corporation, and the country whose currency is involved;

"(w) For financing the services of technicians, advisers, and administrators who are nationals of any friendly country, which may be needed to further economic and social development programs in other friendly countries;

"(x) For financing relief and rehabilitation projects undertaken following disasters or for assistance to refugees."

(12) Section 104 is further amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: "and from time to time release for the general purposes of this title funds that may have accrued in excess of prospective needs for payment of United States obligations".

(13) Section 106 (which relates to determination of nations with which agreements shall be negotiated) is amended by striking out the words "Secretary of Agriculture" where they appear the second time and inserting in lieu thereof "President".

(14) Section 107 (which defines "friendly nation") is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That such term shall not exclude any nation referred to in clause (2) if the President determines that the making and carrying out of agreements with such nation under this Act will be in the interest of attaining the foreign-policy objectives of the United States".

(15) Section 109 (which relates to the duration of the program under title I) is amended by striking out "December 31, 1959" and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1964".

(16) Section 202 (authorizing grants of surplus commodities for famine relief) is amended by striking out "with friendly governments or through voluntary agencies" and inserting in lieu thereof "by or with friendly governments or voluntary relief agencies to carry out the purposes of section 201 and to assist friendly nations in establishing, expanding, or carrying out programs, including programs undertaken with the assistance of experts and technicians of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization, and the World Health Organization for the relief of chronic hunger and malnutrition".

(17) Section 203 (which imposes limits on expenditures under title II) is amended by striking out the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Not more than $250,000,000, including the Corporation's investment in the commodities, shall be expanded annually for all such transfers and for other costs authorized by this title."

(18) Section 204 (which relates to the duration of the program under title II) is amended by striking out "December 31, 1959" and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1964".

(19) Section 304(b) (which prohibits certain transactions with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and areas dominated or controlled by the Communist regime in China) is amended by striking out "title I or title III" and inserting in lieu thereof "title I, title III, title IV, title V, or title VI".

(20) Title III is further amended by adding at the end thereof a new section as follows:

"SEC. 306. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Commodity Credit Corporation is hereby directed—

"(1) to dispose of its stocks of edible oils or products thereof by donation, upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of Agriculture deems appropriate, to nonprofit voluntary agencies registered with the Department of State, appropriate agencies of the Federal Government or international organizations, for use in the assistance of needy persons outside the United States;

"(2) to purchase for donation as provided above such quantities of edible oils and the products thereof as the Secretary determines will maintain the support level for cottonseed and soybeans without requiring the acquisition of such commodities under the price support program.

Commodity Credit Corporation may incur such additional costs with respect to commodities to be donated hereunder as it is authorized to incur with respect to food commodities disposed of under section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949, and may pay ocean freight charges from United States ports to designated ports of entry abroad."

(21) Such Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new titles:

"TITLE IV—LONG TERM SUPPLY CONTRACTS

"SEC. 401. The purpose of this title is to utilize agricultural commodities and the products thereof produced in the United States, including but not limited to agricultural commodities in surplus supply, to assist the economic development of friendly nations by assuring such nations a stable supply of agricultural commodities on long-term credit for domestic consumption during periods of economic development so that the resources and manpower of such nations may be utilized more effectively for industrial and other domestic economic development without jeopardizing meanwhile adequate supplies of agricultural commodities for domestic use.

"SEC. 402. In furtherance of this purpose, the President is authorized to enter into agreements with friendly nations under the terms of which the United States shall undertake to deliver annually (a) certain quantities of wheat, rice, cotton, feed grains, or tobacco, or (b) such other surplus agricultural commodities as may from time to time be available, for periods of not to exceed ten years.

"SEC. 403. Payment for such commodities shall be in dollars or in services or in strategic or other materials of which the United States does not domestically produce its requirements, as the President may from time to time determine, with interest at such rate as the President may determine but not more than 2½ per centum per year. Payment may be made in approximately equal annual amounts over periods of not to exceed forty years from the date of the last delivery of commodities under the agreement and interest shall be computed from the date of such last delivery.

"SEC. 404. Any such agreement shall include the following undertakings on the part of the purchasing nation as conditions of such contract:

"(1) That commodities provided hereunder will not replace any usual imports of the same or similar commodities by such nation from friendly nations;

"(2) That commodities provided hereunder will be used only for domestic consumption and that none of such commodities will be sold outside the purchasing nation either directly or through replacement of domestic production.

"SEC. 405. In entering into such agreements, the President shall endeavor to reach agreement with other exporting nations of such commodities for their participation in the supply and assistance program herein authorized on a proportionate and equitable basis.

"SEC. 406. In carrying out this title, the provisions of sections 101, 102, 103(a), 106, 107, and 108 of this Act shall be applicable to the extent not inconsistent with this title.

"TITLE V—NATIONAL FOOD RESERVES

"SEC. 501. The President is authorized to implement the resolution adopted by the United Nations on February 20, 1957 (United Nations Resolution 1025 [XI]), which was sponsored by the United States, calling for international cooperation in the establishment of national food reserves by making transfers of surplus agricultural commodities for the purpose of establishing such reserves. The Commodity Credit Corporation shall make available to the President out of its stocks such agricultural commodities as he may request for this purpose.

"SEC. 502. In making transfers under this title, the President may provide for delivery f.o.b. vessels in United States ports and, upon a determination by the President that it is necessary to accomplish the purposes of such resolution, for the payment of ocean freight charges from United States ports to designated ports of entry abroad, and for furnishing of technical and other assistance in providing storage facilities for the food reserves so established.

"SEC. 503. (a) No assistance under this title shall be furnished to any nation or organization of nations unless such nation or organization agrees—

"(1) to use the commodities furnished under this title to establish national food reserves;

"(2) to maintain the food reserves so established at agreed levels;

"(3) to consult with and utilize the services of experts and technicians of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization with respect to technical problems of storage, management, and operation of national food reserves;

"(4) to maintain and operate such reserves in such manner that they will not interfere with normal commercial trade of the United States or other friendly nations.

"(b) The President is authorized to make transfers of commodities under title II wherever necessary to replenish reserves which are depleted as a result of famine or other urgent or extraordinary relief requirements.

"SEC. 504. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this title. Sums appropriated for such purpose shall be available to reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation for the Corporation's investment in commodities transferred hereunder and for all costs referred to in section 103 (a).

"SEC. 505. No grants or other assistance shall be furnished under this title after June 30, 1964.

"TITLE VI—BINATIONAL FOUNDATIONS

"SEC. 601. (a) The President is authorized to negotiate and carry out agreements with friendly nations to provide for the establishment in such countries of nonprofit foundations to foster and promote research, education, health, and public welfare.

"(b) A foundation established under this title shall be under the direction of a board of trustees consisting of—

"(1) a number, to be determined by the agreement between the United States and the country in which the foundation is located, of the nationals of such country appointed by the Government thereof;

"(2) an equal number of nationals of the United States (one of whom shall be the chief of the United States diplomatic mission to such country) appointed by the President; and

"(3) one member, who shall be chairman, who shall be appointed by the Government of such country with the approval of a majority of the members appointed as provided in clauses (1) and (2).

Members of a board of trustees shall serve at the pleasure of the appointing authority, and vacancies shall be filled in the same manner as in the case of the original appointments.

"SEC. 602. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 1415 of the Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1953, or any other provision of law, the President is authorized to grant to any foundation established under this title for use in carrying out the purposes specified in section 601(a) any unexpended local currencies which accrue to the United States, as repayments of principal or payment of interest on loans heretofore or hereafter made by the United States under section 104. Any such currencies may be used for direct expenditure, or may be invested and the proceeds used, for carrying out this title.

"TITLE VII—ADMINISTRATION

"SEC. 701. (a) There is hereby established in the Executive Office of the President an agency to be known as the Peace Food Administration, which shall be headed by a Peace Food Administrator appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Peace Food Administrator shall serve at the pleasure of the President and shall receive compensation at the rate of $21,000 per annum.

"(b) (1) The President shall carry out the functions conferred upon him by this Act and section 402 of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended, either directly or through the Peace Food Administrator.

"(2) The President is authorized to transfer to the Peace Food Administrator the functions of any other agency which he determines are related to the functions of, and can be more effectively or economically carried out by, the Peace Food Administrator, together with any personnel or property used primarily in carrying out such functions.

"(c) The Peace Food Administrator is authorized to make such expenditures and appoint and fix the compensation of such personnel as may be necessary to enable him to carry out his functions.

"SEC. 702. (a) There is hereby established a Peace Food Policy Committee which shall consist of an Assistant Secretary, or officer of comparable level, of each of the following departments or agencies: Departments of State, Treasury, Agriculture, Commerce, Health, Education, and Welfare, and the International Cooperation Administration.

"(b) It shall be the duty of the Peace Food Policy Committee to advise and consult with the Peace Food Administrator concerning the administration of this Act. The Committee shall meet from time to time upon request of the Peace Food Administrator and at such other times as it may deem necessary.

"SEC. 703. (a) There is hereby established a Peace Food Advisory Committee which shall consist of representatives of the following and such other groups as the President deems advisable who shall be appointed by the President for terms of two years:

"(1) the major agricultural organizations;

"(2) exporters of food and fiber;

"(3) voluntary agencies such as CARE and church groups;

"(4) educational groups; and

"(5) voluntary health groups.

"(b) It shall be the duty of the Peace Food Advisory Committee to advise and consult with the Peace Food Administrator, and to make such recommendations as it deems advisable, concerning the administration of this Act. The Committee shall meet from time to time upon request of the Peace Food Administrator and at such other times as it may deem necessary. In carrying out its duties under this Act, the Committee shall invite a representative of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization to meet with the Committee in order that, through him, the views of other exporting countries might be heard and their interests taken into account.

"(c) Members of the Advisory Committee shall be entitled, while attending meetings of the Committee, to receive compensation at the rate of $50 per diem, and while away from their homes or regular places of business they may be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by law for persons in the Government service employed intermittently.

"SEC. 704. In negotiating agreements under this Act, the President shall give due consideration to the internal and external political and economic conditions of the countries concerned by drawing upon the appropriate title or titles of this Act in such manner as to carry out more effectively the policy set forth in section 2."

The press release presented by Mr. HUMPHREY is as follows:

SENATOR HUMPHREY PRESENTS CONGRESS WITH BOLD FOOD FOR PEACE PROGRAM

Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, Democrat, of Minnesota, today introduced in the Congress the International Food for Peace Act of 1959, outlining a 5-year program of making wiser use of our agricultural abundance as an effective arm of building conditions for peace in the world.

Cosponsoring the measure with Senator HUMPHREY were: Senators JOHN A. CARROLL, Democrat, of Colorado; PHILIP A. HART, Democrat, of Michigan; JOHN F. KENNEDY, Democrat, of Massachusetts; EUGENE J. MCCARTHY, Democrat, of Minnesota; GALE W. MCGEE, Democrat, of Wyoming; A. S. MIKE MONRONEY, Democrat, of Oklahoma; WAYNE MORSE, Democrat, of Oregon; JAMES E. MURRAY, Democrat, of Montana; and WILLIAM PROXMIRE, Democrat, of Wisconsin.

Senator HUMPHREY declared that the "challenge posed by our unprecedented wealth in a world three-fourths needy and no longer willing to remain so" was one of the "most pressing of the long-range challenges confronting the American people."

"This contrast is most dramatic and immediate in the paradox of leapfrogging food overabundance at home and leapfrogging hungry populations abroad," he declared.

"How absurd if surpluses of vitally needed commodities become minuses in America's ledger—for to have too much and not share is surely far worse, in conscience and practice, than to have too little to begin with.

"Common sense and common decency combine to tell us to use our famed know-how and our vast national energies to work out some way in which our food fortune can become the blessing of all people, and not a symbol of selfishness to God's children elsewhere.

"The whole ethical sweep of our traditions and the imaginative resourcefulness of our ancestors cry out the senselessness of any posture that makes food seem a curse in the midst of want.

"It is in this spirit that we propose today a program which should help to make clear the concern of Americans for all human beings, and the eagerness of Americans to share their food fortune as a contribution toward the removal of privation and inequity from our midst and in our time," Senator HUMPHREY explained.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Food for Peace bill lie on the desk through Wednesday of next week, in order to permit other Senators who may wish to join in sponsoring it to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HUMPHREY subsequently said: Mr. President, earlier today, on behalf of myself and a number of other Senators, I introduced for appropriate reference a bill which I believe is far reaching in its scope and purpose and is constructive in its effect.

I speak today concerning one of the most pressing of the long-range challenges confronting the American people; the challenge posed by our unprecedented wealth in a world three-fourths needy and no longer willing to remain so.

This contrast is most dramatic and immediate in the paradox of leapfrogging food overabundance at home in the United States and leapfrogging hungry populations abroad.

How absurd if surpluses of vitally needed commodities become minuses in America's ledger, for to have too much and not share is surely far worse, in conscience and in practice, than to have too little to begin with.

Thus, common sense and common decency combine to tell us to use our famed know-how and our vast national energies to devise ways in which our good fortunes can become the blessing of all people, and not a symbol of selfishness to God's children elsewhere.

The whole ethical sweep of our traditions and the imaginative resourcefulness of our ancestors cry out the senselessness of any posture which makes food seem a curse in the midst of want.

It is, then, in this spirit that we propose today a program which I have called Food for Peace, and which should help to make clear the concern of Americans for all human beings, and the eagerness of Americans to share their good fortune as a contribution toward the removal of privation and inequity from our midst and in our time.

Mr. President, the bill I have introduced for myself and a group of cosponsors is designed to promote the foreign policy of the United States and to help to build essential world conditions of peace, by the more effective use of U.S. agricultural commodities for the relief of human hunger, and for promoting economic and social development in less developed countries.

The bill I have introduced is termed the International Food for Peace Act of 1959. Earlier I had asked permission to have printed in the RECORD a description of the bill, a summary of the bill, and the full text of the bill.

It is a revision, expansion, and extension of Public Law 480—redirecting it more along the lines many of us always intended it to go in the first place.

It is not a hastily designed program. It is the outgrowth of long study and careful research.

I myself have been studying this particular proposal for more than 4 years. It has been my privilege to conduct extensive hearings for at least 2 years in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and for at least 5 years in the Committee on Foreign Relations to conduct hearings and to engage in a discussion and a study of the program known as Public Law 480, which relates to the use of American food and fiber for overseas purposes. Therefore, I feel a rather intimate acquaintance with the food resources of the country and the programing as to their use in our international relations.

"Food for Peace" is not merely a slogan. For the last 4 years I have been devoting much time to studying this concept of using our abundance more wisely as a tool of international policy and international friendship. I have studied the impact overseas, and I have studied the administration of the program here at home.

I have not confined myself to my own observations, but instead have availed myself of the judgment and recommendations of all groups studying this program, as I shall indicate later in these remarks.

A year ago last December, I publicly proposed a broader U.S. Food for Peace program, and suggested that we needed a Peace Food Administrator to make it effective. Ever since then, I have been working out detailed improvements in the Public Law 480 program designed toward that end. Late last fall, after further study and observations abroad, I announced that such a program would be introduced in the 86th Congress.

I traveled into several of the countries of the Near East, southern Europe, and north Africa, studying the use and the application of this program. I did the same thing within the past year in countries in eastern Europe and western Europe. I believe that I, as one Member of the Senate, have attempted to inform myself of the possibilities of the use of food and fiber. In my opinion, more time must be given and a more sincere effort made in an attempt to find the proper methods for more constructive uses of food and fiber.

I was pleased that the President, in his state of the Union message, indicated agreement with my Food for Peace objective; and I was, of course, honored that he had borrowed and used the same terminology. Regrettably, I have seen little evidence since then from the administration of more than lipservice to the objective. They have proposed no program. They have merely called another conference.

As beneficial as that conference may be, we need action—and we have had sufficient time, trial, and study to provide for that action.

That is what I now propose, through combining the best judgments I could obtain from inside and outside the administration.

Before outlining my new proposals, let me review briefly the development and history of what is commonly known today, for the lack of a better name, as Public Law 480.

Five years ago Congress passed and the President signed the original law, otherwise known as the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954. This law launched the United States upon a course of using American agricultural surpluses for constructive and humanitarian purposes at home and abroad. The law authorized the donation of surplus agricultural commodities to Federal, State, and private agencies for welfare purposes in the United States; it authorized their donation for famine and disaster relief and for welfare purposes abroad; and it authorized their sale to foreign countries for local currencies and their barter for strategic materials. Finally, it authorized the use of the local currencies accruing from Public Law 480 sales abroad for a wide variety of constructive purposes, including the payment of U.S. obligations, the promotion of collective strength, and, most importantly, for loans to and in the countries concerned for economic development.

In the 4½ years which ended last December 31, the programing of surplus agricultural commodities under the three titles of Public Law 480 had reached more than $7½ billion, according to an estimate by the Commodity Credit Corporation.

More than three-fifths of these surplus agricultural commodities valued at a Commodity Credit Corporation cost of more than $4½ billions was sold abroad for local currencies to countries which could not otherwise have bought them, to meet the needs of their people; 6½ percent, valued at nearly half a billion dollars, was donated to foreign governments abroad, for famine and other emergency assistance; 19 percent, valued at nearly $1½ billion, was donated for foreign and domestic relief, through nonprofit voluntary agencies and intergovernmental organizations; and 13 percent, valued at nearly $1 billion, was bartered abroad for strategic materials needed by the United States.

Mr. President, I wish to make it clear that although the total sum of money involved in the past 4½ years—until December 31, 1958—had reached $7,500 million, at the estimated Commodity Credit Corporation cost, that amount also included the storage cost of the materials held by the Commodity Credit Corporation, and it also included the cost of making substantial amounts of those goods available, as I have indicated, for relief and famine-relief purposes. The important point is that $4,500 million worth of those goods was sold, and our country thus obtained currency which it is able to use constructively for its own purposes. That is what I mean when I refer to changing food into money or changing food into economics.

Furthermore, Mr. President, more than $1 billion worth of the food was bartered abroad for strategic materials, which do not waste or spoil—strategic materials which were required for the strategic stockpiles in our country. So, many times, we actually converted grain into platinum, or grain into diamonds, or grain into strategic ores which were in short supply in our country.

Here is the beginning of a program which truly makes sense, a program to convert the abundance of our farms and the abundance and the productivity of our soil into economic power for our Nation and into uses based on neighborly compassion and humanitarianism on the part of our Nation, and to convert the production of our farms into strategic minerals which are needed by our country, or to convert the production of our farms into currency for the use of our country.

I seek to do even better. The proposal we have before us is designed to profit from this limited experience, to broaden the scope of the program, to enlarge the activities which are permissible under the program, and to put the program on a long-term basis, so that never again shall we hear people complain about such use of one of the bountiful blessings of a divine providence, namely, the abundance of food which we have enjoyed.

Sometimes I wonder what has come over this Nation, that some persons should complain of a God-given gift—namely, food—which is so greatly needed to alleviate hunger and suffering and sickness, or that there should be any hesitation to use this food in ways which will be of help not only to the foreign policy of our country—a use which in itself is most commendable—and not only for the economic development of our Nation and other nations, but also to feed the sick and the hungry and to help the unfortunate. If the purpose of what we seek is thoroughly understood, I believe that every person in the United States will support this endeavor.

Mr. President, it is impossible even to imagine the vast good that has been accomplished under Public Law 480, in terms of relieving basic human want and in helping the less developed countries build up their economies for the satisfaction of the needs of their people. I repeat that the American people have reason to thank God for the great abundance of their soil, and to find deep satisfaction in the knowledge that it is being used for such worthy purposes.

Public Law 480 was first passed, as I have said, in 1954, and each year since it has been renewed, with amendments which have widened its scope. The authority of its titles I and II expires on October 31 of this year. If the most important and valuable features of the Public Law 480 programs are to continue beyond this year, the law must be extended at this session of Congress.

Perhaps to some the motives and the needs behind the passage of the original Public Law 480 were mixed, to say the least; and the same can be said for its annual repassages. For this, no apology whatever is called for.

Agricultural surpluses in the hands of the Commodity Credit Corporation have mounted to very large proportions, and have exercised a depressing effect on domestic farm prices, and have resulted in heavy cash outlays for storage—in fact, about $1 billion a year for storage. What I am suggesting is that we no longer spend the $1 billion a year for storage, but that we spend it to make the food available for use for the benefit of humanity and for the benefit of progress, peace, and justice. I venture to say that not one Member of Congress could justify before his constituents choosing to store food, at an annual cost of $1 billion, and complaining about that, instead of using the food—at the same cost in money—to feed the sick and the hungry and to build a more just society.

We in this country had, therefore, and we still have—a definite, practical, dollar-and-cent interest in protecting our own farm prices and in reducing the amounts of surplus agricultural commodities we hold in storage.

But, as I am sure you agree, Mr. President, this does not cast an unfavorable shadow upon the generosity, the human concern, and the profound wisdom of using these surpluses under Public Law 480 to satisfy human need and to help build an economic foundation for greater peace and security in the world.

The important and the really significant point is that, with the support of the American people, Congress has taken steps toward resolving one of the strangest paradoxes in human history: namely, the existence of hunger, want, and hopelessness in the world, alongside a great volume of existing and potential surpluses of food and fiber which can be used to help meet these needs.

If in the early years of Public Law 480 the motive of self-interest predominated—and I think we might agree that too often it did—it was because there was so little precedent for the use of agricultural surpluses, otherwise than as famine and disaster relief, for constructive purposes. We did not have the experience; it had to be gained. We did not have the techniques; they had to be developed. We did not fully know the potentialities; they had to be learned. Not all had the vision that was needed.

Few there are, I daresay, who in 1954 ventured to think with us that the Public Law 480 program could grow as it has grown in 4½ years, that distant hunger and need could have been found and administered to without interfering with normal U.S. exports or with the normal exports of other countries. Few dared to think that surplus food and fiber, and the local currencies accruing from their sale, would in a few years become a major instrument for promoting economic development abroad, for building conditions conducive to peace, and, thus, for undergirding the foreign policy of the United States.

We have learned much of the potentialities of this instrument; and, as I shall point out in a few minutes, there are many things we should do now, so as to revise Public Law 480 in order to be able to realize its full potential.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. COOPER. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator's speech. But I should like to make a brief comment on his remarks.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am delighted to have the Senator from Kentucky do so; he always has worthwhile things to say. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I thank my colleague.

Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota is making a very important speech. When Members of the Senate speak on the floor of the Senate on some more controversial aspect of our foreign policy, or our aid program, such speeches attract widespread attention, and attract support or, sometimes, attract opposition. I think the Senator from Minnesota is now discussing one of the most important parts of our aid program, and one of the most important instruments of our foreign policy.

We attach great importance to military programs and economic aid for the industrialization of other nations. But the Senator is talking about a food program—something the United States can do that no other country can, and when he says that food assists the economic growth of newly dependent countries and developing countries he is correct. The first need of all such countries is food and we have the surplus food.

Second, as the Senator has so clearly pointed out, our provision of surplus foods for counterpart funds, enables the governments of other countries to sell the food to their own people, and thus obtain a source of revenue which can be used internally for the industrial development of their countries.

The program has another value. As those countries begin to be industrially developed, the first increases of their workers' earnings go into food and fiber. As a result, the danger of inflation is presented. Additional amounts of food from our country help reduce inflationary pressures, and save for their people their small increases in earnings.

The Senator is correct in saying that the ability of the United States to furnish food to other nations when no other country can do so is a potent instrument of our foreign policy. Russia cannot supply food; the United States can.

Despite all the practical reasons—reasons of policy and reasons of self-interest, I am glad the Senator has pointed out that our willingness to supply our surplus food to the needy peoples of other countries is the best expression of the moral and spiritual interest and heart of the people and Government of our country. I hope I shall have the opportunity to study the bill of the Senator, and hope I may be able to join him in sponsoring it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the distinguished Senator from Kentucky. Nothing would be more gratifying to the senior Senator from Minnesota than to have the cosponsorship of this measure by the Senator from Kentucky; and nothing is more pleasing to me than his words of helpfulness, consideration, and praise.

Mr. COOPER. I have attended many hearings at which the Senator from Minnesota has testified, not this year, but in 1958 and in 1957. I know that at least in those years the Senator from Minnesota consistently pressed the argument which he is making on the floor of the Senate today.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from Kentucky. With his usual modesty, he has failed to tell us that he was Ambassador to India, and saw what food can mean in terms of international policy, and also saw what the lack of it can mean in terms of international disaster.

The advice and counsel of the Senator from Kentucky now, as was true in the days when he appeared before our committees to speak in behalf of the use of our food abundance, is always helpful and always most welcome.

Mr. President, as was indicated by the Senator from Kentucky, 2 years ago the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry [Mr. ELLENDER] assigned me to make a study, on behalf of the committee, of operations under Public Law 480. The law had been in effect for 3 years, and the committee wished to know what had been accomplished, what more could be accomplished, and what changes, if any, were needed in the law. The study continued throughout most of a year, and included testimony from 71 witnesses taken in 10 days of hearings during June and July of 1957. I then submitted a report to the chairman in February of 1958. Many of the things which I shall say here, and many of the changes in the law which I shall propose today, are the direct outcome of that careful study.

I should like to say that in making our investigation we had the benefit of an excellent previous study, entitled, "Agricultural Surplus Disposal and Foreign Aid," prepared by the National Planning Association, at the request of the Special Senate Committee To Study the Foreign Aid Program, and printed as a committee document in March 1957.

It is a document of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate.

Since the completion of my report, two other studies of significance have been made. One is a survey of Public Law 480 operations in six countries made last year by a team of experts, under the guidance and direction of Dr. John H. Davis, then of the Department of Agriculture. This summary report and his memorandum, entitled "Policy Considerations Pertaining to Public Law 480," have been made public by the State Department.

Another study, to which I call attention, was made last year by a team of American businessmen appointed by Mr. James H. Smith, Jr., then Director of the International Cooperation Administration, to make a survey of the accumulation and administration of local currencies. The results of their inquiry, which included extensive field investigation, were submitted to the Director of the International Cooperation Administration on August 5, 1958.

I mention these various studies in order to suggest that Public Law 480 operations have been carefully investigated; that in each of the reports I have mentioned recommendations were made for changes both in the law and in its administration. Insofar as these studies deal with the same aspects of the program, they are, with one or two notable exceptions, in general agreement as to what changes are needed.

The overwhelming testimony of virtually all who have investigated or have been associated with Public Law 480 operations is resoundingly positive. The program has advanced the foreign policy objectives of the United States. The existing defects and inadequacies in the law and its administration can be corrected, with the result that its contribution to our foreign policy objectives can be greatly strengthened.

I wish to add that all the reports to which I have referred have been studied by the cosponsors of this bill for the past 6 or 7 months. Since last summer I and members of my staff have been working on this proposal, and we have had the advice and counsel of prominent economists, persons who are experts in foreign trade matters, who have studied most meticulously and carefully the operations of Public Law 480.

The bill which I have introduced today, on behalf of myself and other Senators, was the product as was indicated earlier not only of months, but of years of study.

The National Planning Association, in the report to which I referred a moment ago, concluded that "our disposal programs have proved useful, and should be continued with certain changes and modifications." The association described our agricultural surpluses, as "an asset of unique value which can be used with increasing effectiveness in the achievement of our general foreign policies if only we recognize more fully the real contribution they can make."

Dr. John H. Davis reported, on the basis of extensive investigation at home and abroad, that: "Public Law 480 was approved in general by all persons interviewed, both American and foreign. It contributes to economic development. It is of political value to governments. Difficulties or objections reported were not associated with a wish to end Public Law 480, but to improve it."

Dr. Davis is a truly eminent public servant who has worked for the Federal Government on several occasions, both in the Department of State and in the Department of Agriculture. He is one of the most highly respected of the experts who have given of their time and talent to our country.

Mr. Davis also stated:

> Four years' experience in Public Law 480 operations has demonstrated that U.S. food and fiber can be used as a positive force in international relations. Of necessity, Public Law 480 operations thus far have been experimental in nature—

I repeat the words "experimental in nature"— > because little precedent existed to serve as a guide. As would be expected under such circumstance, the program that has evolved has both strong points and weaknesses.

> Those responsible for the operations deserve much credit for having made the program as good as it is. The strong points predominate. Nevertheless, the prospect of continuing a large Public Law 480 type program for another 5 years or more makes it important that the U.S. Government remedy the weak points in Public Law 480 operations. To do this, these operations must be reconciled and synchronized with overall agricultural and foreign policies.

Mr. Robert L. Berenson, Mr. William M. Bristol, and Mr. Ralph I. Strauss concluded in their report to the Director of the International Cooperation Administration that Public Law 480 is a valuable tool in fighting the cold war and in assisting our friends and the uncommitted nations, but that it would be even more valuable if needed modifications were made.

I wish to underscore what these three distinguished men have said, namely, that Public Law 480 could be even more valuable if needed modifications were made. This is the conclusion of all persons and groups who have studied the operation of Public Law 480.

Mr. President, the changes, modifications and adjustments proposed in the bill known as the international Food for Peace Act are the modifications and the changes which have been recommended by those who have studied the operations of this program in an objective and unbiased manner.

In my report to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry it is stated that Public Law 480 "is a valuable instrument of our foreign economic policy, contributing significantly to our foreign policy objectives and making more effective use of an abundant American resource as a force for freedom."

The report also analyzes in detail the changes needed to make it more effective.

A number of amendments have been added to Public Law 480 in its several passages through the Congress, most of them concerning the use of local currencies accruing from sales of agricultural commodities under title I. Also, several amendments have been designed to bring about remedies for a few of the many glaring deficiencies and inadequacies in the administration of the law. However, at no time since its original passage has the Congress taken full account of the many proposals for changes and extensions growing out of experience in operations and out of changing world needs, or made any comprehensive effort to require that in administering the law the Executive shall carry out the true intent of Congress.

The time has now come—after 5 years of Public Law 480 operations—for strengthening the program by correcting its deficiencies and inadequacies. That is the purpose of the "Food for Peace Act" which I today submit for the serious consideration of the Senate—and I trust for affirmative action.

SPIRIT AND PURPOSE OF PROPOSED LAW

The first and by far the most important thing we should seek to do in revising Public Law 480 and transforming it into a Food for Peace Act is to make clear, emphatically, precisely, and beyond all question, the overriding purposes of the act, for virtually all the past shortcomings of Public Law 480 operations have proceeded from differing and conflicting conceptions as to what those purposes are.

Let us get to the heart of the matter. Are we carrying on a surplus disposal program, or are we carrying on a program for using U.S. agricultural surpluses positively and constructively in the world for the relief of human hunger, for promoting economic and social development in less developed countries, and for serving the foreign policy of the United States by helping to build essential world conditions of peace?

Surplus disposal. To use the term is to insult that half of the people of the world who live in hunger, hopelessness, and despair. America's abundance of food and fiber is a God-given blessing, a tremendous asset to be used to build life and hope, and happiness, a powerful potential asset in the world's struggle for peace and freedom. Yet, the President's top policy committee which coordinates Public Law 480 operations is called the Interagency Committee on Agricultural Surplus Disposal, and there is also an Interagency Staff Committee on Surplus Disposal.

The use of the term itself suggests a great deal of what is wrong with the operations under Public Law 480. It is evidence of the negative attitudes of too many of our public officials who have persistently downgraded the worth of our great food resources and thereby cheapened the spirit behind our willingness to share our abundance. Such attitudes have weakened our bargaining power in negotiating agreements, have generated irritation and ill will in the very countries that need help, and have tended to make the American farmer an object of charity rather than honor him as a producer of wealth at home and abroad. There has been too much of apology and not enough of gratitude on the part of our own officials for our agricultural bounty; and this has contributed in a most important manner to the lack of public appreciation at home and abroad of the tremendous contribution American agriculture is making and can make toward peace and freedom.

The negative attitude of surplus disposal, existing in far too many of our Government offices, is basically responsible for chaotic Public Law 480 administration machinery and procedures; it is basically responsible for the long delays, the irritation, and the ill will which too often attend, quite unnecessarily, the negotiation and carrying out of agreements; and it limits and cancels out far too much of the good that could otherwise be accomplished.

I do not desire to be ungenerous in this matter. It is possible to understand the origins of these negative attitudes without approving of their persistence. There are some who have no patience or true interest in Public Law 480 operations because they disapprove of Government acquisition of agricultural surpluses, and others because they disapprove of surpluses per se and seek to cut back production. I do not propose to challenge their views on surpluses today. It is enough to say now that large surpluses do exist; that the Government has been acquiring large surplus stocks, and that it is likely to continue to acquire them in the future.

We are faced with a fact, not a theory, and, this being the case, it would seem to be incumbent upon all reasonable men to see to it that surplus stocks are used in the most effective and constructive ways possible to further American foreign policy.

Negative attitudes on the part of some persons result more from inattention and thoughtlessness than from design. As I have already indicated, the original Public Law 480 was probably supported by more Members of Congress who conceived of it as surplus disposal than by Members who understood fully its constructive potentialities. But at that time we did not know what we since have learned, namely, that our agricultural surpluses are a powerful instrument for promoting welfare, peace, and freedom on a world scale. Year after year I have seen attitudes change on the Hill. Year after year we have improved and widened and extended Public Law 480, with growing comprehension of its possibilities. Year after year we have tried to convey our growing comprehension to the executive branch, as well as our sense of frustration over its failure to push ahead to realize that potential and administer Public Law 480 with boldness and imagination.

We have made some progress, but we have not made enough.

For these reasons, I am proposing that the revised Public Law 480 be known as the Food for Peace Act; that its statement of purposes be expressed in terms that none can misunderstand, and that that statement be amplified in a preamble which I have included.

I propose a preamble reading as follows:

PREAMBLE

(a) A new fact of history of which full account must now be taken is that because of the increased productivity made possible by science and technology, there is no reason of physical scarcity for the continued existence of hunger—anywhere on this earth. It is now possible and practicable for mankind to take cooperative steps to abolish human hunger.

This being so, massive hunger and suffering from want of clothing, existing in the world in the shadow of unused present and potential surpluses of food and fiber, are no longer tolerable, morally, or politically, or economically.

The Congress, while recognizing the difficult political and economic problems that lie between hunger and want of clothing in many parts of the world and food and fiber surpluses in others, declares it to be the policy of the United States to move as rapidly as possible in cooperation with other friendly nations, toward putting surpluses of food and fiber more effectively in the service of human need.

(b) A second new fact of history of which full account must be taken is that peoples who comprise one-third of the human race have in our generation achieved national independence (or are in the process of doing so) and now, free of outside control, whether colonial or imperialist or Communist, are in full revolt against the poverty, ignorance, disease, inferior status, and lack of opportunity which have always been their lot. They are determined to achieve rapidly that economic and social development necessary to national dignity and individual well-being. To mobilize their resources with reasonable speed and develop their economies to a point where they are self-propelled and self-sustaining they require substantial outside aid over a considerable period of years. If that aid is adequately forthcoming from the free world, they have a good chance to accomplish their purposes in freedom, remaining a part of the free world and contributing to its strength and well-being. If it is not forthcoming, their alternative is to seek it in the Communist world, and in the process to surrender both personal and national freedom and to weaken the free world.

(c) Deeply aware of and sympathetic with the aspirations of the world's peoples who seek in freedom greater national dignity and individual well-being, the Congress declares it to be the policy of the United States to help them achieve these aspirations through rapid economic and social development. The Congress recognizes that for this purpose a number of different kinds of aid are required, but that among them food and fiber aid, through grant or through sale for local currencies, a portion of the local currencies being, in turn, loaned or granted as development aid, is a highly important form and one whose effectiveness can be greatly increased. The Congress declares that the agricultural abundance of the United States is not an embarrassment but a blessing to be used in the service of mankind, that it should be so used to the maximum extent possible, and that if it is so used it can help build essential conditions of world peace and freedom.

(d) To achieve these larger purposes, the Congress directs that this act shall be administered (1) so as to help other countries carry forward their own national or regional plans for development in freedom and independence; (2) so as to support the efforts and programs of the United Nations, its specialized agencies and affiliated organizations, and regional organizations of friendly countries, directed toward the same ends; (3) so as to leave wide latitude in working out details of national agreements and projects to U.S. chiefs of missions in negotiations with the governments concerned; (4) so as to enlist the cooperation of other countries in putting agricultural surpluses more effectively in the service of human need and the economic and social development of less developed countries.

(e) It is also declared to be the policy of the Congress to expand international trade among the United States and friendly nations, to facilitate the convertibility of currency, to promote the economic stability of American agriculture, and the national welfare, to make maximum efficient use of surplus agricultural commodities in furtherance of the foreign policy of the United States, and to stimulate and facilitate the expansion of foreign trade in agricultural commodities produced in the United States by providing a means whereby surplus agricultural commodities in excess of the usual marketings of such commodities may be sold through private trade channels, and foreign currencies accepted in payment thereof. It is further the policy to use foreign currencies which accrue to the United States under this act to expand international trade, to encourage economic development, to purchase strategic materials, to pay U.S. obligations abroad, to promote collective strength, and to foster in other ways the foreign policy of the United States.

SCOPE AND DURATION OF FOOD FOR PEACE ACT

The original Public Law 480 passed in 1954 was a 1-year authorization which, even among its supporters in Congress, was widely considered to be a means of dealing with temporary surplus stocks held by the Commodity Credit Corporation. And without effective challenge to that assumption, it has been reenacted each year on an annual basis.

Meanwhile, several things have been happening:

First. Our agricultural surpluses have not been decreasing, but increasing.

Second. We are comprehending more fully the fantastic productive potentialities of American agriculture due to the increasing application of science and technology.

Third. The morality of cutting back production arbitrarily while half the world suffers from the misery of hunger has come increasingly into question. More and more the American farmer and the American people as a whole have come to realize that the abundance of our farms is a blessing to be used for humanity's sake rather than as an embarrassing nuisance.

Fourth. The success of Public Law 480 operations, notwithstanding obvious deficiencies in administration, has far exceeded even our hopes of 5 years ago. We have learned, by doing, many of the ways in which food and fiber can be used to build the conditions of peace, and we now see ahead even greater possibilities for good, provided the law is altered to make them possible.

All who have studied Public Law 480 operations, and most of those who have been associated with those operations, agree that the temporary, annual basis of program operations seriously restricts both the volume of American food and fiber that can be used for constructive purposes abroad and the effectiveness with which it can be used to promote economic and social development in friendly nations. They all agree in the emphatic recommendation that the authorization for our programs be extended to cover a period of at least 5 years ahead. With American food and fiber supplies available to them only on a 1-year basis, countries living on the margin of their resources, and planning their use ahead, do not know what they can count on, with the result that their stability is unnecessarily brought into question and their development impeded.

It is impossible, for reasons of time, to enter here into a detailed discussion of the host of reasons, mostly technical in nature, discovered through experience, why 5-year program authorization is necessary. They will, I trust, be discussed in subsequent hearings and debate. But I can assure you, Senators, that they are compelling.

Every one who has studied this program finds it urgently necessary. For example, the basic findings of the John H. Davis report to the Department of State on policy considerations pertaining to Public Law 480 stated as follows:

> The following estimates of U.S. surpluses and of food-fiber need in low-income countries provide the basis for expecting that a Public Law 480-type program will be in operation for at least 5 more years:
> 1. From $10 to $13 billion of U.S. farm commodities are almost certain to exist in excess of requirements for domestic use and foreign dollar sales during the next 5 years, according to USDA estimates. This is a conservative figure, based on the assumption that more far-reaching measures than those now in operation will be adopted to bring supply and demand forces into balance.
> 2. USDA and ICA estimates indicate that from $10 to $13 billion of U.S. farm commodities can be distributed through Public Law 480-type operations during the next 5 years, without seriously interfering with regular commercial trade.

I am therefore proposing in the Food for Peace Act a 5-year program, and an authorization of $10 billion over the 5 years of sales for local currencies under title I. The present authorization for sales under title I is at the rate of $1½ billion a year. It is only reasonable to expect that with more efficient administration on a 5-year basis an annual rate of $2 billion a year is not in any way excessive.

I want the record to show that every year we spend $1 billion merely for storage. I repeat this, because I want it seared into the mind and heart of every Member of Congress and every citizen of this country. We must choose whether we want to cut down the storage costs or keep them up. One way to cut them down is to utilize the food abundance which we have in the constructive manner which is being herein outlined. I believe that Members of Congress would have a difficult time explaining to their constituents why we continue to pay $1 billion or more a year merely to store food, when we could be reducing the storage costs and using the same food for our purposes of international policy and national security, and for humanitarian reasons.

ADMINISTRATIVE MACHINERY

It is a remarkable and shameful fact that no one is really in charge of the store that sells or otherwise distributes billions of dollars worth of surplus agricultural commodities. There is literally no one in high authority in the entire Government who devotes his full time to the administration of Public Law 480.

By Executive order of the President, the administration of Public Law 480 is in the hands of nine agencies of Government coordinated by two interagency committees.

Here is a program which averages approximately $1½ billion a year. No one is in charge, because of the nature of the Executive order which outlines its administration. There are nine separate agencies involved in the handling of Public Law 480 operations. There are two interagency committees. The International Cooperation Administration, the State Department, the Treasury Department, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Defense, and other agencies are all involved in the administration of the act. I can think of no business in the world that could be well operated with nine separate bosses and two coordinating committees in charge—if we can call that being in charge. What we are attempting to do is to correct an administrative jungle.

In distributing authority among these agencies the President assigned to the several departments and agencies those aspects of Public Law 480 which are related to the type of work they normally carry on. The result is divided responsibility, overlapping authority, clashing points of view—with many bosses, with loose committee coordination, but with no one guiding hand with authority and power to act decisively.

Policy decisions are made by a six-agency committee chaired by a member of the White House staff. This body is called the Interagency Committee for Surplus Disposal. Its Chairman is Mr. Clarence Francis. Member agencies are the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, Treasury, State; International Cooperation Administration; and the Bureau of the Budget.

Operational decisions are made by a nine-agency committee chaired by a representative of the Department of Agriculture. This body is called the Interagency Staff Committee. It is headed by the Director of the Department of Agriculture's Foreign Agriculture Service. Other member agencies are the Departments of State, Commerce, Defense, Treasury, International Cooperation Administration, Office of Civilian and Defense Mobilization, Bureau of the Budget, and the U.S. Information Agency.

As head of the Interagency Staff Committee, the Department of Agriculture is responsible for initiating agreements for sale of surpluses for foreign currencies, for seeing that these agreements are pushed through and getting the commodities delivered. The Secretary of Agriculture is also directed to arrange barter transactions through private trade channels.

Though the Department of Agriculture is responsible for initiating agreements, the State Department has final authority in all matters concerning foreign policy, including negotiations for agreements, and has, in effect, veto power over the U.S. Department of Agriculture. The State Department is also responsible for handling the international educational exchange program, financed in part under Public Law 480.

The International Cooperation Administration has charge of foreign currency loans for economic development as a result of Public Law 480 sales, for government-to-government disaster relief grants, and for donations of food and fiber distributed by U.S. voluntary relief agencies functioning overseas.

The Bureau of the Budget is responsible for making allocations of the foreign currencies acquired through sale of food and fiber, and apportioning the currencies to the agencies in Washington which carry out the programs.

The Treasury Department handles regulations governing purchases, custody, deposit, transfer, and sale of foreign currencies.

The Office of Civilian and Defense Mobilization selects the strategic materials to be purchased with food surpluses or currencies obtained from sale of surpluses. The General Services Administration acts as agent for OCDM in the purchasing and handling of strategic materials under the program.

The Department of Defense uses local currencies from the program for purchase of military equipment, materials, and facilities such as housing.

The U.S. Information Agency is in charge of publicizing Public Law 480 activities abroad.

With functions thus distributed, with authority overlapping and conflicting, and with no single high officer having the authority to cut through the administrative jungle, the negotiation of agreements for the sale or use of our surplus agricultural commodities is frequently by a long, complex, and tedious process.

Despite these almost incredible difficulties, a great deal of good has been accomplished. That is primarily because of the dedication of some of the men who have handled this program in the Department of Agriculture and in the State Department. I know these men, and I wish to pay them a sincere tribute. I have in mind Ray Ioanes, who has been a tower of strength, and other men like him.

Without guidance on larger objectives and too often restricted by a narrow view and a negative attitude, the Department of Agriculture drafts not only a proposed sales agreement but also a detailed advisory paper for the conduct of negotiations with the foreign country. This paper is prepared for the guidance of our ambassador. These advisory papers must run the gauntlet of the Interagency Staff Committee on Surplus Disposal which usually insists upon unanimous agreement. Frequently 6 or 8 months of a fiscal year are consumed before our Chiefs of Mission abroad receive the necessary authority and instructions for negotiating an agreement.

Moreover, the instructions which he receives are usually so explicit and detailed as to leave him little if any room for maneuver or negotiation, with the result that he is obliged to consult Washington on every change requested by the other negotiating country. By the time the agreement is finally consummated there may remain only 2 or 3 months of financial authority, under annual extensions of Public Law 480, in which to make shipments and carry out the terms of the agreement.

Virtually all who have studied or been associated with Public Law 480 operations agree that there is urgent need to give strong and authoritative central direction to the program and to tighten up administrative machinery and procedures so as to make possible more rapid and effective progress toward agreed goals. During World War II the President, recognizing the importance of agriculture to the Nation's war objectives, created a War Food Administration separate and distinct from the Department of Agriculture. Today, the need is no less for a Peace Food Administration to make the most constructive possible use of our agriculture as a force for peace and freedom.

Accordingly, in the bill I present today I am proposing the establishment of a Peace Food Administration directly under the President, headed by a Peace Food Administrator who shall have sufficient authority to pull together the now widely dispersed operations under Public Law 480, give them central direction, and weld them into an efficient team moving purposefully toward the program objectives set by Congress. It will be possible for Congress to hold one office responsible, instead of the present impossible task of tracking down administration through the existing administrative jungle.

I say most respectfully and charitably to my colleagues that if they do not believe that is a real task, they should try it for size. It is the kind of sleuthing job which even the FBI might wish to take another look at in terms of whether it would be willing to undertake the operation. It is not that the men who handle the program are not trying to do a good job, for they are trying to do so. I have nothing but praise for the men who are attempting to carry out the purposes of the law as presently written.

What I am concerned about is that for some peculiar reason, in the handling of Public Law 480, we have become the victim of an administrative establishment which by its nature weakens or limits the effectiveness of the program. I see no reason why the Government of the United States should be choked to death by committees. I see no reason why the operation of the program should be stifled by a host of agencies and bureaus and interagency committees and staff committees. It seems to me that we ought to maximize the operations of the program and try to make it as efficient as possible. This is the purpose of the administrative proposals which are now being made.

I am proposing not only that the administration of Public Law 480 be placed under the new Peace Food Administrator, but also section 402 of the Mutual Security Act.

Operations are similar and overlapping, and study has shown that much would be gained by coordinating them.

I am also proposing that an interagency Food Peace Policy Committee be created at the Assistant Secretary level to advise and consult with the Peace Food Administrator, and also a Peace Food Advisory Committee made up of nongovernmental representatives of each of the major farm organizations, food and fiber exporters, representatives of voluntary relief agencies such as CARE and church groups, and representatives of voluntary health groups.

We are confronted by one of the gravest challenges and brightest opportunities in all history, and the use of our agricultural surpluses can be a powerful instrument in helping meet the challenge and realize the opportunity. It is imperative that administration be so organized as to make most effective use of that instrument.

NEW TITLES

In the proposed Food for Peace Act which I submit to you today there are four new titles in addition to the three now in Public Law 480. One concerns administrative machinery which I have already described. I shall now comment briefly upon the other three which would authorize new activities which it is believed woud be useful in accomplishing the purposes of the act.

LOAN PROGRAM

One of these is a new title IV. Public Law 480 at present authorizes sales of surplus agricultural commodities for local currencies, barter for strategic materials, and under certain circumstances for grants. However, it has become increasingly clear that the program would be improved by the addition of authority to make long-term low-interest loans, with deferred payment of interest and principal, to cover purchases of surplus agricultural commodities.

Title IV would provide an additional channel of assistance to developing nations, which in some cases might supplement or be preferable to other methods authorized under this act.

This title authorizes 10-year contracts for the delivery of surplus commodities to friendly nations with credit terms of up to 40 years.

Many countries throughout the world are now engaged in, or entering upon, intensive efforts to develop industry, transportation, electric power, and other similar aspects of their economies. When countries enter upon such periods of intensive industrial development, agricultural production nearly always fails to keep up with domestic demand. This develops because capital and other resources that are concentrated on industrial development are most frequently withdrawn from agriculture, and at the same time that industrial and commercial development takes place, rising consumer income creates a larger demand for agricultural commodities.

A country in this situation needs a source of agricultural commodities on which they can depend during their period of economic development. Their development plans need to be made with full assurance that adequate supplies of food and fiber will be available.

Therefore, this section provides that the President may enter into agreements with friendly nations to deliver annually certain quantities of wheat, rice, cotton, feed grains, or tobacco, or other surplus agricultural commodities as may become available, for periods of not more than 10 years. Payments for these commodities shall be made in dollars or in services or in materials which the United States does not produce domestically in quantities sufficient for our needs. Payment may be made over a period of time not to exceed 40 years from the date of the last delivery of commodities under the agreement, and interest of not more than 2½ percent per year shall be computed from the date of final delivery.

In making such arrangements, it will be agreed that these commodities will not replace any usual imports from friendly nations, but shall be in addition to these imports.

NATIONAL FOOD RESERVES AND RELIEF OF CHRONIC HUNGER

A second new title—title V—would authorize grants of surplus foods, under agreements with friendly countries having chronic or recurring food deficits or widespread malnutrition, for the purpose first, of enabling them to build up and maintain minimum national food reserves; and second, for inaugurating or expanding—with the assistance of FAO technicians and administrators—programs to relieve chronic hunger and malnutrition due to poverty and ignorance.

The subject of food reserve stocks in deficit countries or areas has been studied and discussed intensively for many years in the United Nations, in the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization, and in many individual countries, including our own. Without adequate food reserves, countries that suffer widely fluctuating crops due to drought or flood, that are remote from the world supplies, and that in any case live on the margin of hunger and their national financial resources, are frequently at the mercy both of the weather and food speculators. The result is frequently, therefore, that the people—quite unnecessarily—suffer misery and death due to sudden famine, before famine relief can arrive, or want due to merciless price gouging.

That the maintenance of minimum food reserves at the proper places is desperately needed, there is no question. The problem is how to do it.

Over the years there have been a number of proposals for the establishment of an international food reserve or world food bank, and these have received the most serious world study and consideration. However, the conclusion was reached in the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization that given the present stage of our knowledge and experience, the technical and political obstacles to the establishment and operation of an international food reserve were almost insurmountable, and that instead international cooperation to establish and maintain national food reserves in food deficit countries was practical and desirable. Accordingly, at the 1957 session of the United Nations General Assembly I, as a member of the U.S. delegation, introduced on behalf of the U.S. Government a resolution calling for international cooperation in the establishment of national food reserves and for building the necessary storage facilities. This resolution was adopted I believe unanimously. It was supported by the U.S. Government, obviously; otherwise, as a delegate of the U.S. Government to the United Nations, I could not have offered it.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD contains information relating to the resolution and the action of our Government. I recall that a statement relating to it was placed in the RECORD, first, by the distinguished junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN], and then I placed in the RECORD the exact text of the message of the U.S. Government which it was my privilege to deliver as a delegate to the United Nations in 1957.

Since then the administration has made no move whatever that I have been able to discover to implement its own resolution passed by the United Nations General Assembly.

While there is no excuse for complete inaction, in all fairness it must be said that the administration did not have all of the tools it needed with which to do the job. The financial limitations of the countries which need to build up national food reserves are such that the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization has concluded as a practical matter that such reserves can be built up only through grants from surplus producing countries rather than through purchases—either for hard currencies or local currencies. Also needed are grants of food surpluses which can be sold to provide the money necessary to build adequate storage facilities.

There are other difficulties. The storage and management of substantial food reserves is a highly technical operation, demanding skills and experience which are in short supply in the needy countries. Moreover, there is some danger that, without a high degree of technical competence and administrative diligence, national reserves, once built up, might either be depleted or used in ways deleterious to normal commercial trade.

These are the reasons, then, for the new title V in the Food for Peace Act which I have today introduced in the Senate.

Under this title, the President is authorized and directed to negotiate agreements with friendly nations or organizations of friendly nations to provide for the grant of specified amounts of CCC holdings of surplus commodities in order to implement the 1957 United Nations resolution, which I have already described. The President is directed to seek and secure commitments from the countries receiving grants for this purpose, to maintain national food reserves at agreed levels, making replacements in such reserves, when necessary, either through commercial purchases or purchases with local currencies from the United States under title I, except that in the case of depletion as a result of famine or disaster the President is authorized to make grants under title II to build the reserves back to the agreed level. The President is also directed to seek and secure commitments that experts and technicians of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization shall be engaged to consult and advise on the technical problems of storage and management of national food reserves, and upon the general operation of the national food reserves, with a view to assuring that they shall not interfere with the normal trade of the United States or that of other exporters.

A second part of the proposed new title V authorized the President to negotiate agreements with other countries under which U.S. agricultural surpluses would be made available on a grant basis to aid those countries in inaugurating or expanding—with the assistance of food and agriculture organization technicians and administrators—programs to relieve chronic hunger and malnutrition. This authority, it seems to me, is a highly important addition. Under the present law, grants are available for this purpose to United States voluntary agencies, but their scope of action is necessarily limited.

Furthermore, many countries do not have the technicians and administrators necessary to inaugurate or expand programs for seeking out hidden hunger and ministering to it. The new authority in title V would make it possible for these countries to engage Food and Agriculture Organization technicians and administrators to help them carry on programs to relieve chronic hunger and malnutrition. If we really want to use American food surpluses to help relieve hunger and misery that otherwise go unremedied, this is one of the important ways to do it.

USE OF REPAYMENTS OF INTEREST AND PRINCIPAL ON LOCAL CURRENCY LOANS FOR RESEARCH, EDUCATION, HEALTH, AND PUBLIC WELFARE

The last of the new titles to be discussed is title VI, which I am sure will arouse intense interest and debate, for it faces up to the problem, hitherto neglected in legislation, of what shall be done with the local currencies which are beginning to accumulate as a result of the payment of interest and repayment of principal on local currency loans made under title I. Public Law 480 has been silent on this point, but all who have studied or thought deeply about the programs conducted under this law have recognized that sooner or later the law would have to speak. Now is the time, because the interest and principal repayments are beginning to flow in and will in time become a very serious problem.

Looking ahead, Mr. James H. Smith, Director of the International Cooperation Administration, last year appointed three outstanding American businessmen, whose names I have already mentioned today, to make an exhaustive field survey of this problem. This they did, and on August 5, 1958, they made a report to him entitled "Accumulation and Administration of Local Currencies," which I shall refer to hereafter as the Berenson-Bristol-Strauss report. The report deals with accumulations in general, and only in part with accumulations resulting from repayment of principal and interest on local currency loans. In drafting the new title VI of the Food for Peace Act I have drawn heavily upon their report.

As of December 31, 1958, agreements under title I had been signed with 36 countries covering purchases of our surplus agricultural commodities having a market value of $3,323 million, repayable in local currencies or dollars. In fact, virtually all repayments will be in local currencies. Of this amount, roughly half is scheduled to be loaned back to the governments concerned, and loans totaling $327 million had actually been made. In general, the loans are for 40 years, with interest—if paid in local currency—at 5 percent, prinicpal repayments beginning after 3 years.

As is evident, the problem of what to do with the local currency reflows is only incipient, but it takes no imagination to see that in time, as the program continues, it will become a very serious problem indeed.

In seeking a solution, the first thing to understand is that this local currency is not in itself a resource or a commodity but is merely a claim on the resources of the country of its origin. Only a small part of it is usable to pay for the obligations of the United States, and the remainder—the larger part—is not subject to the unilateral control of the United States but only in agreement with the country concerned. It is useful only in the country of origin.

Our purpose being to help, not weaken, these countries, there are serious disadvantages to our accumulating large holding of their currencies. Depending upon how they are used, they can bring about deflation or inflation. No country would long tolerate our possession of an instrument which could control their destiny. If we should acquire such control, we would offer the Communists a stick with which to beat us over the head unmercifully.

There is no doubt whatever that we must not acquire large holdings of these foreign currencies, but that we must put them to work in the only places where they can work, and that is in the countries of their origin. But how? Assuming that continuation of Public Law 480 sales will continue to provide currencies which can be loaned for economic development, the answer is that local currency reflows can best be used as grants for non-profit-making but socially useful enterprises such as research, health, education, and public welfare.

It has long been recognized that ill-health, malnutrition, and a low level of education, both general education and vocational education, are basic impediments to economic development. Here, then, is an opportunity to help fill one of the necessary gaps and round out our food for peace program.

In the Davis report, the National Planning Association study, and the Berenson-Bristol-Strauss report a strong case is made for grants of local currencies for research, health, education, and public welfare, and in the latter a very strong case is made for the administration of such grant funds by binational foundations established through agreement between governments, but operating in a semi-independent manner.

In the proposed title VI their recommendation is adopted for reflow of funds.

In title VI the President is authorized to negotiate and carry out agreements with friendly nations to provide for the establishment in such countries of nonprofit binational foundations to promote research, education, health, and public welfare. Such foundations shall be under the direction of boards of trustees, the majority of whose members shall be nationals of the host country appointed by its government, and the remainder shall be nationals of the United States appointed by the President of the United States. One of the U.S. members shall be the U.S. Ambassador. The Board of Trustees shall select the officers of the Foundation. The Foundation shall have freedom to use the funds available to them either directly or through investment and use of the proceeds.

The President is authorized by the bill to grant to such foundations, for the purposes specified in this title, local currencies which accrue to the United States as repayments of principal and interest on all local currency loans which have been made by the U.S. Government in the past under Public Law 480 or which may be made in the future under the present act.

NEW USES FOR LOCAL CURRENCIES ACCRUING FROM SALES UNDER TITLE I

Before concluding, I think it may be useful to point out that in the Food for Peace Act it is proposed to authorize a number of new uses, in addition to those already named in section 104 of title I of Public Law 480, for local currencies accruing from sales.

One of these is for loans to promote medical and scientific research, educational development, and health, and education.

A second is for financing the dubbing, showing, and distribution of audiovisual informational and educational materials, including Government materials abroad.

A third is for financing the services of technicians, advisers, and administrators who are citizens of any friendly country and who may be needed to further economic and social development programs in other friendly countries.

Five new additions are designed to authorize the use of local currencies, in agreement with the countries concerned, to permit, to buttress, and to extend social and economic development projects and activities carried on in those countries by the United Nations and its specialized agencies and affiliated organizations: specifically, the United Nations Special Fund, the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization, the International Finance Corporation, and an International Development Loan Association, if and when such may be established as an affiliate of the World Bank for the purpose of making long-term loans, including local currency loans, for economic development.

To my mind, these five additions, which will tend in some measure to internationalize the use of the foreign currencies accruing from Food for Peace sales, are of the highest importance. I cannot too often repeat that our food and fiber surpluses are a powerful potential instrument for the economic and social development of the less developed countries, and can give rise to exceedingly extensive enterprises. However, if we seek to confine this enterprise into purely bilateral channels, with bilateral controls, we shall not only limit it, but we shall reap discord instead of good will. The United States is strong and it is wise. But it is neither strong enough nor wise enough to bring about alone that tremendous economic and social development which is necessary and possible. For that, the combined efforts of all nations are required, and I do not doubt that in the years immediately ahead we shall see a great burgeoning of projects carried on by and through international organizations. It is of the utmost importance that we equip ourselves to exert our efforts increasingly through international agencies.

In this shrunken world, the growing contrast between greatest wealth and direct need warps our perspective, threatens our survival, and offends our instincts as brothers of all men.

Mr. President, it is imperative that our people, privileged and anesthetized in the illusory fortress of their good fortune, notice the dawn rising even now in the East—a dawn burdened with the historic resentments of 2 billion human beings hungry and hopeless for countless milleniums—a dawn, however, also fresh with the radiance of unbounded opportunity.

Mr. President, let me emphasize that this response to the cries of the hungry abroad does not conflict in any way with our responsibility to see that the hungry and ill clad in this country are cared for. We have not forgotten that we have children here, too, who go to bed hungry at night, that there are needy old people, and people with earning power inadequate to their needs. Today more than 6 million Americans are dependent on public funds for the food they eat.

Certainly, these demands must be met. One first big step would be to use the laws which are already on the books. The Secretary of Agriculture has the authority, and he has the funds—section 32 funds, which year after year he hoards, and turns back to the Treasury—to help these people. If he wished to accept his full responsibility, the people unemployed in West Virginia and Kentucky, in Michigan and Mississippi, and in New Jersey, Maine, and California, could have food to eat.

Mr. President, I am delighted that yesterday it was my privilege to join with the fine and able Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] in presenting to the Senate and to the Congress our food-certificate plan and food-stamp plan to take care of the needy in our own country. How the Congress or this administration could refuse to endorse such a program would be beyond my comprehension.

I repeat that as we plan for the use of our abundance of food in our international relations, let us think also of how we can use our food abundance to take care of those at home who are in need. Indeed, charity begins at home; and now we have provided the administrative machinery for the proper use of food and fiber to relieve human suffering both at home and abroad; and we here in the Congress should respond to the calls for help, to which I have referred, by enacting a realistic food-stamp plan bill that will, at a very small cost, improve the diets and the lives of millions of undernourished, and will do this through the regular channels of trade in a way that will bolster our economy. This will indeed be bread cast upon the waters, for which we can see an immediate return.

But strongly as I support wiser use of our food abundance to feed our own hungry, I am equally concerned about feeding hungry people everywhere.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I think the American people are eager, Mr. President, to redeem our heritage and to restore our image.

I think we are ready to cast our bread upon the waters, because we know that is what we would want to have others do for us, were we where they are now. I think we are ready to acknowledge and to rejoice in the fact that God, in the ultimate of His wisdom, has made present imperatives of ancient ethics.

Lately there have been times, Mr. President, when it has not been easy to remember the authentic America—an America grateful for her bounty, eager to provide shelter to the needy, eager in her generosity—an America whose pocketbook is open, even if Communists do not threaten; an America whose schools are open, even if all her children are not of the same shade; an America whose heart is open to all men, in the humility of her unique opportunity to serve. That is the America that I love.

It is this America that asks patience and understanding from her older brothers across the sea, that finds wisdom in her heritage of diversity, and that asks of others help in finding ways to be of help to others.

And it is this America—too modest to sense yet the power of her unleashed conscience and energies—that must now be roused to the opportunity of the ages; the opportunity of a humanity working together against privation and inequity, and warmed in its labors by the love of the Lord for all his creatures.

Mr. President, it is in that spirit and in that philosophy that this proposed legislation is introduced. To my mind, so far as my work in these legislative halls is concerned, this measure is the most important and the most rewarding of all my endeavors. I believe I speak for the other Senators who have joined me in sponsoring the measure when I say that this proposed legislation represents the kind of constructive good, both in terms of policy and in terms of ideals, that all of us embrace.

FREE IMPORTATION OF ARTICLES FOR EXHIBITION

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending business be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 147, House bill 5508.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey in the chair). The bill will be read by title, for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 5508) to provide for the free importation of articles for exhibition at fairs, exhibitions, or expositions, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, this measure provides for permanent legislation permitting the free entry, under bond, of imported articles for exhibition or use at fairs designated by the Secretary of Commerce. The passage of the pending measure would avoid the necessity of adopting special acts each year to deal with individual fairs.

The bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on Finance, and it passed the House unanimously. It has been approved by both sides of the aisle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment.

If there is no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, yesterday I offered an amendment to strike out title VI of Senate bill 1555. I wish to state the reasons why I offered that amendment. If the amendment were adopted, it would strike from the pending bill six nongermane amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act.

I realize that there are certain nongermane amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act in the first title of the bill. It would be my purpose to offer an additional amendment to strike those nongermane amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act from the first title of the bill in the event my amendment striking title VI from the bill should be adopted.

For 2 years I have served upon the Senate Rackets Committee, which has been presided over so ably and courageously by a truly great American, Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN. This committee has investigated some 20 unions which act as collective bargaining agents for several million men and women employed in industries affecting interstate commerce.

The testimony taken by the committee has shocked the conscience of the Nation.

This is true because the testimony has made it crystal clear that some or all of the following have occurred upon frequent occasions in some of the unions investigated:

First. Union moneys in enormous amounts have been converted to their own use or that of their cronies by union officers whose duty it was to safeguard them.

Second. Union officers committing such raids upon union treasuries have destroyed union records to conceal their financial misdeeds from union members, income tax authorities, law enforcement officers, and investigating committees.

Third. Union members have been deprived of any real voice in the election of union officers or the management of union affairs by dictatorial activities of union officers, undemocratic regulations, wanton abuse of the trustee process, and even, on occasion, sheer terrorism.

Fourth. Persons convicted and sentenced to prison for armed robbery, burglary, extortion, and other infamous crimes have been placed in positions of authority over honest and law-abiding union members shortly after their release from prison and before they had brought "forth fruits meet for repentance."

Fifth. Union charters have been granted to known racketeers and their associates, who have used them as devices to prey upon the public and helpless workers compelled to earn their bread in the sweat of their brows.

Sixth. Union officers and agents of employers have entered into conspiracies resulting in sweetheart contracts or other arrangements which constituted betrayal of the union members by officers, who were supposed to represent them.

The great majority of union officers do not countenance or tolerate malpractices of these types in the areas in which they have the power to act. Nevertheless, the testimony taken by the Senate Rackets Committee shows that such malpractices are widespread in some segments of the union movement, and that they will undoubtedly continue unless they are outlawed by Congress. After all, John Stuart Mill was right when he said: "Laws and institutions require to be adapted, not to good men, but to bad."

For these reasons, there is a crying need at this hour for congressional action outlawing the malpractices I have enumerated.

It is obvious that if Congress is to do this, it must enact a statute regulating to a limited extent the internal affairs of unions.

Titles I to V, both inclusive, of S. 1555, which is popularly known as the Kennedy-Ervin bill, are well designed to outlaw the malpractices under scrutiny. If it should be enacted into law, the bill would make union officers legally accountable for safeguarding union money, impose criminal penalties upon union officers for willful misuse of union moneys or the willful destruction of union records, bar convicted felons from holding union offices until they have brought "forth fruits meet for repentance," prohibit union officers from arbitrarily using the trustee process, and from conniving with management to the detriment of union members, and secure to dues-paying union members both the right and the power to select the officers and control the affairs of their unions.

In laying stress upon the crying need for legislation outlawing the malpractices enumerated by me, and in pointing out that the first five titles of S. 1555 are well adapted to accomplish this purpose, I do not overlook these two things: First, that industry, labor, and the general public are demanding various changes in the Taft-Hartley Act, which was adopted in 1947 to regulate external relations between industry and labor; and, second, that title VI of S. 1555 contains what I have designated as certain amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act which not germane to the primary objective of the bill as set forth in its first five titles. Indeed, I have been convinced by my own study of the subject and also by testimony presented to the Senate Rackets Committee that it is highly desirable for Congress to change or clarify some of the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, including those relating to organizational picketing and secondary boycotts.

While this is true, Congress should not attempt to outlaw malpractices in the internal affairs of unions and to amend the Taft-Hartley Act in one operation or in a single piece of legislation. On the contrary, Congress should do these jobs one at a time. This is so for these reasons:

First. Malpractices in the internal affairs of unions and problems arising out of the external relations of industry and labor are quite dissimilar in nature, and require quite different legislative treatment. To combine the consideration of such diverse matters is not conducive to sound legislation because it tends to confuse issues and distract legislators.

Second. The passage of needed legislation to outlaw malpractices in the internal affairs of unions ought not to be put in jeopardy by saddling such legislation with unrelated controversies between industry and labor respecting nongermane provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Third. The Taft-Hartley Act is an exceedingly important and intricate law which should not be subjected to indiscriminate amendment on the Senate floor until the proposed changes in it have been adequately studied by the appropriate Senate committee.

For these reasons, I urge that the nongermane amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act embodied in title VI of S. 1555 be stricken out, and that the bill be thus restricted to its primary objective; that is, the outlawing of the malpractices in the internal affairs of unions so clearly revealed by the investigations of the Senate Rackets Committee.

Mr. President, I do not claim to be a prophet or the son of a prophet; nevertheless, it is safe to make this prediction: If the nongermane amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act are stricken out, S. 1555 will pass the Senate by a virtually unanimous vote with a minimum of debate and delay, leaving the Senate free to consider at a subsequent time in a manner consistent with orderly legislative procedure all proposed changes in the Taft-Hartley Act after those changes have been adequately studied by the appropriate Senate committee.

It is likewise safe to make this prediction: If the nongermane amendment to the Taft-Hartley Act are not stricken out, their presence in S. 1555 will constitute an invitation to every Senator to offer upon the Senate floor as amendments to the bill whatever changes in the Taft-Hartley Act he deems desirable. As a consequence, the Senate will be bogged down for days on end in debate upon all the controversial features of the Taft-Hartley Act. This is likely to result either in the defeat of S. 1555 or the mangling of the Taft-Hartley Act. Intricate legislation cannot be properly framed amid heated debate upon a legislative floor.

We cannot justify exposing the provisions of the first five titles of S. 1555 and the Taft-Hartley Act to these alternative perils. The perils are wholly unnecessary because they can be entirely avoided in the first instance by the simple expedient of striking out title VI. Such action should be taken by the Senate at as early a moment as possible.

After this action is taken, the Senate should reject all subsequent attempts to write into S. 1555 any nongermane changes in the Taft-Hartley Act and send the restricted bill without delay to the House, whose concurrence in the action of the Senate would make it reasonably certain that union treasuries will not be pillaged with impunity by their custodians, that unrepentant convicted felons and racketeers will not be given dominion over honest and law-abiding union members, that dictatorial union officers will not be allowed to rob union members of their basic rights by abuse of the trustee process, that corrupt union officers will not be permitted to connive with management to betray the union members they represent, and that union members will possess the power as well as the right to exercise an effective voice in the selection of the officers and the control of the affairs of their unions.

Surely the investigations of the Senate Rackets Committee make it manifest that this is a "consummation devoutly to be wished."

A study of Federal law will show that industry has some substantial safeguards against any possible abuses of the unions under the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act as it now exists, and that the unions have some substantial protection against abuses on the part of industry under the Taft-Hartley Act as it now exists; but a study of Federal law and the investigations of the Senate Rackets Committee make it crystal clear that the rank and file of union members have no protection of any kind against dictatorial and corrupt officers of unions or against the connivance of management with a corrupt labor leader to deprive them of their rights.

The question which is before the Senate fundamentally is this: Shall the Congress grant protection without delay to the persons in this area of our national life who now have no protection, or shall the Congress jeopardize the right of these persons to protection at the hands of our Government by indulging in a controversy concerning the many controversial features of the Taft-Hartley Act—a course of action which will probably result not only in the denial of any rights to those who now have no protection but also in the mangling of the Taft-Hartley Act itself.

The best way to avoid such a calamity is to adopt my amendment and to confine the pending bill to the regulation of the internal affairs of unions so far as such regulation is required to protect the rights of their members, and at a subsequent period to give the appropriate committee an opportunity to bring forth a bill providing any desirable changes in the Taft-Hartley Act under such circumstances that the proposed amendments can be considered in an adequate manner, and thus free those who are now without protection of the danger that they will receive none at the hands of Congress.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED

The Secretary of the Senate reported that on today, April 16, 1959, he presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

S. 144. An act to modify Reorganization Plan No. II of 1939 and Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953; and

S. 1096. An act to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for salaries and expenses, research and development, construction and equipment, and for other purposes.

RECESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the wish of the Senate?

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 29 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, April 17, 1959, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, APRIL 16, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Charles W. Holland, Jr., B.D., Th.M., pastor, Fountain Memorial Baptist Church, Washington, D.C., offered the following prayer:

In the first book of the Bible 4: 9 we read: and the Lord said unto Cain, "Where is Abel thy brother?" and he said, "I know not: Am I my brother's keeper?"

Father-God, Creator of man, help each Congress man and woman in this great body to realize he is his brother's keeper.

As legislation is premeditated in the minds of these servants of the people of these United States, imprint, indelibly, inerasably, inexpungibly, upon each person as he works in this enclosure and the confines of his office the fact that he is his brother's keeper.

We feel, dear Heavenly Father, that if this is kept before our thinking we will see helpful, constructive legislation enacted.

Great Physician, if it is in Thy will, lay Thy hand on the body of Mr. Dulles.

This request I make conscientiously and sincerely in the name of my Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H.J. Res. 336. Joint resolution making a supplemental appropriation for the Department of Labor for the fiscal year 1959, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1455. An act to authorize the rental of cotton acreage allotments.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 1096. An act to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for salaries and expenses, research and development, construction and equipment, and for other purposes.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. THURMAN A. WHITESIDE ET AL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

APRIL 15, 1959.

The Honorable the SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: From the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, I have received a subpena duces tecum, directed to me as Clerk of the House of Representatives, to appear before said court as a witness in the case of the United States v. Thurman A. Whiteside, et al. (No. 856–58), and to bring with me certain and sundry papers therein described in the files of the House of Representatives.

The rules and practice of the House of Representatives indicates that the Clerk may not, either voluntarily or in obedience to a subpena duces tecum, produce such papers without the consent of the House being first obtained. It is further indicated that he may not supply copies of certain of the documents and papers requested without consent.

The subpena in question is herewith, and the matter is presented for such action as the House in its wisdom may see fit to take.

Respectfully yours,

RALPH R. ROBERTS,
Clerk, U.S. House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the subpena.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman withhold that so that I may offer a resolution?

Mr. GROSS. No. Mr. Speaker, I insist on my point of order.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

This subpena is issued upon application of the defendant.

HARRY M. HULL,
Clerk.
By LAWRENCE PROCTOR,
Deputy Clerk.

APRIL 1959.

ARTHUR HILLAND,
Attorney for Defendant Thurman A. Whiteside.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 246) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas in the case of United States v. Thurman A. Whiteside et al. (criminal case No. 856–58), pending in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, a subpena duces tecum was issued by the said court and addressed to Ralph R. Roberts, Clerk of the House of Representatives, directing him to appear as a witness before said court at 9:45 antemeridian on the 20th day of April 1959, and to bring with him certain and sundry papers in the possession and under the control of the House of Representatives: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That by the privileges of this House no evidence of a documentary character under the control and in the possession of the House of Representatives can, by the mandate of process of the ordinary courts of justice, be taken from such control or possession but by its permission; be it further

Resolved, That when it appears by the order of the court or of the judge thereof, or of any legal officer charged with the administration of the orders of such court or judge, that documentary evidence in the possession and under the control of the House is needful for use in any court of justice, or before any judge or such legal officer, for the promotion of justice, this House will take such action thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of this House; be it further

Resolved, That Ralph R. Roberts, Clerk of the House, be authorized to appear at the place and before the court named in the subpena duces tecum before-mentioned, but shall not take with him any papers or documents on file in his office or under his control or in possession of the House of Representatives; be it further

Resolved, That when said court determines upon the materiality and the relevancy of the papers and documents called for in the subpena duces tecum, then the said court, through any of its officers or agents, have full permission to attend with all proper parties to the proceeding and then always at any place under the orders and control of this House and take copies of any documents or papers and the Clerk is authorized to supply certified copies of such documents and papers in possession or control of said Clerk that the court has found to be material and relevant, except minutes and transcripts of executive sessions, and any evidence of witnesses in respect thereto which the court or other proper officer thereof shall desire, so as, however, the possession of said documents and papers by the said Clerk shall not be disturbed, or the same shall not be removed from their place of file or custody under said Clerk; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the said court as a respectful answer to the subpena aforementioned.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING MILITARY CONSTRUCTION

Mr. THORNBERRY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 245 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5674) to authorize certain construction at military installations, and for other purposes. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill, and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Armed Services, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. THORNBERRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN], and, pending that, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, as the reading of the resolution indicates, it makes in order the consideration of H.R. 5674, familiarly known as the military public-works authorization bill.

This is an open rule and provides for 2 hours of general debate.

In appearing before the Committee on Rules, the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, gave a very detailed and excellent report of what the Committee on Armed Services had done in examining the requests of the Department of Defense for this authorization.

It is my opinion that the committee has done an excellent job. I am convinced from what the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, presented to the Committee on Rules, and from a careful examination of the report of the committee on H.R. 5674, that this is a well-considered bill and one which has been carefully studied by the Committee on Armed Services.

When the first requests came in from the field offices of the military departments outlining the needs of the various facilities, both in this country and outside this country, they totaled over $4 billion. In turn, they were reduced by the military departments in the Pentagon to $2,130,604,000. A review of the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Properties and Installations reduced this figure to $1,368,554,000, which was further reduced to $1,299,-297,000 by the Bureau of the Budget.

After the Committee on Armed Services finished with its examination of this request from the Bureau of the Budget and the Department of Defense, the committee further reduced, and it now comes to us $109,247,000 under the budget. The total authorization for new construction called for in titles I, II, and III of this bill amounts to $1,190,-050,000.

Added to this figure should be the amount of $57,128,000 recommended in title V of this bill by the committee for construction of facilities for each of the Reserve components and that for deficiency authorizations of $560,000. This brings the total authorization called for in the bill to $1,251,907,000.

I congratulate the chairman and the members of the Committee on Armed Services for the excellent job it has done. In reporting out H.R. 5674, the committee issued a unanimous report favoring its adoption.

I urge adoption of this resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I know of no opposition to the consideration of this bill, and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. THORNBERRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 7 minutes to the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to speak out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, every one of us are very sorry at the resignation of John Foster Dulles as Secretary of State. John Foster Dulles is a remarkable man, one whom I admire very much. He and I have been sort of kindred spirits in connection with the fundamental problems that confront the world of today. Not that I am associating myself with him from the angle of trying to enhance myself, but it happens that he and I, on fundamental policies concerning our country, looked pretty much eye to eye.

I admired him not only for his great capacity, but for his determination and his strong willpower, and for the great moral courage he has always displayed. Whether one agreed with him or not on every one of his policies, everyone knows that he is a dedicated American and that the policies that he devised or helped to devise he felt were for the best interests of our country. He will go down in history, in my opinion, as one of the outstanding Secretaries of States of our great Nation.

During this trying period in the world's history he has served as a bulwark of strength not only to our country but to the nations of the world who want to be free under their own law. He was always a constant hope to the hundreds of millions of captive citizens or residents of satellite nations who are subject to Communist viciousness and dictatorship but who are hoping for the early return of their liberties and of the independence of their country.

I am glad to note that President Eisenhower will continue to look to him for advice and will continue to consult with him. We all hope that God will shower his blessings upon him and improve his health so that he will be with us for many years to come, and that he will be able to give to President Eisenhower and to our country, in the trying days ahead the benefit of his great capacity, his strength of character, and of his moral courage.

John Foster Dulles knows the Communist mind. He knows the origin of the thinking of the Communists. And, unless one knows the origin of the thinking of the Communists he is going to be deceived by what they say and what they do. John Foster Dulles knows that Communist thinking—and I am talking about the Communists in fact, those in the Kremlin and other Communists in fact—originates in one word.

That word is "hate"—the idea that might is right, the grave is the end, the state is all-powerful, the individual is only a cog in the wheel of state to be used as those in control, the dictator and the clique around him, want to use him.

Unless one understands the origin of the thinking of the Communist mind he will be deceived by what they say and what they do. John Foster Dulles knows the origin of the Communist thinking, the hate that dominates their minds. They are the prisoners of an ideology that emanates from hate, hatred of everything that is contrary to what they want and what they believe in, their false ideology.

I think the finest evidence of John Foster Dulles' greatness is the fact that the Kremlin fears him, because any man the Kremlin fears must possess qualities that are of the highest nature from the angle of those who want freedom under their own law.

I hope the successor of John Foster Dulles, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, will follow the policy of firmness that John Foster Dulles so well exemplified, many times under trying conditions when he was misunderstood. I hope that in the Foreign Ministers meeting we will insist, as the President has said and as John Foster Dulles has so well said, on evidence of progress being made before we enter into the summit meeting, for John Foster Dulles, as I know him and read him, would never stand for a summit meeting at any price. To me, that would be a dangerous role for the free world to follow. I hope our country will adhere to that policy, and I hope his successor, whoever may be appointed, will have the firmness and the moral courage that John Foster Dulles possesses.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. May I commend the majority leader on the very splendid statement he has made. We all realize the sentiment that prompts it. We all realize the admiration and the respect that is involved in what he has just said. It is further evidence of the fact that when matters involving the security of our country, our foreign policy, are before us, there is no center aisle to divide us.

May I say further, Mr. Speaker, that on yesterday on the floor I had a few words to say of respect, admiration, and gratitude for John Foster Dulles, so I shall not say anything further at this time. However, I did want to commend the gentleman on the admirable statement he has just made.

Mr. McCORMACK. I appreciate what my friend has said. What I have said represents not only my own views. I try to be objective-minded. I have watched John Foster Dulles through the years, and my admiration for him has increased and increased. My feeling has progressed from one that was not so favorable to him to one of intense admiration as I have watched the man, as I have analyzed his mind and seen his grim determination and great courage, all for the national interest of our country. So I express not only my own views but I am confident I express those not of Democrats or Republicans in this House but of all of us as Americans.

Mr. THORNBERRY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5674) to authorize certain construction at military installations, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 5674, with Mr. SMITH of Mississippi in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] will be recognized for 1 hour, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS] will be recognized for 1 hour.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time at I may require.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill, H.R. 5674, is known as the military construction authorization bill for fiscal year 1960.

This is strictly an authorization bill.

The grand total of all authorities granted in the bill is $1,251,907,000.

Now, this total is made up of a number of elements and is broken down as follows: Army, $199,045,000; Navy, $182,283,000; Air Force, $808,722,000; Reserve components, $57,128,000; deficiency authorization, $4,729,000.

As I stated a moment ago, the grand total of all these authorities is $1,251,907,000.

Let me call your attention to the fact that these deficiency authorizations, totaling $4.7 million, represents increases in cost for previously authorized projects. Either the original estimate of cost was too low or it is attributable to a rise in cost.

I might say in this connection, I am pleased to draw your attention to the fact that 2 years ago, the deficiency authorization was $183 million. And last year it was $43 million. This indicates that the construction programs being submitted by the Department of Defense are better planned and better thought out than they have been in the past.

RESCISSIONS

Also in the past, there was a great gap between authorizations and appropriations. This the committee felt was unwise. I am happy to report that an automatic repealer provision which we placed in the bill several years ago and which has appeared in it each year since is bringing these authorizations and appropriations into reasonable balance today.

Here is how they line up: Unfunded authorization at the end of fiscal 1957 was almost $2.2 billion. At the end of fiscal 1958, the figure was $1.9 billion. The estimated amount of unfunded authorization at the end of this fiscal year—1959—is about $1 billion.

I am glad to state that the Department estimates that the amount of unfunded authorization which will be available at the end of fiscal year 1960 will be only about $444 million.

APPROPRIATIONS TO BE REQUESTED

For this construction, the Department of Defense is requesting from the Appropriations Committee $1,479 million for the Regular Forces and $61 million for the Reserve construction. This figure, of course, is somewhat larger than the bill and this is explained by the fact that some previous authority is also being funded this year.

Now, this construction bill and the justification for it is, of course, a reflection of the size of our Armed Forces. This year, it is based on 870,000 men in the Army, 864 ships in the Navy, and 102 wings authorized for June 30, 1960, for the Air Force.

Each of the services has its physical plant requirement which, together with the men and the weapons, makes up the total of our defense. The physical plant is an absolutely essential part of the defense structure and it must be improved, added to, and kept modern all of the time.

Now, a bill of this kind has its origin in the requests made by the field establishments of the three services. It is then submitted through channels to the particular military department headquarters in Washington. That department reviews it and it is finally submitted to the Secretary of the military department for his approval. The program then goes to the Secretary of Defense, and specifically to the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Properties and Installations, a position now very competently held by Mr. Floyd S. Bryant.

Mr. Bryant's job is to review and coordinate all of the military construction programs, making certain, for example, that facilities of one service that are not now being used to full capacity be used by another service. This office takes the overall view of the total construction program.

Following this process this year from a dollar standpoint, the picture is this: The field offices of the three departments made requests for construction totaling over $4 billion. This was cut by the military departments themselves to about $2,131 million. Mr. Bryant's office cut this figure to $1,368 million and the review by the Bureau of the Budget resulted in a bill of only $1,299,297,000.

The committee, after its close and detailed scrutiny of the bill by line item, cut $109 million from the program so that the bill which you have before you now represents a total of $1,190,050,000.

All of the figures that I have just given refer to the program for the Regular establishment. The Reserve portion of the bill, which totals about $57 million, remained pretty stable throughout the reviews and I, therefore, have not injected it into this overall picture.

The bill contains almost 2,000 individual line items. These line items are carried in what are called backup books and I have brought one of these books—only one of them—today in order that you can have some idea of the amount of detailed study which goes into one of these bills. This particular book has 347 pages and it is only 1 of 10 books.

I know you realize that it would be impossible for me to go into any great detail with respect to a program of this size within the limitations of time allotted for the consideration of this bill. Indeed, it would take as long for me to explain it in that fashion as it took the committee to study it during its hearings.

Therefore, I will deal with some of the highlights of the program in order to make the general picture clear.

Of the total amount requested, over $400 million, or 31 percent, is in direct support of our ballistic missile programs of the three services. Approximately $266 million, or 20 percent, is for expanding air defense systems; $223 million, or 17 percent, is to support research and development and missile defense; and $110 million, or 10 percent, is to improve the capabilities of the Strategic Air Command.

This does not total 100 percent but gives the major portions of the total bill.

I would also like to describe the highlights of the programs for each of the three military departments. Prior to doing that, however, I would like to point out one important fact which goes directly to the question of construction costs, and that is, that 96 percent of all the construction contracts let by the military departments during fiscal year 1958 were on a bid basis.

The competition is strong and the prospective contractors make the closest possible estimates in order to get the jobs. There is no greater assurance, to my mind, of getting a dollar's worth of construction for a dollar spent than this bid process.

ARMY

Let us look first at the Army program. Almost 30 percent, or $67 million, is for facilities in support of research, development, and test activities of the Nike-Zeus program. Over 21 percent, or almost $50 million, is for the construction of Nike-Hercules, Hawk, and Missile Master facilities in the United States and overseas. The other percentages are all relatively small and I will describe only a few of them.

Six percent, or $14 million, is for maintenance and storage facilities at major existing installations in the United States and overseas. Almost 5 percent is for essential utilities at our major installations within the United States. These utilities include emergency powerplants, heating systems, sewage disposal, storm drainage, roads, and other such items.

Only 4 percent of the Army program is devoted to service clubs, chapels, schools, and other similar facilities.

NAVY

The Navy program has no individual large percentage breakdowns. The largest, as a matter of fact, is 18 percent, or $35 million, to support aircraft carriers of the carrier striking force. Fifteen percent, or almost $30 million, is for barracks and bachelor officers quarters and their allied facilities. Fourteen percent, or almost $28 million, is devoted to missile programs and particularly, those related to the Pacific Missile Range, Point Mugu, Calif.

All of the other percentages are relatively small. Typical of them is $11 million or 6 percent for construction in connection with the eastward extension of the distant early warning line.

AIR FORCE

By far the large portion of the Air Force program is represented by construction in support of ballistic missiles. This comprises 43 percent, or $374 million, of the Air Force total.

Almost 9 percent—or $77 million—is for construction of facilities within the United States to support the Strategic Air Command.

Four percent—or $34 million—relates to construction for fighter interceptor squadrons at bases in and outside the United States.

The next largest percentage is only 3.8 percent—or $44½ million—for work in support of the ballistic missile early warning system.

All the remaining divisions of the program are in the 1 to 3 percent category.

Let me say that in reviewing the requirements of the Air Force, we are trying to take into consideration that in the course of time, manpowered aircraft will gradually fade away like the battleship faded away for the aircraft carrier. It is our hope and expectation that many of these installations can be used in the missile era without requiring any construction of a support or logistic nature.

I might say at this point that all of these breakdowns which I have given are dealt with in very much greater detail in the report. I feel that almost any question which might arise in your mind can find its answer in the report which has numerous headings and clearly understandable divisions.

LAND

Last year when I was presenting this bill, I stated that I was happy to announce that the land acquisition contemplated by the bill was the smallest in many years. This year, I can state that the program is even smaller than last year, totaling only 3,062 acres in fee and 1,302 acres in easements for a total cost of $2,086,000. In this connection, and knowing of the strong interest that we all have in the land holdings of the military departments, I would like to direct your attention to page 30 of the report which deals with this subject in some detail.

From this portion of the report, it is clear that every effort is being made to keep land acquisitions at a minimum while disposing of the maximum amount of defense real estate, consistent, of course, with our continuing needs.

Also, relating to this matter of real estate are some interesting facts set out on page 32 of the report which illustrates how existing installations belonging to one military department are being made available to another military department. You will see several typical recent examples of how well this exchange of properties is working out.

NEW BASES

I am happy to advise again this year that there are no truly new bases in the program. There are, of course, some new radar stations and similar facilities but no major bases of any kind have been added to the inventory by this bill.

FAMILY HOUSING

The family housing program is progressing in quite satisfactory fashion. Where there were over 50,000 Capehart units last year, there are only 20,676 units this year. And as for appropriated fund housing, where there were 935 last year, there are only 473 this year.

COMMITTEE CHANGES

I mentioned previously the great number of line items in this bill—almost 2,000 of them. The bill which you have before you, of course, is a clean bill with only a few last minute amendments, almost all of which are merely to correct typographical errors.

The bill on which the committee held its hearings, however, was amended in over 70 instances and as I have said, virtually all of these amendments were by way of reductions in the program—over $109 million of them.

RESERVE COMPONENTS

Title V of the bill will provide specific line item project authorization for fiscal year 1960 for each of the Reserve components in the following amounts: Naval and Marine Corps Reserves, $8,300,000; Air Force Reserve, $4,093,000; Air National Guard, $15,536,000; Army Reserve, $20,748,000; Army National Guard, $8,451,000; for a total authorization of $57,128,000.

In addition, this title provides for the correction of deficiencies in cost estimates for several items authorized by the Reserve Forces Facilities Act of 1958—title VI of last year's military construction bill—amounting to $560,000, and for a rescission of $2,022,000 of previous authorization of projects no longer required by the respective Reserve components because of reprograming.

The Department of Defense had requested a total of $56,995,000 of authorization for new projects during fiscal year 1960. The Committee on Armed Services carefully screened these requests in connection with its review of the total requirements of the Reserve forces facilities program and concluded that the requests were well justified and the progress of the entire program satisfactory.

Accordingly the committee approved the entire program requested by the Department of Defense and added two minor additions amounting to $135,000.

The proposed authorization provided for the Reserve components for fiscal year 1960, therefore, is $57,128,000.

CONCLUSION

Now, that is the military construction bill for fiscal year 1960. While I have dealt only with the highlights of the bill, I hope that my remarks coupled with the very detailed report, will give you a picture sufficiently clear to warrant your support of this important legislation.

This bill merely represents one of the three essential elements of our Defense Establishment—construction—the other two, of course, being the men and the equipment.

This bill does nothing more than provide the essential construction items needed to provide a base from which our forces can fight both in this country and overseas.

I have noted the fact that a great many details relating to the program are contained in the report which is available to every Member. The hearings have been printed and are also available. And, of course, they have even greater detail since this year the committee made a special effort to hold most of its hearings in open session. Almost all of the committee's deliberations are contained in the hearing. Only the highly classified details with respect to some of the items were heard in closed session.

Mr. Chairman, if I have not used the time allotted me, 20 minutes, I will be glad to yield to any Member for any question that he may wish to ask.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. I think the gentleman will anticipate my question because I have asked it every year for the last 9 or 10 years. Is there any money in this bill for the Truman Airbase at Grandview, Mo.?

Mr. VINSON. A few years ago, as a result of the constant inquiry by the gentleman and his calling it the Truman Air Force Base, we changed the name, not to mislead him, of course, because that could not be done, nor would we do that, but we felt that we should honor two outstanding officers who made the supreme sacrifice and it is now named after them. This place that used to be referred to in a most inquisitive manner by our able and distinguished colleague from Iowa no longer is known as Grandview, but it is Richards-Gebaur Air Force Base, Mo. Yes; there is some money in this bill for it. The total amount is $866,000.

Mr. GROSS. But the distinguished gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Iowa will always remember it as the Truman Airbase.

Mr. VINSON. Yes. And, I want to compliment the gentleman on the scrutiny with which he has always followed this; scrutiny not only with reference to this bill but all other bills that come in the House. I know of no Member that is more diligent in studying legislation closely than my distinguished friend from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. I thank the gentleman for his remarks and his kindness to me at all times.

Mr. VINSON. I mean every word of it.

Mr. GROSS. One other question. Has the Continental Air Command been moved to the Truman Airbase at Grandview, Mo.?

Mr. VINSON. No; it has not. This is an Air Defense Command base. The Continental Air Command stays at Mitchell Field, N.Y.

Mr. GROSS. I did not think it would ever be moved there.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. CHENOWETH. I would like to ask the distinguished chairman of the committee about the item of $10 million for the North American Air Defense Command which was contained in his original bill. I note this item was eliminated in the revised bill.

Mr. VINSON. I will be glad to inform the gentleman and the committee. When that matter was before the committee it had not been specifically located, and we were not warranted in spending money for bases where we do not know where they would be located. So, we hesitated and we did not make any appropriation. Now I understand it has been located. We did not include it in the bill. No doubt it might be considered for insertion after a hearing is had on the other side.

Mr. CHENOWETH. On March 20 it was announced that the new headquarters would be located in Cheyenne Mountain, near Colorado Springs.

Mr. VINSON. That was long after we had concluded our hearings and reported the bill.

Mr. CHENOWETH. The gentleman referred to waiting until the bill is considered in the Senate.

Mr. VINSON. I suggest that would be the proper way to consider the matter. We were not able to consider it because it had not been located.

Mr. CHENOWETH. The gentleman is not opposed to the item, then?

Mr. VINSON. No.

Mr. CHENOWETH. And the only reason it was passed over was because the site had not been announced at the time the hearings were held.

Mr. VINSON. That is right. After the facts are brought out in the Senate, I am sure it will be taken care of.

Mr. CHENOWETH. I thank the gentleman.

Mrs. GRIFFITHS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield to the gentlewoman from Michigan.

Mrs. GRIFFITHS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia if there is money in this bill to change the Nike bases to receive another type of missile.

Mr. VINSON. On that general subject I would like to say this: It is to be expected that as aviation fades away over a period of time—and man-powered aircraft is bound in the course of time to fade away, just like the battleship faded away before the airplane carrier—missiles will come into being. It is to be hoped that practically all of these bases that are now used for man-operated aircraft can be appropriately used without additional expenditure to set them up specifically for missile bases. Did I answer the gentlewoman's question?

Mrs. GRIFFITHS. Is there money in the bill to change the Nike bases to receive another type of missile?

Mr. VINSON. I can recall nothing of that kind.

Mrs. GRIFFITHS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VANIK. In connection with military construction, to what extent are we using counterpart funds? Are we using them to the fullest extent possible?

Mr. VINSON. Of course, all I know about that is what I read in the papers when Members go abroad. We do not use counterpart funds. We use what is called Commodity Credit Corporation funds.

And that is in the bill with reference to certain construction abroad.

Mr. VANIK. In studying the provisions of the bill that deal with military housing construction abroad——

Mr. VINSON. That is Commodity Credit Corporation.

Mr. VANIK. I see there are limitations on room size and space size with respect to such expenditures that are made out of appropriated funds.

Mr. VINSON. There are appropriated fund houses in this bill. We prescribe how much money is involved and the types of the housing. There are also certain restrictions with reference to Capehart houses, and these appear in the basic Capehart law.

Mr. VANIK. Would that limitation preclude the use of counterpart funds for construction? Would it permit such construction outside of those limitations set forth in this bill?

Mr. VINSON. No; they would not. I do not want the gentleman to confuse his thinking between counterpart funds and Commodity Credit Corporation funds.

Mr. VANIK. I understand the distinction.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSS. I am pleased to hear the gentleman call attention to the fact that Public Law 480 funds are being used for defense purposes in foreign countries.

Mr. VINSON. Oh, yes.

Mr. GROSS. Which means inversely that this is another subsidy which should not be charged in full to the farmers of America.

Mr. VINSON. We do a great deal of work abroad through what is known as Commodity Credit Corporation funds.

Mr. TEAGUE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TEAGUE of California. In the Capehart housing field did the committee in any instance deviate from the request or the recommendations of the Department of Defense, or did the committee go along?

Mr. VINSON. Very little change. However, since the committee reported the bill, there have been three bases, but they do not increase the amount of dollars at all. They involve housing at bases that have been cleared by the Budget, and at the proper time I propose to offer an amendment to include these Capehart houses. When the bill was written up, they were not included. These places are 200 units at Quantico, 114 units at Loring Air Force Base, and 600 units at Travis Air Force Base in California.

Mr. TEAGUE of California. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. VINSON. This does not increase the amount of money at all. Everyone understands that every married officer in the service is entitled to a quarters allowance. It averages about $90 a month for all ranks. When they occupy a Capehart unit, or a direct-appropriated house, or any other Government facility, the quarters allowance is withheld. In the last 3 years we have been involved in about 152,000 units. When these houses are all paid for we will recover in the neighborhood of $180 million a year.

Mr. JONES of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON, I yield.

Mr. JONES of Missouri. I should like to ask the distinguished chairman of the committee one thing I do not quite understand. I know what "classified" is, and I can understand why that should be in the bill. But what is the difference between various locations, locations not specified, as compared with classified locations?

Mr. VINSON. I think the question is warranted since these terms could very well cause confusion.

Mr. JONES of Missouri. You have classified set out and I can understand that, but what would be the difference between a various location and a classified location?

Mr. VINSON. There frequently is no difference at all.

Mr. JONES of Missouri. I could not understand. We have three different entries here, and I could not see why you could not call them all classified. I was merely asking why you did not put them all under one group of classified rather than have them put under separate groups. That is what I could not understand.

Mr. VINSON. Generally speaking, "various locations," when so referred to in the Air Force portion of the bill, for example, relate to aircraft control and warning sites throughout the United States. There are a great number of these and many of them involve only minor items of construction. "Classified" installations, of course, speak for themselves. "Locations not specified" appears three times in the bill and relates to the authority that Congress is granting this year, and has granted in the past, for what I will call "emergency" construction. In other words, it is not known at this time how or where the authority would be used. Therefore, the locations are "not specified."

Mr. JONES of Missouri. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may desire.

Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee has given a fine detailed description of what is in H.R. 5674 and the construction items that are contained in it.

First, as the chairman of the committee has indicated, the bill which is before us is to provide construction and other related authority for the military departments within and outside the United States including authority for the construction of facilities for Reserve components. The total sum of the authorization contained in the bill is $1,251,957,000. The Army would be authorized almost $200 million, the Navy some $183 million and the Air Force $811 million, with a total of $57 million for the various units of the Reserve forces.

I want to assure every Member of the House that the committee, during its consideration of this program, has made a detailed examination of the projects which make up the bill and the major programs which they support. We found, during our hearings, that this bill is the result of sound detailed planning in the three military departments. The program was given repeated reviews within each military department, followed by additional reviews within the Office of the Secretary of Defense and the Bureau of the Budget.

We found these reviews to be objective and thorough. As has been stated, the program originally presented by the field offices to the military departments totaled in excess of $4 billion. After review and screening within the military departments, the Office of the Secretary of Defense, and the Bureau of the Budget, this amount was reduced to $1.3 billion.

The committee during its review cut over $109 million from the bill so that the total of the bill as you see it before you today is $1,251,957,000.

The committee found that there has been great improvement in the formulation of military construction programs, and it took particular care to verify that all projects included in this bill were needed to support long-term future military plans and to eliminate items for which a compelling military necessity did not exist.

I think that the whole purpose of the bill could well be expressed by stating that it contains construction which, first, is necessary in the support of new weapons systems and new defense concepts; second, is needed in the augmentation of existing bases to support changes in weapons and operating concepts due to advancing technological development and third, is required to modernize supporting facilities against the ravages of time in order to assure adequate support at a time of urgent or emergency demand.

Needless to say, military construction is the basic support needed for military operations. For many of our major weapons and defense programs, military construction is the initial step in programing and budgetary actions because of long leadtimes necessary to produce completed usable facilities. Also, because of the nature of new weapons systems and operational concepts, base facilities are increasingly becoming an integral part of the weapons systems. This is illustrated in the missile operating forces. Therefore, it is vital that construction be planned and started well in advance, so as to be ready when the new weapons are finished.

It was entirely clear from the testimony taken by the committee during its extended hearings that the basic policy of the Defense Department continues to have as principal elements, first, the consideration that our primary responsibility is that of protecting the ability of this country to retaliate with large weapons in case of an outbreak of general war; second, but equally pressing, the responsibility to provide a capacity to apply military force promptly in various local conflict areas of the free world, and, third, continuing a strong continental air defense and maintenance of open sealanes. The items in this bill support these policies.

As I stated at the beginning of my remarks, Mr. Chairman, the House has already heard the details of the bill from the chairman of the committee. I hold myself ready, as do all members of the committee, to answer any questions or provide any further information which any Member of the House may wish to have.

I will conclude on the note that the bill is a well-thought-out one, has received the closest study within the military departments, in the Office of the Secretary of Defense, and in the Bureau of the Budget. I think that the cuts made by the committee totaling $109 million speak for themselves.

I urge your support for this bill as a vital link in the total picture of our defense.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RIVERS].

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5674, and as chairman of the subcommittee which conducted extensive hearings on the authorization requested in H.R. 5674 for Reserve facility construction wish to take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. VINSON on his very thorough analysis of the bill and also to briefly review that portion of the legislation concerned with Reserve matters.

Title V of H.R. 5674 contained the authorization requested for the construction of new facilities for all of the Reserve components of the Army, Navy, and Air Force.

A total of $57,128,000 of authorization for new projects, including expansions and alterations of existing facilities, has been requested. This total is divided as follows: $20,748,000 for the Army Reserve; $8,451,000 for the Army National Guard; $8,300,000 for the Naval and Marine Corps Reserve; $4,093,000 for the Air Force Reserve, and $15,536,000 for the Air National Guard.

I would like to briefly review the substance of these requests by various components.

ARMY RESERVE

In the case of the Army Reserve, authorization of $20,748,000 proposed for fiscal year 1960 comprises 62 new Army Reserve centers and approximately 75 projects of the nature of additions to present centers. Of the 62 new centers, 52 are the 2 smallest standard sizes—with capacities of 100 and 200 Reservists, respectively, and are proposed for the smaller cities and towns throughout the country. The proposed projects, other than the new centers, are mainly additions of training and vehicle maintenance space which have been found essential to the training program.

ARMY NATIONAL GUARD

For the Army National Guard, the proposed fiscal year 1960 authorization of $8,451,000 comprises 47 new armories and 13 projects for conversion of present armories and 5 nonarmory projects which are maintenance and supply administrative facilities.

NAVAL AND MARINE CORPS RESERVE

Approximately half of the $8.3 million of new project authorization proposal for the Reserve components of the Navy and Marine Corps were for essential additional facilities at established Naval Air Reserve installations which serve both Naval Reserve and Marine Corps Reserve aviation. The remainder is divided almost evenly between the Naval Surface Reserve, for five berthing piers and four training buildings, and the Marine Corps Reserve for five training centers.

AIR FORCE RESERVE

The relatively small request for the Air Force Reserve—$4,093,000—was justified by the Department of Defense as being the result of prior substantial fulfillment of its most urgent requirements and consists of a variety of operational and support facilities at eight locations, four of which are municipal airports and the remainder jointly utilized military airfields.

AIR NATIONAL GUARD

For the Air National Guard, the authorization request of $15,556,000 consists of high-priority requirements for the operation and support of the Air National Guard aircraft at 20 locations; 3 aircraft control and warning facilities, 2 of which are located in the Territory of Hawaii; and site preparation for one new airfield. Of the 20 flying installations 16 are at civil airports and 4 at jointly utilized military airfields.

In summary, it would appear at first blush that the authorization requested for the Army Reserve program of $20,748,000 is disproportionately higher than the amounts requested for the other Reserve components. However, although this authorization for fiscal year 1960 is indeed higher than that requested for the other Reserve components it is not disproportionate since it reflects the fact that the Army Reserve program has to date only achieved 35 percent of its total estimated facilities requirement whereas the Navy has accomplished 47 percent of its requirements, the Air Force Reserve and National Guard approximately 75 percent of its requirements, and the Army National Guard approximately 85 percent of its total estimated requirements.

Thus, the emphasis on Army Reserve facilities is made necessary by the fact that the program is appreciably behind the others in development. This lag in development is directly the result of a lack of Army Reserve personnel prior to 1955. However, since the passage of the Reserve Forces Act of 1955 by the Congress, which was designed to strengthen the Reserve forces of the United States, the strength of the Army Reserve program has increased significantly with the consequent necessity for new facilities not previously required.

In respect to overall estimated requirements of the Reserve facilities program, the Department of Defense has indicated that a total authorization of $1,125 million will be required to provide all the facilities believed necessary for the Reserve components.

Approximately 60 percent of this required authorization amounting to $668 million has already been approved by the Congress and enacted into law.

The current bill will authorize an additional $57,128,000 of authorization thus increasing the percentage of authorization of total estimated requirements to 65 percent.

The balance of 35 percent of future estimated requirements will be met by future legislation and, as witnesses from the Department of Defense have indicated, will be requested by the Department of Defense in amounts necessarily in step with future individual program requirements.

In this connection the committee explored the possibility of accelerating completion of the Reserve forces program by increasing the total dollar authorization for the construction of Reserve facilities during fiscal year 1960. However, after considerable deliberation the committee was of the opinion that the total authorization requested by the Department of Defense was adequate for the program and properly geared to future manpower and training requirements.

Therefore, the committee concluded that any substantial increase in Reserve facilities authorization would be premature and therefore in addition to failing to serve any useful purpose might possibly disrupt the orderly development of the overall Reserve program.

For these reasons the Committee on Armed Services approved the request of the Department of Defense for approximately $57 million of authorization for Reserve facilities construction without making any substantial changes.

I therefore urge unanimous support of this bill, since it will, among other things, permit the continued strengthening of our Reserve forces.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAVIN].

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, at this time I would like to speak about the Army's military public works authorization program.

The survival of this Nation and of the free world demands that we have a means to deter aggression or to defeat it if deterrence fails. Aggression may occur in many forms, from the massive thermonuclear attack on this continent to the peaceful seizure of free government by subversion.

The worldwide threat of aggression has its source in ambitious and ruthless Communist designs to isolate and destroy the United States, the center of free world resistance to Communist world domination. It is backed by the ominous and impressive military power of the Soviet Union, its allies, and its satellities, built around the largest standing armies in peacetime history and buttressed by a growing capability to deliver long-range nuclear weapons. This great military power casts its foreboding shadow over all Europe and Asia and under this protective cover the Communists have engaged in ceaseless probings to test the will of the free nations to resist. This power has been felt directly or indirectly in most of the 18 military conflicts that have occurred since the end of World War II. In every case the Communists have fought for limited objectives and their threats to world peace have been so indirect and ambiguous as not to provoke a general thermonuclear war. They have advanced by internal subversion and piecemeal military operations based primarily on ground forces.

The Army's construction authorization request for fiscal year 1960, which is contained in title I of H.R. 5674, represents the most modest requirement which could support the Army's missions and responsibilities in these troubled times. This Army request should by no means be construed as representing everything the Army feels that it needs. In truth, it is my understanding that this modest request represents only about one-fifth of what the Army's commanders requested to carry out their assigned missions. These commanders' requests were rigidly screened within the Army before the Army presented its request to the Department of Defense. That agency and the Bureau of the Budget, operating within a prescribed and austere budgetary ceiling, made further reductions in the request so that the amount finally considered by the committee amounted to little more than a half of what the Army considered as their minimal needs.

I do not wish to belabor this point, but I believe it is important to understand that this Army request has been developed and reviewed under a most critical and restrained set of guidelines.

Now, if I may, I would like to recount for you some of the more impressive contributions to our mutual safety which these Army requests will buy for us.

The most important of the Army's tasks today include the maintenance of forces overseas in support of our national policies and international commitments with our allies, furnishing of surface-to-air missile defense for the United States and our forces deployed overseas, and provision of a mobile combat-ready strategic force here in the United States for rapid reinforcement of our deployed forces in time of need.

In carrying out its assigned responsibilities and missions overseas the Army is maintaining 40 percent of its Active Army Forces in various areas of the world. To support these units and their tasks, the Army has allocated, exclusive of surface-to-air missile requirements, some $35.6 million, or 17.8 percent of the total request.

In the field of surface-to-air missile defense the Army has been assigned a broad and vital role in the maintenance of an effective air defense complex which will protect our industrial and population centers as well as our retaliatory forces and the field Army Forces at home and overseas. Effective and efficient fulfillment of this mission is vital to our survival. To reinforce its capabilities in this field the Army has devoted 61.5 percent or $123.1 million of the total authorization requested. A major portion of this requirement is devoted to research, development, and test facilities for the Nike-Zeus antiballistic missile defense system presently under development.

Without detracting from the urgent requirements of our deterrent and defense forces, I would like to mention the increasingly important contribution to the Army's capabilities that are inherent in Army aviation. The Army, within the limitations placed upon it, has developed a family of Army aircraft which fulfills missions of observation, airlift for troops and combat supplies in the battle zone, communications and battlefield surveillance and battlefield casualty evacuation. These missions are separate and distinct from the broader responsibilities of the Air Force. Additionally they are developing and testing new forms of aerial transport, including such projects as tiltwing aircraft and the flying jeep. For support of these activities and to provide the operational and maintenance facilities for aircraft now with the field forces, the Army has apportioned 3.8 percent or $7.7 million of the total requested in this bill.

Now departing for the moment from the military hardware aspects of this request, I want to address myself to another very important segment of this program dealing with the Army's pressing needs for family housing.

With regard to family housing to be authorized by this bill, it should be noted that although the Army has made good progress in providing adequate family housing during the last 3 years, the provision of additional adequate family housing is still one of the most pressing problems facing the military services today. I have taken a personal interest in the provision of family housing for our military people, and feel strongly that the Congress should leave nothing undone to provide satisfactory housing for all of our military families.

This bill provides new authorization for 7,399 units of title VIII Capehart housing, 338 units of appropriated fund housing in areas where Capehart or surplus commodity housing is not feasible, and 557 units of surplus commodity housing. In addition, the bill also provides for the continuation of prior authorization for 234 units of appropriated fund housing. In developing the family housing construction projects in this bill, full consideration was given to the use of available adequate community support and private rental housing.

Let me remind you that the provision of adequate family housing ranks high among the motivating factors for the retention of trained military personnel in the Armed Forces, and in maintaining the high morale so necessary in the world of today.

This military public-works authorization program is only a small supporting authorization for the overall need of the Army. I would like to discuss briefly the crying need for modernization within our Army forces.

The United States emerged from World War II with the best equipped Army in the world. However, our Army has been greatly cut in strength and the majority of its major items of equipment have become obsolescent because of the lack of funds to modernize equipment and to replace wornout equipment. Today there is an urgent need for the modernization of the major items of Army equipment. General Taylor, the Army Chief of Staff, has testified that the limited funds for Army modernization is one of his principal reservations as to the adequacy of the defense budget for fiscal year 1960.

This need arises from two major circumstances: First, the rapid pace of technological advance over the past decade, and, second, the large, well-equipped, and modern ground forces of the Soviet Union and its satellites. Yesterday's weapons are today's second best, and tomorrow they may be obsolete. Recognizing this, the Soviet Union has been continuously modernizing its ground forces since the end of World War II. Their modernization program is the result of a thorough and well-conceived plan carried out without major deviation over the past decade. The program has been supported by a high and stable production rate that permits prompt replacement of normal losses and obsolescence, and transfer of increasing quantities of modern equipment of satellite armies and a smooth transition to wartime production.

The Soviet Army has been able to modernize and expand its weapons inventory. It has sufficient stocks of modern materiel to equip an active force of 175 divisions and to support it indefinitely in combat. Their equipment includes the means for fighting either nuclear or conventional wars anywhere on the Eurasian or Middle East land mass. Quality-wise they about equal our modern equipment; they lag behind us in some items; have drawn even in others; and surpass us in still others. Quantity-wise they overmatch us by a margin of 5 to 1.

Because of high and stable production rates, some major items of Soviet Army equipment have recently entered the second modernization cycle since World War II. For example, medium and heavy tanks, armored personnel carriers, trucks, and rocket launchers are now in the second round of modernization.

In the light of the Soviet progress, which is also being reflected in the growing materiel strength of their satellite countries, it is of paramount importance to modernize the equipment of the U.S. Army as rapidly as feasible. Because of reduced funds, U.S. Army weapons inventories have declined since the end of the Korean war and only limited improvements have been made in its quality.

The Army's concept of a versatile ground force that would be capable of delivering flexible and discriminating firepower upon hostile targets in limited or all-out war was built into its pentomic organization. Units organized under this concept, if adequately equipped, would comprise a highly mobile, flexible force capable of carrying out combat missions ranging from prompt suppression of local aggression to the conduct of major ground operations in a general thermonuclear war.

The field army of today requires continuous modernization of firepower, mobility, communications, and surveillance equipment, and of logistical support. General Hodes, the Army Commander in Europe, has testified that our ground combat forces urgently need the new medium tank with its heavier gun and diesel engine. They need the Hawk—the homing-all-the-way-killer missile—which can engage and destroy supersonic aircraft whether flying at tree-top level or more than 6 miles above the ground. The Army has developed unmanned drones to obtain information on targets and movements deep within enemy territory and needs these drones so that it can effectively use such weapons as the Sergeant missile. For improved mobility, the Army must have the new M–113 aluminum armored personnel carrier with its greater speed and range. Also needed are greater quantities and improved models of such unglamorous but essential items as graders and bridge-building equipment to support combat operations.

The Army has developed a phased and reasonable plan for the modernization of its major equipment. As its highest priority objective, the Army proposes that equipment be modernized for its active divisions and for high priority reserve units to include sufficient materiel for combat support for the initial period of conflict, plus providing modern materiel in limited quantities to permit the continued training of the remainder of the reserve forces. To meet these objectives would require annual appropriations of about $2.8 billion over a 5-year period. This is approximately double the amount provided in the budget for fiscal year 1960. This increase would provide arms and equipment as modern as those anywhere in the world and in sufficient quantities to allow our Army to carry out its mission in limited or general war as part of our defense team and its partnership with our allies.

We cannot expect that this relatively modest additional investment will permit our small Army by itself to turn back the 175-division Soviet Army. We do not propose to match the Soviet forces quantitatively. A modern Army, together with the great tactical capabilities of our Marine Corps, Navy, and Air Force, and in concert with our allies, can act promptly to suppress limited aggression that might otherwise lead to general war. It can fill a dangerous gap in our diversified deterrent forces upon which we must depend to forestall all kinds of Communist aggression.

If any of my colleagues still feel that there is little need for ground forces in this age of nuclear weapons and jet proplusion, let me refer them to the testimony of our military leaders before Congressional committees. Virtually all our military leaders agree that limited war is the most likely form of future conflict. Both General Taylor and Admiral Burke have warned against overemphasis of the nuclear deterrent at the expense of other means of defense. The President himself has characterized an all-out nuclear war as unthinkable. We expect our allies, with our assistance, to maintain adequate ground forces and to provide modern equipment for them. Can we reasonably expect them to do this when we neglect our own Army? In fact, can we expect our alliances to survive at all in the face of Communist pressure if the only guarantee we can offer them is the assurance that, if the Communists initiate the destruction of Western civilization, we will finish the job.

I have studied the Army's program and I feel that it is incumbent upon this Congress to provide the funds to support it. Our Army must have the best equipment this Nation can produce, thereby demonstrating for those who would destroy our way of life that this Nation is prepared to back up its commitments around the world and to deter or suppress aggression no matter where, when, or in what form its occurs.

Mr. AREND. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as she may desire to the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. ST. GEORGE].

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Chairman, included in the bill before you is a line item for the construction of 156 family housing quarters at the U.S. Military Academy. I wish to speak in behalf of this project and its necessity for our country. Our first President in his eighth annual message to Congress in 1797 stated:

> The institution of a military academy is also recommended by cogent reasons. However pacific the general policy of a nation may be, it ought never to be without a stock of military knowledge for emergencies * * *. [The art of war] demands much previous study, and * * * [knowledge of that art] * * * in its most improved and perfect state is always of great moment in the security of a nation. * * * For this purpose an academy where a regular course of instruction is given is an * * * expedient which different nations have successfully employed.

I draw from this statement the phrase, "in its most improved and perfect state is always of great moment to the security of a nation," to emphasize that in the art of war, under present interpretation national survival, there is no second best. The item before you for consideration is not merely the construction of housing but is a most important link in the chain of events in the continuing struggle to maintain our position as a first-class power.

You will note that the construction cost of each unit will not exceed $19,800 or a total construction cost of $5,588,000, including costs of the houses, site preparation, paving and outside utilities. At first blush, this seems a costly endeavor indeed. On second look, however, an analysis of the project runs much deeper than these cold statistics indicate. We are faced with the continuing operation of an institution which has become associated over the past half century with the the successful execution of the complicated requirements of two world conflicts and a number of so-called limited engagements. We cannot afford to permit this historical symbol of military leadership to decline in the quality of its mission as the result of a substandard living condition for its instructor personnel. The problem of retaining qualified company grade officers in the Army is a real one. With ever-increasing living costs, a low salaried Army officer finds Army service an ever-increasing financial hardship. If West Point is to continue in the quality of its product, instructor personnel must at least be offered decent living accommodations.

The shortage in housing at the Academy is a serious one. The long range family housing requirement for company grade instructors at the Military Academy is 315 housing units. At present, a great majority of these officers are occupying inadequate quarters. Community support offers only 91 adequate quarters for the entire military complement of the Academy. To assist in alleviating this critical shortage of officer housing at the Academy, the Congress last year in the Military Construction Act of 1958 authorized the construction of 156 units of family quarters for company grade officers under the provisions of title VIII of the National Housing Act, commonly referred to as the Capehart program.

The Chief of Engineers, acting for the Department of the Army, proceeded to develop this authorized housing project, but soon found out that it was impossible to construct the Capehart housing because of cost limitations. It was not possible to construct housing of the authorized space and the desired standards within the statutory limitation for Capehart housing of $16,500 per unit plus offsite utility costs of not to exceed $1,500 per unit. As you know, this $16,500 per unit limitation includes the cost of the house and all utilities within the boundaries of the project.

Various studies were made by the Army and the type of family housing that could be constructed using appropriated funds as an alternative to use of Capehart authorization. This idea was in accordance with the solution which the Congress had provided in other instances where it was impracticable to construct Capehart housing due to cost limitations. Studies considered row type housing, apartment type housing, and multi-family type housing. These studies showed without question that adherence to existing statutory cost limitations for company grade family housing units would result in a unit so small as to be unserviceable to the occupants and unacceptable to the Department of the Army as meeting neither space nor construction standards provided by current criteria. Consequently, the Army decided to request a project for 156 units of company grade quarters, to be constructed with appropriated funds, comparable in size and standards of construction to those constructed elsewhere in the United States under the provision of the Capehart Act. To accomplish this, special legislation is required to permit the exceeding of the statutory limitation of $15,400 per company grade unit. These units will not exceed the standards being used elsewhere in the United States. It is our hope that housing at West Point will merely be comparable in quality to housing generally provided at other Army installations.

This project for 156 units will consist of duplex and triplex two-story houses. the design for which will provide for reducing costs wherever possible. For example, construction will be concrete slab on grade—with no basement—a dry-wall type of interior construction, and individual hot air heating systems, certainly not the most elaborate of construction. In keeping with the standards desirable at the Military Academy, a national institution, which I am sure all of you will agree should not have its prestige lowered, the only concession proposed to the austere standards of construction is the use of brick exteriors and hardwood flooring.

Construction costs at West Point are considerably higher than the national average. In fact, the costs in that locality are about 10 percent higher than those prevailing in the New York City area and about 25 percent higher than the national average. This high cost is attributed to several reasons which become rather obvious. For example:

Local shortages of skilled labor requires the use of imported labor from distances up to 50 miles.

Coupled with the steep sloping terrain which varies from 10 to 15 percent in grade, rock outcroppings are encountered throughout the site, with the resulting costly site preparation. Blasting and drilling of dense rock is necessary in site and foundation preparations. Trenching through rock will be necessary for the extension of sewer and water lines, and even drilling in rock will be necessary for the extension and placement of the electrical and telephone poles. This work is extremely costly and is estimated to be approximately $1.6 million for clearing and grading of the site.

Water and sewer lines must each be extended for considerable distances to tie into existing systems.

Even the provision of walks, roads, parking and grassed areas which are necessary items in any housing development and cannot be deleted, are costly because of the rock condition.

Collections and disposal of surface runoff with the required storm drainage systems again is a costly item attributed to the rocky terrain.

In addition, the West Point area experiences a short summer construction period resulting in the added costs of winterization of facilities and loss in labor efficiency.

And inasmuch as all of these operations must be accomplished with the minimum interference to the training activities of the Cadet Corps, working and storage areas are somewhat restricted for the construction operations.

Let me again emphasize that it is not intended that these family housing units exceed the standards being used elsewhere in the United States, but that housing at the U.S. Military Academy should be comparable in quality to housing generally provided at other Army installations.

In summary, the basic problem facing us is simply this—the continual growth of our military posture in a time of startling scientific discoveries. Although the pace of our existence has quickened, one of the compelling reasons for the establishment of the Academy still exists. I speak of the "Ominous international political situation" so aptly depicted by Thomas Jefferson in 1801, the year before the establishment of the United States Military Academy. The spirit of Sylvanus Thayer, the father of the Military Academy, continues in the requirement for leadership integrated by excellence of character and excellence of knowledge. We cannot judge this requirement by cold fiscal calculation but must temper our decision to the realization that the quality of the product of the Academy is measured in direct proportion to the quality of the instructors which the Army may assign there.

HOUSING AT WEST POINT

One hundred and fifty-six houses at $19,800 per house, $3,089,000.

Five million five hundred eighty-eight thousand dollars plus includes 156 houses at $19,800 including all collateral costs.

Clearing, $81,000: The housing must be built in a heavily wooded area. Most trees must be removed and the ground otherwise prepared. This explains the unusual clearing cost.

COLLATERAL COSTS

Grading, $1,622,000: This is a large cost item because of the removal of 280,000 cu. yds. of boulder, ledge rock or other material at an estimated unit cost of $5.79 per cu. yd. This is a big cost item but through necessity the housing must be built in an area that is very steeply sloping and very rocky.

Roads, park, and recreational area, $303,000: (a) $57,500, access road exclusive of the shoulder construction; (b) $10,100, shoulder construction; (c) $111,600, interior roads; (d) $43,800, concrete curbs and gutters for roads; (e) $65,000, parking area, 5,460 square yards; (f) $15,000, grading and compacting of the recreational area.

This covers the access road into the housing area, the interior roads which have concrete curbs and gutters, parking areas, and a small amount of grading and compacting for a recreational area.

Drainage, $43,500: This includes normal drainage, storm drainage, ditching, and other drainage items which are the normal requirements for a housing area.

Water lines, $99,000: The water lines are normal in every respect. However, its installation in rock, as is necessary in this instance, causes the total installation cost to be greater.

Sanitary sewer lines, $71,000: These sanitary sewer lines are completely normal but, again, are somewhat more expensive because of the requirement of putting them in rock.

Electrical power and telephone, $187,500: (a) Electrical power, $92,000; (b) telephone, $95,000. These lines are not unusual except in one respect. There is an unusual distance involved because the source of power is a considerable distance away.

Final site improvement, $68,000: This is a normal part of a housing project and is unusual only in that a greater amount of topsoil will have to be imported into the area because of the rocky terrain.

Collateral equipment, $24,000: 156 ranges. Normal cost item.

Total cost, $5,588,000.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRICE].

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I wholeheartedly support this bill. Quite naturally I have a very special interest in the Military Air Transport Service since the headquarters of this great organization is located at Scott Air Force Base which is within my congressional district.
